INTRODUCTION.
TO VOLUME FOUR.....

INTRODUCTING a volume at this section of a long and unusual story of which incidents and adventures are somewhat extraordinary and miraculous, the progress of the war, the daring of the heroes and heroines, and campaigns and the like.

This volume I hope I can truthfully say has scenes and incidents which no other story of any usual size in the world may contain, either in fiction or reality; things that might be comical, sad, and horrifying, and ghastly.

The accounts which is written in this volume which contains more pages than the three volumes gone before, gives the reader an idea to the full, what character of an enemy the Abblesannian states have to fight with, and how through because of the effects of cruel war, and the sickedness of such a foe, a foe unusal in wickedness and cruelty, this great imaginary christian nation has to fight both the foe and nature in all their strue strength. Fight nature not because Nature lets loose herself, but that the foe some compells her to.

In the drama of war in this volume, the enemy known as Glandelinia, but in reality a portion of Abblesannia, which had fallen away in earlier years, tries by the aid of forced nature to do her bid, to win the war, in order to maintain the curse of all things known on record, the horrors of child slavery, and the like.

To write everything here would spoil it all for the reader, but nevertheless it can be declared that if the reader follows every chapter carefully, and ponders in his hour over everything that is given here, he will be able to calculate to himself the nature of glandelinia, or her government, which is a thousand times worse than Communistic, the raging flood horrors she creates, the awful massacres, the dreadful cruelties to child captives, the way she hurls her armies against those of the righteous nation, and of big forest fires, and a thousand compliation of other dreadful scenes which must not be given in account here.

The author writes the scenes in this volume as if he often had experienced them himself, as if at one a time he is on the side of the foe, at other on that of the christians, then again he is with Penrod, and his friends, or with Violet, and her sisters, or with the christian generals. Some times he writes as if he was actually one of the surviving victims of either flood, fire or explosion disaster, or fights in battles for one side or another. The actual scenes here however it is better for the reader to follow as they go from start to finish, as being long it is a very special volume, being twice the size of the former three volumes, but containing more interesting and important accounts, and therefore is not to be fullyb written here in further description.

But the reader if he so wills may keep his eye on all scenes that follow each other on and along the Arenburgs Run and its valley, for in some other volume, which will not be mentioned here, again it is said, the final drama of the war will occure at or on the banks of the Arenburgs run where the final ending of the hopes of success for Glandelinia will ensue and even bring the war to a speedy end in favor of the righteous nation which is suffering so much in the earlier stages of the war.

Leader upon leader fall in battle on one side or another in numbers that is astonishing, but there are others to take his place and therefore the great show goes on. Let the reader get well acquainted acquainted for the first time with great general Izner Heidi Kyletza and his officers, and follow his first campaign which is cut off in this volume to be added in volume five. Follow him in his battles and of his beg behavior to his child slaves an and see what kind of a man he really is compared to the other insurrectio Generals like Hanley and his Confederates.

Let the reader follow battle after battle with the others, let him follow every event and adventure in the volume and then he can if he sets his mind and hear on it take it on as if he himself was an actual participator.

FIRE AND EXPLOSION AT OR NEAR SCHLOSDER TOWN.
NOVEMBER THE THIRTEENTH BEINGBAY, NOVEMBER. NINTEEN THIRTEEN, DURING THE TIME OF GENERAL VIVIANS ADVANCE TOARD HARIC MARSIC INIO.

EMPEROR VIVIANS ARMY AT THE TIME OF ....ovember the 11 th was moving forward toard the nb: north where it was said general Hanleys army was concentrating to meet him near the city of Martochnic..On account of some severe blizzard blizzard and windr windstorms however the christian army had to halt in its advance and an encamp for a day or two o until the weather would be become more settled. The day after however the storm showed some signs of subsiding but the weather was bitterly cold and general Vivian decided it was unfavorable for the m y army to move intill the deep snow had hardened considerably.Therefore the army remained encamped on a large high plateau near the city of Sch. Schlesdertown but which was about thirty five miles away from the army. Violet and her sisters did not go out on the eleven eleventh, nor on the twelvth because of the blizzard and extremes of the cold weather, and therefore took it easy or hand snow games with their boy and girl scouts..Evans in the meantime went out scouting when reports came from other resources that Olandellinians of some numbers were acting suspiciously not near any point of the christian lines but around a big lake called Solicia at which near its end was build an enormous wall which held the waters withinin its on confines.

Evans had suspicions that these Olandellinians were doing something that no one would like to speak of and therefore at general Vivians request went out to find out. He had desired to take Violet and her sisters with him but as they did not feel like going as they said it was notging of importance for them on such a cold stormy day as this he went with his men only.

It was late at night however and Evans did not return. But as soon as it grew very dark, Violet and her sisters retired to their cots and went toslesp while several soldiers went on guard by their tent. It may have been about one or half hat the when the girlswere awakened by a strange thundering sound, a rolling boom as of thunder in the distance. It repeated three times each crash a little louder than the former, and wondering what it really could be, Violet and Jolce arose, and pushing aside the door of the tent took a look outside but saw nothing. The stars were out and it was below zero.

" It is strange " said Violet. I'D of swore it was real thunder we hear during a summ storm. Summer storm." "Yet it cannot number like that in such cea ther."

"It must have been an explosion---there it goes again" cried Jolce; and they saw the horizon lighted up by a faint red flash, as then it was strangely darkened as if a black cloud had rose in the sky.Thinking that the enemy might have only blown up their stores to prevent them from being taken by the Abbiesanniane; the girls retired to their beds and went to sleep again. An hour had passed, when the guards said to others who questioned them;

" I do not know sir why the sky is so red and so long. I The glow is in the direction of Schlesdertown. It must be a big fire."

Later on some officers came riding up.

" I heard some serious reports said one of them to the other as they passed the sentries after correctly answering to their summons. " Hundreds of build ings in Schlesdertown had been wrecked by some mysterious explosion far from the city ainghave have been blown out and all the ruins are on fire, and the flames is spread ing with great speed. The town seems doomed doomed and the inhabitants are fighting to save their belongings. See how bright the light is in the-------that the---why its all out. What happened there I wonder.?"

" The sentries even noticed this, and could not hardly believe their eyes for they kn knew it had been abig fire for great clouds of smoke had rose high in the sky and had been easily seen by the help of the glow.

" Something mysteriously to that" said the other officer suddenly halting.

" The fire departments could not quence such a big fire all at ones. Why there a little redness again s---now its gone too. Something is wrong and it looks fishy to me. Come lets report what as observed to our officers and have them telegraph to Schlesdertown."

They raced away to do this, and fifally they came up to general Roswell Sanders.

" Sir" one of them said excitedly" You know the fire th t was burning at Schlesder town!"

" Why yes, its a great fire. What about it?"

" It went out all of a sudden sir."

" What?"

" We saw it suddenly go i out,--first the light was there and now its gone."

The general go to his feet, went out the tent and looked in the direction of Schlesdertown and saw that it was true.

" it is cet ainly
" It is certainly funny , something strange indeed" he mused. " It cannot be. A big fire, reported to be burning thousands of structures, and then going out all of a sudden. It cannot be. I'll telegraph to Schlesdertown and see what is up."

He rode to the telegraph station and immediately the operator was busy as the generals cot command. A few minutes passed. Then the operator looked surprised.

"What' s the matter?" asked the general?

" I cannot get an answer.

The general tried himself, and found this was true.

" It may be the enemy cut off all wires leading from here to Schlesdertown" he said. " But its strange, only fifteen minutes ago the Mayor of that city telegraphed to me the city was doomed by a big fire. Either he was jesting or something mysterious has occured for a fire cannot go out so quick when its that big."

He then left the station and hastily prepared to send in the report of his discovery to emperor vivian.

In the meantime Violet was suddenly awakened by what at first she could not tell. There was a strange noise outside, making her think of lying on the shore near the sea on a windy day when the waves are dashing high, and yet she could not account for it. She lay for a while and lisa listened. Then rising from her bed she went over to Joice and shook her untill she awoke.

Joice knowing something is wrong when ever she is aroused by any of her sisters raised herself up and asked;

" What's the matter Violet, you look alarmed.

" I hear something like running water."

" runningwater, why Violet you might be walking in your sleep. There is no water here and the stream close by is frozen over."

" But no joi ce dear I'm not alking in my sleep. I hear it as plain as day. Let's get up and look for I'm not mistaken."

Joice turned on the light, and looked closely at Violet and saw that she really was wide awake.

But then she said..

" But then you must have been dreaming. How could there be water running in this tent. Maybe the pitcher is upset g and look."

Believing that this might be true she did so but soon returned and said;

" The pic pitcher is all right. And the sound is from outside. I'm sure the Arenburgs Run is flooded or something is wrong. It sounds like water alright."

Thinking Violet might be having a strange dream while even wide awake Joice got up and followed by Violet went outside, and moved toward the bank or where the ba k is bank is supposed to be but suddenly they were waste deep in cold icy water and some unseen object struck violet on the neck knocking her under the flood and making her suffer pain. She quickly however managed to rise to the surface and was helpled ashore by Joice. both terribly excited quickly went inside the tent and changed clothes as quick as possible.

At first they so dared where all that water could come from. After dring them selves and putting on their winter clothing, they went outside cautiously and seeing a number of sentries further off on higher ground near a big tent raced up to him and Violet said;

" There's is a lot of water near our tent, water that had not been there before. I believe the river has overflowed. Will you sound the signal and summon some men."

The guard looked surprised but nevertheless he obeyed because in all says their commands too must be oby oeyed. While he fired the shot Violet ran back to arouse her other sisters, and while she did so, in answer to the shot a number of soldiers and a negr sergeant came running up.

" What's up"f he asked.

" I believe we are being flooded" said violet. " We found water on the ground near out tent."

The sergeant looked at her in surprise;

" Water around your tent. That's strange. Come boys, we'll see."

She followed them as they raced for the shore, and not seeing it in the dark the neg sergeant who was in the lead was up to his knee in water before he expected it. With a cry of surprise he jumped back, and commanded his men not to come any further. He turned on his flash light, and sure enough water was close to the tent, and water everywhere as far as the light would reveal.

" We'll sound the alarm with the strokes" he said."But I don't think the river has overflowed for how could it when it had been frozen tightly over. it's some other flood that poured in pon it. General vivian must be notified."

" We'll tell him ourselves" said violet, as her sisters came runningup and looking alarmed. " But we'll have to have some ne go with us so that we do not accidentally flounder in the flood. It is so dark we cannot see anything."

" I'll summon a squad of soldiers with flashlights" said the sergeant.

" And I'll have the flood investigated, and see how far it extends. while the Vivian n Ne Girls returned to move their belongings from the tent, their escort arived;

Violet and her sisters then fearing the flood n might rise higher and catch them in the darkness, hurried away from the tent, and as soon as they left, they heard the warning strokes being given which was to arouse the camp. The escort took them toard their fathers headquarters but as he had r tired for the night and as they did not wish to disturb him violet, and her sisters only ventbin to seek shelter there. But they were so excited that they could not sleep the rest of the night, and therefore lay wide awake in their be n, wondering all the time how the flood could have orign originated and what could have caused it to reach the camp and come up so high in so mysterious a manner. nd what was the cause of the explosions they had hear heard, and also of the fire, which had so s ddenly gone at without a moment s warning.

Every nes and then one of them could get up and go to the window to look out but as it was awfully dark they could not see a thing. Oh how they did long for daly daylight so they could see if it was really a flood or some back flow of the river which usually happens when a cold a wave storm comes up from the sea and drives the waves part ca, up the mouth of the river.

How long they lay there they did not know, but soon to their joy it started to get light, light enough to be able to see outside. At the same time they heard excited talking among the soldiers outside and wondered what had happened now. Dressig themselves as hurriedly supossivle violet, and her sisters without waiting to put their bread breakfast wentbout and were shocked at what they saw.

" Why we must have moved our army camp to the shore of the neck ofthe sea"said Violet. " There is so much water we cannot hardly see land on the other side."

" So we did not" said one of the soldiers."It's a big flood , tell you. Look at all that floating wreckage. I wonder where all that came from. There's enough on the surface of the water to build a city."

Violet and her sisters noticed this was true, and they were shocked more still by suddenly observing coming toard them a long jam of dead bodies of men women and children.

" Why the water is full of dea dead people" cried jennie. Look" Look they are in the water everywhere. It is a flood and some town has been wash d away."

In a few minutes an excited thr throng of soldiers hand swarmed till they lined the shore, officers came galloping up to see there all the water came from and signals were sounded incessantly all over the camp, and even many, cannons fired.

" Get Schlesdertown on the phone and tell them the camp is surrounded by a flood." " cried a general riding up."

" I'll go" cried Angeline, and she quickly mounted a horse standing close by and raced for the nearest signal station, for she was more handy at signal operations than any soldier yet. She reached it in a hurry and as she intered the operator wished to know what she wished for but she answered;

" I'll use the operator myself."

" He respectfully arose and she took the chair and started the machine going. Then she listened. There was no response. She looked at the operator in surprise. Then she tried more vigoriously and then not being able to get an answer she shifted the key and telegraphed to Chamberland. She was still more surprised by not re cieving no responeide reac response.

" Has there any one been tampering with the machines" f she asked of the operator.

" No Princess. I was here all night, and I have tried to get a certain place at your fathers orders and have recieved no response and notified him to the fact. Try Angelina Agathia."

She obeyed and still no responsise response. she tried at perryville, and jean city. Then changing from the telegraph operator she tried Schlesdertown on the Phone. she tried various numbers, and then grosing impatient said;

" Something is wrong somewhere. Did father try to phone to Schlesdertown."

" Yes, early this morning but got only a few moments response from some telephone operator who said the place was being flooded. That may account for the flood. He said he heard a strange sound on the wire afte afterward not made by any human hand. I believe the flood had something to do with it, for no one was able to call up the city after the light from the fires went out. could get phone answers then but not by telegraph."

With a strange forod foreboding violet and her sisters had just now arived to the signal station, and one of them said;

" Angeline the flood must have been awful. Our soldiers are now making attempts to rescue people from rafts and house tops. They say the whole city of perryville had been washed away a little after midnight. Come and see. They have rescued about two hundred, and six are from Schlesdertown..."

At this news Je Angeline ran out and followed her sisters to the banks of the flood to see for themselves. Indeed as they reached the edge of the flood, they saw many houses floating by and on many of them especially on roofs and in the upper stories and in the attics were people begging for those on the shore a to c come rescue and aid them. Soldier s who had ropes were busy throwing them but most of the wreckage was beyond their reach and they could not be rescued. It was weight too much for most of the soldiers and t rning away sick at heart and stomach they left the sa scene beca because they could do nothing else. however violet and her sisters, though the scene af affected them greatly were able to stood it, and they excitedly watched the soldiers a as they continued at their work of rescue. The wind was blowi ng unusually strong strong from the northeast, and as the Vivian girls watched the scenes before them they noticed how rough the water of the big flood was, and how much more wreckage was floating down in on it and with people on shore. They wondered half surprised if the whole of gohiendertown had been washed away, and above all why the water was so full of countless thousands of bodies of every age of human creatures, and why the current of the flood was so strong. for a time now nothing passed by but dead bodi bodies. Then. hark, surely that was not the scream of the wind. It surely was a human voice somewhere not far from the shore of the flood yelling for aid.

It sounded from the north shore of the flood, and therefore followed by a crowd of soldiers violet rushed in that direction, with her long hair which her violent motion loosened streaming in the wind. It was not nuetil starting to snow, and as they passed a point where a boat lay dry upon land one of the soldiers pointed to a drift close to the shore about thirteen hundred feet off nosewer. He had the face of a dead man and looked excited and scared. Once more they all heard that agonized cry, and then the truth broke upon them. It was one of the victims of the flood, but still alive, and gaining at the height of land she saw quite a long distance distance off a floating floor but nothing else but the cries came somewhere from that direction..

At the same instant the girls heard some of the soldier s shouting through their speaking trumpets

"Hold on we'll save you in a jiffy. But one of the girls had also seen the boat and was there, followed by two of her sisters and it was at once pushed into ty the water before any of the soldiers could stop them, as they had not the faintest hope that these princesses could get the boat off much less out in time to save the flood victim, whom they could see though the girls could not struggling to retain a hold on what was really a floating piece of flooring. But violet, jennie and juice had no misgivings.

"We are coming" jennie shouted. "Who ever it is hold on." and as quick as a flash pushed off with the a oars. But to their dismay they found that the boat was too long and heavy;; that the oars were big and too heavy and that it would take two girls almost to use one oar, and therefore seeing their trouble another of the girls jumped in to assist. yet they had no time to think how much more difficult their task would be on this account, but so high ran the dashing waves of the flood, so violent was the ramming f blows from the swirling wreckage jams, so fiercely blinding was it snow, snowing and so fiercely the wind blowing; that those who were watching them from the shore though th thought the boat would fill, and thus they would lose four of the best princesses. But the three vivian girls were as cool as if they had been merely out for a pleasure row, and managed the clumsy craft so adroitly that it took in very little water, and neither was it upset by the wreckage floating swiftly against it. When stopped by wreckage they merely pushed it aside with one of the oars.

Once however the, nearly did give out, for a mountainous wave of wreckage and even to their horror all afire threatened instant destruction, but by frantic movements they managed to draw the boat out of its path and it swirled on but now they had lost sight of the raft to which the half drowned being was clinging whom from the moment of starting the girls had kept in sight. The great unwilling oars seemed to utmost their work their utmost strength, and sometimes one of the girls did not know that she was almost fainting from exhaustion, perhaps even dying.

The raft drifted away however from their reach and they then had to set out in persuit but finally it rammed the boat and holding it by an oar two of the girls did save the flood victim. it was however a man and they had all they could do to get him into the boat. And his last conscious momen was spent in getting into her their boat; where he then lay like one dead, unable to help them in what was more dangerous than getting out---getting back, and facing now now only the current of the flood but the wild wind and blinding snow.

Fortunately the soldiers managed to loose the prow of the boat and these appeared in time TO ASSIST HER in making a safe landing and in carrying the half frozen man int into a tent and taking care of him. it was half a day before he was able to speak in which some other rescues had been made but the soldier soldiers knew the first time he opened his eyes that he was fully aware who saved him from the floods.

After a while he told them that he was from Perryville, and that the flood struck his house completely overturning it like a capsized boat. Because of the current he could not swim a stroke, and if a piece of flooring had not come within hi his reach he would have given himself up for lost. But as he saw the ra t f rac raft passing the shore thronged with soldiers he held on and cried for help. When they asked him if he thought the Vivian Girls could reach him in time, he said;

"N " I felt more than sure they would. They can do anything that is not a trick of magic."

s the snow was falling harder and the wind blowing fierwer, violet and her sisters could not help worrying because they were afraid that the soldiers would not soon be able to see far enoughto rescue the people who may be seen floating on house tops, or lofts and the like. Yetthey felt a trifle ashamed of their fears, and watched the movemen movements of the passing wreckage and also kep their eyes on floating houses. suddenly as they edged closer to the flood they heard a distant crackling n i noise and presently a swish of water : different from the ordinary noise of the flood came and at that instant two officers came riding p up and shouted thr through him hands)

"One pier of the big bridge yonder is gone. The whole bridge will be down in abo t about five minutes. Most of you soldiers who valuable your lives get over to higher land, and be qui k quick about it."

Violet and her sisters heard these orders, and they too then shouted them to the soldiers around them and all sprang for the higher lands.

"Here" take the refugees whom we have rescued" shouted one of the sergeants, and this order was obeyed, violet and her sisters following last. Crack, crash. into a shrieking din of waters went a br big bridge, and just as violet and her sisters with some of the frightened refugees at their heels reached high land, they knew that the flood had made a considerable rise, for it seemed as though the whole Atlantic ocean had been suddenly let loose below and all about the camp. An it seemed as if the rescue work must be stopped. The Vivian Girls turned in silence to meet the remainder of the rescuing column struggling p the knoll. It was getting terribly cold the storm was growing worse the wind swirling the snow in blinding sheets all about them. It was getting very dark, and finally they halted where it was safer to watch the flood and to count up the shivering groups of rescued flood victims. Eighteen men and six women and four children.

Suddenly from somewhere came theory of some old lady hollering for help.

"Oh police" cries violet" how can we rescue that poor old lady. See she is on top of that old house in the storm and may be blown off at my moment."

Jennie wrung her hands and silently heaped maledictions upon the glandelinians whom she knew were responsible for the flood The child refugees who had been rescued wept and howled, for how could they live and see an old woman drown. suddenly from the window of the floating house the window of the attic which was facing tow a them beamed a lit light. Someone else was in the building, for they saw some one moving about trially and then peering out; and then they all saw a younger lady sit down beside the window and look out with horror in her eyes. They could distinctly see her face, and they believed she was the old ladys daughter.

Upon hisheesoldier who had a coil of rope in his hand pulled his hat down more firmly One of the soldiers who had a coil of rope in his hand pulled his hat down more firmly over his head and turning toard the seething flood that covered the land like a sea--" I'm off for them both. "

The Vivian girld kneeling the danger he risked threw up their hands with a shrill cry for they were sure this rash soldier would be drowned before he even got Half way to the house which was so indistinctly seen now as the snow increased its dense shoud shroud. But the soldier soldiers appeared it seemed a simple enoughthing to them for any of their comrades to swim over to that floating house, and to bring the two women safely to the shore. They felt sure however that the water was many feet deep and that if a piece of the floating wreckage which went ar whirling down on the bosom of the flood inimmense drifts and masses one by one, should strike him he would float away as dead as the timbers themselves, but the soldier did not stop to tell them this.

He simply shut his teeth tight and first waded in. Despite the snow murk they could see him but a little way, then the white shroud took him in, and there was ten minutes of suspense, in which the howling of the blizzard tempest, and the thunder of the waters sounded more terrible than ever. Then the wind brought them a faint" Hallo. next in front of the light that streamed from the attic window of the house a darker shade was seen raising itself. The soldier had swam safely over cold as the water was.

"Oh but he'll never get the two women safely across there" groaned an of one of the officers. " A plague on the dreadful Glandelinians wh who they say caused this flood!

"He will manage manage" said violet shrewdly. "He is as strong as a ox."

But in their hearts even Violet and her sisters were even anxious, and they held their breaths and shiveringly paced about on the knoll. The other refugees wet and cold, and almost overcome were taken to tents to be treated. The rescued little ones began to cry vehemently and to demand dry clothes, and these were taken care of first. Violet and her sisters went to aid and as they hurried away, they all heard from the direction of the floating house the sound of rapid and vigorous pounding. In a moment it had stopped. What was the soldier doing!

In fact the soldier was tearing down a large piece of floating section of a flooring piece to use as a raft for the return journey and making a pole to paddle go who while the two women thickly wrapped up and ready for flight with all the valuables that they could carry fastened firmly to their clothes sat placidly on a chair for the floating house from the roof by the soldier, the latter with a few stout who had been brought down strokes had the raft firmly made, and soon the two women were balancing on it out on the water but the raft still securely fastened to the house, the long clothes line or rope he had so brought over was wound around it and over her lap with plenty of it in her hands to hold by. She had gathered together a pile of blankets and clothing and the soldier had heaped them around the two women. Then he set on the dangerous return voyage pushing his unwieldy craft before him when he could, pulling it by the clothes line when he could not make the paddle work properly, and when he came to a deep place and swinging it so as not to face the storm he worked it by means of a long pole, and fought desperately also to prevent other wreckage from colloding with the raft, which if it happened could throw them all into the water.

The water grew rougher and the storm wilder and more blinding. He could not see the shore through the white murk until suddenly a large camp fire flared up but then the current was so strong that he could not for the sake of his life direct the raft in that direction. The loud steady rush of the flood seemed ominously louder and bodies of dead persons floated past the raft all around, and one body was almost pushed upon it, it being a little girl.

Before ten minutes had passed it seemed to this soldier whose name we will say was Toolerine as if he had been pushing and paddling the raft and struggling against the drifts of wreckage and jams of bodies for a year, and as though he might as well give it up altogether because of the insane increase of the November blizzard, excepting for the courage of the two brave women.

"Let the raft go my brave boy" the old lady said at last, observing his exhaustion. "I am old and have lived my day and I am ready to go."

"No, no Grandmother do not give up yet." said the younger lady." Hal' He'll save us."

The soldier did not answer but continued his struggle. At that instant the dim star of light in the floating house which had been drifting far to the south of them went out and their last beacon was gone. They knew then---the two women as well as the brave soldier---that the big wooden house had parted into two pieces and then went to pieces. Even the old grandmammy gave a long sigh. Toolerine pegged and tugged, and worked and shoved away wreckage which tried to jam up against the raft. He could not speak for he was not only strained and tired but he was very sick at heart. Suddenly he felt that the storm was increasing with redoubled fury, and at the same instant the snow flakes grew much thicker, and the shroud grew much worse so you could not see fifty feet away.

Another jam of wreckage scraped the raft, and seeing it was another flooring the soldier sprang up this refuge keeping tight hold of his steering charge meanwhile, and also clinging to a large tree which perhaps a kind foreseeing Providence had brought down on the flood with the new raft. Toolerine could almost have cried great stout fellow that he was struggling there in the shallows of the flood between the two rafts clinging desperately to the tree, dripping wet from top to toe and his clothing starting to freeze to his body; sore and tired to the last degree, and seeing nothing but a watery grave at last for the dear old granny and her granddaughter, and himself. But another light on the shore piercing the snow shroud just then appeared and after a moments struggle he decided to start anew.

"Hurray Granny" he cried with a crazy laugh." Here we are. We will sail a few steps further, and if we cannot get on we'll come back to another point. We can hold on on these two rafts if we cannot anywhere else."

The two women snow covered and looking like snow girls were chattering and shaking with the cold but the old lady went on cheerfully with her discourse;

"You'll save us yet my boy. Alma my Lord" she continued with the tears streaming down her old wrinkled cheeks" I'm not ungrateful to You. I'll not forget now I in the darkness of storm and blizzard and flood Ye stood by me."

"And I never understood the situation so well before" said he putting his face close up to the dear old lay ladys face, to see how she looked once more. The storm wind blew her soft hair about her forehead but the blue eyes were shining underneath and the kind old lips were smiling as they had always smiled on her grand daughter ever since she could remember.

He shouted loudly to those on shore, and this time above the roar of flood and gale he heard a faint response, but it was far up the flood, and as the clouds of swirling snow rushed by blinder than ever, and the lights of other camp fires lighted up the scene elsewhere, To Toolerine could see that the raft upon which he alone was resting was in the path of a lumbering wall of wreckage floating down toward him, and he worked desperately to get out of its way and finally succeeded though a few minutes too late would have meant destruction for the three of them. Having now got his exact bearing and the blizzard having increased still more yet, He struck out boldly for the shore. Hearing the sound of his paddling and his voice the soldiers came running along the bank to meet him and a great shout burst from the shivering groups who stood there in blinding snow and wind but the current of the flood was a rebound at this point and strive as he would he could not yet make the shore.

Thewind blew in hsharper gusts from the northeast, or from every quarter of the compass it seemed by turns, and it seemed to take special delight in rushing down the the raging flood like a hurricane and taking away the breath of any body. The swirling snow too filled peoples eyes and nostrils or mouths while the raw air found its way easily through the best clothing, and turned the skins of many into pimply gooseflesh. Yet as disagreeable as it was, and cold as it was they stayed by the edge of the flood, a all wild with excitement and everyone talked wildly about the attempt of the soldier and his attempts to get the raft with the two women ashore. The poor old lady and her grand daughter out there on the raft, drenched first as they had been in the icy water and now covered with snow and exposed to the since must soon die of the cold, and more over the rafts were again going in an opposite direction and Toolerine had lost control because of the current, while the great flood was rising rapidly.

It was evident that within another hour or two the water would soon destroy the raft also or that the great fields of floating wreckage and bodies would carry the three of them to their deaths. Many wild suggestions were made for their rescue but none that gave the least hope of their success. It was now simply impossible to launch a boat like the Vivian Girls had done, for the vast fields of floating wreckage and human bodies, two to six yards in thickness, and from twenty feet to nearly a thousand in breadth were crushing and grining against each other in their mad movement down on the flood at a rate of sixteen to fourty miles an hour, turning and twisting about, sometimes jamming their edges together with so great a force as to make a noise like in an explosion and to shatter each jam apart or to try and leap pa lap over one another and sometimes drifting in many parts. One might as well try to go down on such a flood in an egg shell as in the soutest rescuer ever built. Before when the Vivian Girls attempted it it was not so dangerous as there was not so much drift and not such a terrific fury in the storm?

However Toolerine kept the raft within sight of those on shore, he standing on his new found raft and lashing it to the other and then paddling like made to keep from drifting out into the dangerous part of the flood. His voice now could not reach the soldiers on the banks but the appearance of the women was heartrending. There was nothing to be done however. Human sympathy was given freely, but human human help seemed out of the question. Every one of the soldiers on the shore agreed to that opinion, every body that is to say except Violet, and her sisters. They had been so long in the habit of finding ways to help themselves under greater difficulties as already described in past chapters, that they did not easily made up their little minds to think that any case was hopeless.

No sooner did Violet and her sisters clearly understand how matters stood than they ran to the front of the flood, despite the fact that soldiers tried to stop them. Half an hour later some of the soldiers cried out" Look there, who are those children, and what are they going to do?" pointing to the stream of water.

Looking inthat direction, the soldiers saw seven girls three quarters of a mile away standing on a floating piece of raft in the flood but a large raft. Each of the girls held in her hand a large plank. As the raft upon which they stood neared another or overtook it rather, the first girl ran forward threw the plank down, making a bridge of it, and crossed to the other drift followed by the others. Then picking up the plank, they waited for a chance to repeat the process. As they thus drifted down the river toward the raft upon which the man and two women were, every eye was strained in that direction. Pres presently some one cried at;

"Why how did they get out there. It's the Vivian Girls, and they are trying to make for Tollerine and the two women."

There was a shout as the soldiers understood the nature of the heroic attempt of Violet, and her sisters, and then a hush as the extreme danger they were in became apparent. Nevertheless Violet and her sisters had laid their plans wisely and well but nevertheless also it seemed absolutely impossible that they should succeed. Their purpose was with the aid of the plank to cross from one drift of wreckage to another until they should reach Tollerine and his raft, but asthat would require a good deal of time and the floes of wreckage was moving down on the flood with unusual speed, it was necessary to start at a point above the army camp. Therefore Violet, and her sisters had gone about a mile up the flood before going on the first raft, and when first seen from shore they had already been on the first drift.

After that first shout a whisper might have been heard among the crowd of soldiers on the banks. The heroism of the attempts of these brave girls awe awed the whole crowd, and the momentary expectation that they would disappear forever amid the crushing wreckage or drown in the rushing waters made everyman hold his breath in great anxiety and terror. The greater danger the Vivian Girls faced was from the smaller drifts of wreckage. When it became necessary for them to step upon these, their weight wowas sufficient to either make it tilt or seperate, and their footing therefore was very insecure. After a while t as they were within close sight of the raft with the soldier and two women on it they came into a large collection of these smaller drifts of wreckage. For a while they waited almost impatiently impatiently not hoping that a larger field of wreckage would drift near them, but after a minutes delay they saw that they were rapidly floating past their goal, and that they must either trust themselves to the treacherious drift, or fail in their attempt to save the man and two women. Crossing the best of the drifts, one of them laid the plank and all seven passed across successfully. In the next passage however the wreckage came apart in a number of sections and then went under and all seven of the girls went down almost head first in to the water. A shudder passed through the the crowds of soldiersnon the shore.

" A bunch were about to swim out in an attempt to rescue the girls whom they could not bear to lose thinking it was all over with them when some one cried;

" Look, look. They are trying to climb upon the seperat p sp seperate pieces of drifts. Hurrah they are on their feet again. You cannot drown fishes."

With that all the soldiers shouted for joy. The girls had managed to regain the plank and poles as well for they were excellent swimmers, and to climb upon another number of seperate drifts before the other wreckage floating near could crush them, and now moving cautiously, they made their way little by little toard the drift with the three uthers on it, while the man was striving to paddle his rafts tward them?

" Hurrah, hurrah, they are there at last." shouted the soldiers on shore ?

" But will they get back again!" was the question each one asked himself a moment later as they could see well now since the storm had slackened considerably.

Having reached the two rafts, containing Teulerine and the two women violet and her sisters knew very well that the more difficult part of their task was still before them for it was one thing for active girls to work their way in this fashion over floating wreckage in a regin raging flood, and quite another to force the two rafts by means of the poles they carried back to shore before the three were froze frozen to death.

But violet and her sisters were quick witted, and long headed as well as brave and they meant to do all they couldto save these poor women and the brave man and the ba brave man who had risked his own life so herocilla heroically for them. On the return journey however the girls were able to avoid one great risk. As it was not necessary to land at one particular plnt itime was of little consequence, and hence they took their time in paddling the two rafts toard shore. Therefore they slowly made their way toard the shore, drifting down the river of course or drifting down with the flood I mean while all the soldiers that thronged the edge marched along the bank. When at last they reah reached the shore in company, with the soldier and the two half frozen women, the soldiers seemed ready to trample on each other in their eagerness to tak take the Vivien Girls and bring them to a tent where they can be taken care of before the results of their sudden emmersion in the cold water takes effect. For drenched as they were in the icy flood, and now with their clothing frozen to their bodies it was feared they would take sick, but the Vivian Girls were of a kind that felt no results of such an experience, and they merely went to a tent, and changed their clothing for dry, and were out again watching the work of other rescues as if nothing happened. You could not freeze them in sixty below zero weather maybe.

OVERWHELMIN G OF THE CITY OF SPERRYVILE, CALVERNIA STATE, BY THE WATERS OF LAKE SELICIA???? ONE OF THE MOST TERRIBLE AND PROBABLE PECULIAR DISASTERS OF THE WAR SO FAR--------ACTUAL NUMBER OF DEATHS WILL NEVER BE KNOWN--BUT PROBABLY IS OVERA MILLION. ABOUT THAT MANY BODIES FOUND. KNEW THE ENEMY WOULD BLOW UP THE DIKES OR DAMS OF THE LAKE. WITNESS SAID THE ENEMY HAVE BEEN ACTING SUSPICIOUSLY NEAR THE DAM. FOR SPERRYVILLE EVERYTHING OVER IN A FEW MINUTES. CRAZED BY HORROR AND THEIR SUFFERINGS. THE FLOATING WRECKAGE AFIRE AS THE FLOOD SWEEPS DOWN TWARD JOAN CITY AND SCHLOSSERTOWN.. A BRIDGE WHERE THOUSANDS UPON THOUSANDS LOST THEIR LIVES. DISASTER TO EXPRESS TRAINS. THE MISHOLLESTER AND PANDORA LAST TRAIN. THE FIRST RUSH OF THE DEATH WAVE. THE FIRST REAL HORRORS OF THE BIG DISASTER.

The terrible thing that ensued on the preceeding chaapter as mentioned before occured on the 13th of November 1912 and as a result of the great explosions which erupted into the air so much earth and debris, and these concussions all but destroyed one third of the city of Schlossdertown either from the h shocks or vibrations or for some other reason(as the explosions occured dangerously l close,) the walled up levees of Lake Selicia broke in several places at once, and then melted down entirely and the waters were released from the immense lake and rushed down furiously in an overwhelming torrent that carrid all before it, and in a moment it carried down with it great masses of ice, snow and trees and all other debris, besides millions of diffi different kinds of fishes and small fishing craft. If this would have been all maybe this part of the story of a war disaster would not need to be mentioned or written, but the flood started things going that all those who survived will according to this story never forget as long as they live(proviing they live long enough to remember it for a year)

Down about twelty or more miles south of this lake in the beautiful paradise like valley of the Archburgs Ann River like the city of Sperryville, with her sister town known as Joan city about six and a half miles to the southeast, but about sixty three miles northwest of Angelinia Agathia. At the time this wa was to occur the people of the city itself were somewhat apprehensive because of the fact that about less than miles a way a fourty miles a way even nearer a great l Glandelinian army lay, a Glandelinian army truthfully whic which is is to say never met defeat yet even in facing far superior christian armies, had captured six christian armies wi hout a battle, forced the surrender of a hundred other, and annihilated fourty four grand armies under as many generals, and captured and held successfully one thousand four hundred villiages since the war began and burned them to the ground when leaving them when on the march. This army was under general Isner Mylette whom so far no christian general could lick or ever expected to ship.When hi this Glandelinian army came it was a great su f source of uneasiness, and early in the following morning, the people were warned that that scouts had seen and tried to prevent the enemy from blowing up the walled up dams of the Lake. They had heard the warning too often however to be impressed, and though knowing that Isner Mylette was the General grant and Lee combined of the Glandelinian army in his fighting qualities, they did not believe his men would cause such a disaster as was believed, and therefore jeered at their in informants.

Three quarters of those who h jeer jeered were before night fall scattered for miles all over the country cold in death, or met their fate in piles of blazing wreckage which was without being quenched swirled along on the surface ov of the b flood that came, came. Only a f w few heeded the warning and some of these were saved, ever swept through the town every little stream was swelleden by b the flood rivul rivulets became floods and creeks were turned into gradual lakes. The Archburgs Ann received a greatly increased body of water, and rose to the level of its dikes a thing that was unusual and the dam ge caused by this overflow alone would surely have been large. ut surely there was more to come for many other explosions were heard which rocked the very earth and the results were soon so appling that there lived not a human being who was likely to even think of the coming of so great a disaster.

At about Twelve oclock noon the resistless flood increasing more rapidly tore away the huge forests of trees not so far off and this was the real beginnig beggining of the end. The enormous mass of trees were rapidly hurled down upon the doomed town or city, and the lines of every stream was rapidly obliterated and was nothing bit a raging sea. The great trees hundreds of thousands of them like big log jam jams borne onward leveled everything before them crushing scores of frame houses like egg shells and going on unchecked until the flood reached elsewhere. Had the jam of trees passed on and spread out on the flood instead of remaining so thickly thickly jammed together Sperryville might hab have not met such a horror. There were many dead and dying already and hundreds of weaker houses on the outskirts of the citybhad been swept away, but just now the dead could be counted by dozens and not yet by hundreds of thousands. The big masses of floating trees formed ernormous and impenetrable floating barriers, and still carried all before them. As the flood increased in its rise the people had fled to second floors of their houses or to roof tops and hoped that the flood which they believed was caused by some outburst of the river would subside. For them however there was no longer any chances whatever of gettin getting away, and had they known indeed what was in store of for them the contemplat ion of their fate would have been enough to make them stark mad indeed.

Only half an hour had elasped from the time of the other explosions when others were heard, and one minute la minute later the waters of the big lake rushed down upon them, and then the thousands of sceffers realised their folly but not too late. The explosions had either tore or shook down the dams or levees of the big lake and the immense bodies of water which had rested in a basin fifty five miles wide and nearly half again as long and seventy feet deep at the least was let loose with the purpose to beging the destruction upon general Vivians camps which the int enemy said was intended.

The towering wall of water roared down upon the city of gerryville with the noise of a great tidal wave that follows an earthquake and rushed with a force and speed that actually carried all before it. Had it not been for the fact that the Aronburgs Run River itself been actually flooded even then a portion of gerryville might have been saved. This river however was too flooded already to recieve enough of the water to check such a mighty torrent, and the river itself went over its own banks and clear over the highest leves with the same force and fury pouring int into the city like a niagara and at once half of the houses of the big town were swept from their foundations and hurled with force and speed against neighboring houses, and crushed each othe other so suddenly that immediately this formed a immense jam of wreckage. This of course prevented the flood from passing on in this direction for the moment and allowed the main flood to swirl around in an opposite direction straight as you would say across the river in a foaming sea of waves, forcing the river itself like a tidal wave back into the rest of the town from the west, and as there had to be an outlet somewhere the river itself then burst one of its levees and made a new channel simultaneoual simultaneously through the heart of the lower part of the town.

The flood increased and increased, and hurled itself against the long jam of wrecked houses in succession of big waves, and each wave carried with it thousands of houses, furniture and legions of human beings. For an half hour the long jam of wreckage stood firm but finally the pressure of the flood grew and grew, then came the main torrent a towering wall of water more than fifty feet high, which swept inthe almost impenetrable and immovable barrier before it as if it were only a reed, and the rest of the city was crushed down and part of it entirely washed away.

Through this new outlet the water was forced in the direction of the higher portion of the city a mile above and in a moment many buildings not counting little ones with them, worth more than five million dollars a piece were suddenly engulfed and laid low. Here had gathered large numbers of workers who felt they were out of reach of the gradual part of the flood and almost before they even realised their peril they were swept away into the seething torrent.

Four miles below was the North or South districts of gerryville where the south fork of a little stream called the Kilenby empties itself into the big Aronburgs run. This section contained about two hundred thousand inhabatants, and in this location were about a dozen big orphan asylums most of them war orphans whose parents had died in battle or by grieving of the loss of husbands and other dear ones. Here also were Great Catholic Chr Churches and big business and private places, and Homes for the Aged, and one a big Old soldiers home. This section of the city has at best not been heard from but it may be said that four fifths of it had been entirely swept away and those who were not drowned frose to death from exposure to the terrible cold on floating wreckage and other drift after g being in the water.

Two miles further down on the more greatly swollen Aronburgs Run which now was a wild surging rushing sea spreading scores of miles over the land and at the point which runs parallal with the main line of the Mic-Hollester and Pandora railroad was the very heart of the city, or what is called the Down Town Section where tower the highest buildings and where great wharves are on the river. At this point great river ships were close to the wharves. This section had however only 10,000 inhabatants as most of this part of the city had business houses, all of the houses being on a flat and on both sides of the river.

Here occured a complete washout for few of even the strongest buildings escaped. Another mile and a half further down but more to the west side, was the Southwest districts and here alone there was a topographical possibility of the spreading of the immense flood, but where it increased its force. This section contained 100,000 inhabatants and was wholly devastated. The outer limits of this city lay a mile below the southwest section in a flat, and a mile further down where the city limits and smaller villiages very close to the city with a total population of 67, 000 and the flood gave it all to the river, leaving not even the biggest tree to mark the place where it once stood. On made ground further own on and stretching along right at the very edge of the river were the immense Ammunition works of the Gunnery and Explosive shell Companies, buildings seven stories high and three blocks long, and which had 2 $ 25,000,000 invested in it, not counting the ammunition and other materials inside the structure, which alone was worth ever seven million dollars.

The building was undermined by the force of the flood, and within a day had totally disappeared into the river, an unaccountable disaster indeed.

The great damage was largely due to the rebound of the great flood because of the jams of wreckage. The wave was checked by the wreckage mountain made for the disss distance of seventeen miles by the first part of the flood, and therefore spread against the great Arenburgs Run, and rose that river to a depth of sixty feet above its very leves and dikes in nearly all places. It became a frightful torrent such as no tidal wave could even produce when sweeping on land from the open sea, and to make matters worse the big river lumber boome on Arenburgs Run, there being eight of them -l with hundreds of millions of logs broke because of the flood, and the rush of the waters homing up stream forcing the river to meet the other portion of the flood from the east increased the extent of the awful disaster in that section. In Caldwell as well as Jennie Turner far on the other side of the river, the opinion was expressed that so many lives would not have in the least been lost had the people not believed from their experience or news of enemy doings, that should the enemy burst a dike there would positively be no danger beyond the filling of basements and cellers, or the river recieving most of the flood without having the least chance to overflow the dikes and levees.

After rushing down the sloppy landscapes from the South Fork River branch the pressure of the water was so great that it forced itself against the natural channel no not only into the streets of Caldwell, and Jennie Turner city to a considerable depth but all the way down to Big Girl Kneel and Chamberlens, for scores and scores of miles spreading out into an immense raging sea laden with great jams of wreckage and countless hundreds of floating houses with frightened people on top.

By the terrible inundation communication by rail and wire was entirely cut off. The exact number of victims of this most dreadful disaster that probably can ever be written will probably never be estimated, though as to the story nearly 1,800,000, (This many according to the story from the bodies recovered it then can be said is known perished;) although it is probable the loss of life may be much greater, were lying dead, scattered allover the country with the wreckage of the city, hundreds of billions of dollars worth of property were totally destroyed, and hundreds of thousands of surviving people beggared, not inthe city alone but every other place the flood spread to-----and all because the enemy broke up the dams of this lake by means of explosives, and probably also because some of the nearest schristian scouting parties were were too penurious to have the Clandelinian mining ing engineers frustrated in their dastardly attempt. The coroners verdict as will be said later will be to the effect that this scouting party was just as much to blame for the disaster as the enemy for not making proper at attempts to prevent it.

In the city of gerryville thousands of the richest and biggest business buildings, and as many more residences were totally destroyed in half an hour, and less than a thousand of the structures composing the city injured or luninjured, complete paralysis followed, thousands became crazed from their sufferings, and will never regain their reason, Clandelinian ghouls swarmed to the place and looted the bodies of the dead, and even the arival of christian soldiers could not put an end to this carnival of Clandelinian crime, and now the impoverished survivors were to be cared for until they could get upon their fe t again feet again, reliefv relief started pouring in from everywhere in the shape of hundreds of thousands of dollars in cash and thousands of carloads of supplies of all sorts, and everything is being done for the sufferers.

Lake Belicia is about 110 miles in length, and a little over fifty across, two quarters of a mile in depth at its deepest, and at the least more than seventy feet, ina located in hilly country three hundred feet above the level of the Aronburgs Run River, its waters having been held within bounds by a huge concrete dike nearly seven thousand feet long at the narrowest part of the lake, ninty feet thick and one hundred and seventy feet in height, the top having a breadth of over fifty feet. It was thus walled up to be a huge reservior and a feeder for the Mic-Hollester and Pandora canals which irrigate the immen immense farms around in case of a draught in summer. The lake is formed by the actions of the waters of the ernormous Mic-Hollester Run river many miles further away, and the lake was claimed to be the sole private prope property of Emperor Vivian Himself, and had all kinds of rich and most magnifisent lake boats on it when the washout occured.

Despite its size the dike was so strongly made that ever since the lake had even been dammed up it never had been a menance to the residents of the Arenburgs Run river, and before that it used to run into the Aronburgs Run River as an outlet forming between the bigger river beyond and the one it to k for an outlet a beautiful flow of water indeed, and with a scary scenery around it that boasted of a Eden it certainly was sublime. Engineers of the Mic-Hollester and Pandora Railroad(mason engineer constructors) regularly inspected it every two weeks, and always truthfully pronounched it safer than an ordinary stone dam and that nothing except a real heavy earthquake could effect it in any way. The big lake used to belong to the Mic-Hollester and Pandora Railroad, but Emperor Vivian at the advice of his daughters, and Wife bought the lake a year before the outbreak of the war for more money than Rockerfeller and Henry Ford could ever expect to make if they lived a thousand years.

The city of Sperryville had become of existance even before the lake at its narrowest part had ever been damed up and since then for more than fifty years the dams had been as strong as ever, and big Royal Clubs fishing and Social which formed on the shores of the beautiful lake truthfully quouted the opinions of experts to the effect that nothing short of an extraordinary convulsion of nature, or unusually strong blasting of powerful explosives could affect the protecting dam.

The geographical situation of of Sperryville, and its sister sister cities Joan, and Schloesdertown is one, that would have rendered peculiarly liable to terrible loss of life in the event of a disaster if the river itself should have ever overflowed its banks, but as most of the river runs through deep channels leeves were made where it is almost level with the ground and therefore the river too had been rendered safe. The city was built on the shore of the river, a stream which is always navigaible all year round, exceppt in fierce winter weather when every thing freezes up. It often rises to great heights during winter storms or when at spring the snows melt, and rains fall but never reached half t way to the level of the protecting levees and dikes.

On the other side of the city but much further away is the Sunbeam Creek which gathers up its own share of the melting snows, mountain rains, and other waters and whirls them along tward Vivian Vivien Wickey hundreds of miles away. The awful flood caused by the sudden outpouring of the contents of the lake together with the waters of the earlier part of the flood that had already swollen these two streams to double their usual flood tide was supposed to be the cause of the sudden submersion of Sperryville, and the drowning of so many of its citizens, and of the gradual but horrid flooding of the two other cities, which entailed a hundred times great horror than the flooding of Galvaston in 1900, somewhat in the same way but of a longer duration and keeping people trapped in flooded houses for days and nights as a at a time as seen in next chapters. The water forcing the riverse nits a perfect sea piled up in overwhelming masses, carrying before it everything that obstructed its onward rush upon Sperryville..

Sperryville, the center of the great disaster, and the first city struck by the torrent is on the main line of the Mic-Hollester and Pandora Railroad, 234, miles straight north of Angelinia Agathia. It was one of the leading city cities of the great Arenburgs Rum Munition and other big plants, and had steel mills, and great ion iron works lumber mills, lumber companies and ev every kind of a company almost as we Americans will see in Chicago or any other great American city itself, and all this too was swept away. Every big mill employed from two hundred to nearly seven thousand men.

The people of the city had been warned by virless of the enemy threatening to start a big flood as early as six oclock in the morning and had they really believed the reports it is probable a great many lives would have been saved as great and beautiful hills are on all sides around the city and they could have fled to them for safty. But not a person in this city believed it, and therefore did not know the Dam had given way untill the flood swept the city off itsfoundation and tore the timbers apart and destroyed more than two hundred thousand lives out of the place alone. Escape from so terrible and huge a torrent was utterly impossible. The Mic-Hollester ands and Pandora and others hastily made up trains to get as many people away as possible with the effort to save all lives they could. Atthe news of the flood people came from all towns not touched by the waters, and lined the shores on both sides as thick as soldiers on drill with the hope of the on chance of rescuing some one.

But thousands of bodies were found in the River Arenburgs Rum two hundred miles beyond Angelinia Agathia which in all probability were carried so far down the river from Sperryville, and all other places later mentioned that were erected or wiped out by the torrent.

The terrible and unusualholocast among the long floating windrows of wreckage on the surface of the flood where unknown numbers of men women and children who were saved from the flood and from freezing to death were slowly burned to death or even to ashes caused a terrible loss of life among which the number will never be known for sure even in this story. The loss of property will be mentioned in preceeding chapters, but one building which was worth $10,000,000 was entirely swept away, and its great machinery shops full of machinery of all kinds were found later scattered for miles all over the country.

On the first day when the flood had reached a high stage for scores and scores of miles all over the country there came to Emperor Vivians campose sampe a soldier who had scarcely a few rags to cover his nakedness which had been a uniform and well nigh overcome with cold, hungry and illness. He was a lieutenant in general Hindenburgs army and his name was Heidi Piedi and he was a great cavarly officer. He had been pursued by Glandelinian cavarly for six days before the disaster, and by almost superhuman efforts he succeedin succeeded in escaping them and worked his way through the forst, and across snow covered ground, and he later himse himself witnessed the terrible results of the deluge, which he said he saw start not far from Emperor Vivians summer Lake Resolr Resort. Diedi said he had rejoined a company of scouting Abyssinkilian cavarly for a time, and he had repeatedly, he declared called the attention of the officers of various scouting parties to the various attempts of Glandelinian soldiers and mining engineers working suspiciously about the dam but he resieved the sharp reply that the masonry of the long dam was all right, that it had been built to stand as long as the mountains remain, that such a thing as the enemy being able to wreck it by blasting was among the impossibilities. put Iedie did not hesitate to continue his warnings and finally according to his own statements, he was instructed to dea detail a squadron of swift Winkle Abyssinkilian horsemen to swoop down upon the workers, and was given to understand that if he really found them trying to wreck the dam to give no" quarter," take no prisoners, that they were more tired than tired of the actions of the Glandelinians in the war and that the less there taken of Glandelinian soldiers as prisoners in the hereafter the better it would be for the nation.

Diedi obeyed the instructions, while the officers in charge of these scouting parties laid their complaints before some of the christian generals of Hensons army which was said to be nearest, not more than a week before the catastrophe. He told They told the generals that the enemy were trying to use very powerful explosives ocome where about the dam, and that if the explosives were powerful enough the dam would certainly give way. Diedi said the generals promished to send better scouts to examine the movements of the enemy about the dam, and if necessary to appeal to Emperor Vivian. Somehow the expert scouts did not accomplish their duty, were said to accidental accidentally hinder the movements of the other scouts, and though the appeal was made to Emperor Vivian it was too late to avert the disaster.

For three days previous to the final disaster Diedi said that the enemy had succeeded in putting the sletric shock to one explosive which to him made a noise like a million thunderslaps and shook the trees all around him as if there was a great wind, and a hole was torn in the machinery through which the water forced itself , and the explosion so cracked the other portions of the wall that the front of the immense dam resembled the spot of some large watering pot. The force of the water was was so unusually great after the blast that all of these jets squirted fully sixty feet horizontally from the stone wall with a great roaring hissing noise.

The noise of the explosion shook the country round for miles, and brought to the spot many of soldiers who strove to stop the Glandelinian engineers at their dirty work but were beaten off by Glandelinian soldiers. And Emperor Vivians army or Hensons even was more than three days distance away. The big spurts of water started torrents of water pouring out of the wall in quite four millions of gallons by the half hour or less.

At 10 oclock on November the thirteenth 1912 probably in the middle of the week Diedi said he was moving forward with a big scouting party with a purpose to get round the dams and suddenly attack the Glandelinian engineers, when about more than a mile back from the big dike he suddenly was conscious of a series of immense clouds rosi rising high as if there were three or four big volcanoes suddenly eruptic erupting before hi his eyes at that short distance, there were crashes that hurled him and his troopers off their horses, and the ground vibrated severely like an earthquake. Then recovering his senses he noticed the surface of the big lake seemed to be lowering. He doubted his eyes, and then finding his suspicions were absolutely well founded quickly issued orders to his men to remount and race for the dam. They races clear to its edge and there he saw the water of the immense lake fairly welling out from beneath the shattered foundation stones of the dam and great clouds of smoke still hung over the scene. Absolutely helpless he and his soldiers were compelled to stand there or remain there on horseback and watch the gradual development of what he believes was to be the most disasterous events of the most record breaking war that could ever rage.

According to his reckoning it was about a little after twelve oclock when the stones in the center of the big dam began to sink because of the undermining caused by the three big explosions and within another minute a gap of four hundred feet was suddenly made in the lower section of the wall face, through which the water poured like a big river breaking loose from its bounds. In another minute the masonry was to his surprise and horror again blasted at another section as he saw another eruption of smoke, and flashes of flame, the masonry toppled with a thundering noise, took the form of a large arch, sagged,, twisted out of shape, and then suddenly fell in, thewaters rushed dubly fast, and then with a noise that was enough to stun the biggest monster in Fairy tales, the remainder of the wall gave way before the waters pressure and opened like two big doors, and the gre at storage lake was foaming and thundering down the valley of the beautiful Arenburgs Rum carrying all before it.

Diedi and his troopers were se awestruck at the unusual disaster that they unconsciously remained at the same spot untill the lake had fallen so low that it showed bottom close to where he stood. How long the time had elasped he did not know before he recovered sufficient power of observation to notice this, but he did t not think more than sixty minutes had passed. "Hadi said had the Glendelinian engineers been prevented in their wicked work on time the disaster would not have occured. Had it been strongly guarded as all leeves and dikes should be during such a war the probabilites are hundreds of thousands of lives would not have been lost.. We have placed a sufficient guard to protect the dam would not needed to have taken over five to fifteen thousand men with artillery each.

He also said after the flood,

"No construction engineer of known and good standing could possibly have been engaged in the construction of any such dam as this, for conserning dikes and lee leveen it was a very superior piece of work and of a kind wholly warrented by good engineering practises of its day more than fifty years ago, and must have cost nearly $456,000,000 dollars in the masonry alone, not counting the wages.

It was constructed of three sections---

Number One.------Both the, inside and original section were built of earth only with no heart wall and rip rapped only on the slopes, the earth being of a stiehy clayey quality, the best earth for adhesiveness, and the other section was madd made in watered layers, well rammed down as is still shown in the wrecked dam. But the other end was not rammed down at all, the earth was simply dumped in like an ordinary railway filling . Much of the older layers on this Number one old dam still stands while o the other work contiguous to it was carried away.

Number Two.------It has been an acknowledged principal of dam building for many years and the invariable practice to build a central wall either of millions upon millions of tons of cemen cemented gravel or solid masonry, and this was what was constructed opposite the earth wall. There is no dam in this country that lacks this powerful and central wall. Unusual carefulness and much expensive labor is shown in the construction for the middle of the central a wall was nearly six feet higher than the outer or inner wall.

It was more than drowned in the middle by all the rules and practice of the most expert engineering. The third wall was of immense blocks of granite and stone slabs cemented by heated or half melted iron and concrete, as could be seen by the fragments still remaining, and which proves that the Glendelinian mining engineers must have used immense stores of explosives to undermine this. And had the explosions been at the ends the cut of the water would have been gradual and little or no harm would how have even resulted.. And had the dam been cut at once by the powerful explosives when the enemy started blasting the suddenness of the break might have been checked the wall crumbling away at least more slowly and gradually and possibly prolonged so that little harm would havebeen done.

For the mens necessary of feeding crops there has always been allowed a little overflow of the dam the water then be g allowed to rise seven feet above the ordinary level before it would pass over the crest thus giving more to the streams around. And if this spillway at best did not suffice, all the original discharge pipes at the feet of the dam would be simultaneously opened by the power works which operated them and which stood on the shore of the lake. Never were the discharge pipes hardly ever closed excepting a day or two or when rainy weather occured or when the lake rose too high,. There could never had been any leakage through this solidly constructed dam, and neither could any destruction result from it being allowed to run over at the top. The estimates for the original main dam had been called for half rock and earth, but there is no indication of it in the broken dam, something more solid and powerful having been placed therein. The dam was one hundred and seventy two feet high, and thick enough to place twelve railroad tracks on the top. The fact that the dam was such a strongly constructe o constructed one, after so many years of building, and of such expense made it especially a miracle miraculous event that even the most powerful explosives to rip open its big wall and let out the contents with such disasterous results. I don't see how they done, it, and the whole nation is wondering exceedingly what explosives were used...

All was over in less than a half hour. The big flood rushed all over the country when released from its ' PIHO PRISON) 9 (PRISON) swept whole forests of trees, snow, earth, torrents of rocks, countless houses, and immense multidues of human beings before it as if all that was a mere reed, depositing all the wreckage into the very heart of the city of perryville which for a few minutes formed an impassable barrier to the passage of everything even the vast agency of destruction---the flood,-----which however soon overflowed and overwhelmed it and passed on in sterling directions to wreck fresh vengeance in other portions of the city...

One of the most terrible sights of the flood to those who thronged the shore on either side looking out for those whom they may rescue was the immense deep drifts of wreckage I floating on the surface of the flood for all this at times was ablaze on top and most ev of it wa was deposited by the waves of the flood upon the shore at their very feet, where charred timbers of houses and the charred and mangled remains of human beings were bound..The fire in some of the wreckage cast ashore had even then some of its worse vitality left and these scenes was one of the hundreds of terrifying incidents of the Flood that will never be forgotten by the hundreds of thousands of spectators that thronged these flood washed shores.The story will not and cannot be told. The man with the most iron heart could not look at it without a shock to his sensibilities. So tangled and unyielding was some of the burning masses tossed ashore by the flood that even the most powerful explosives had little effect upon it especially when the wet parts became frozen tight and ice laden. One deplorable effect however was to dismember the few parts of human bodies wedged in the mass that the the ruthless flood left whole.

From the western end of the great bridge that was stretched across th river and which the flood had not risen high enough to destroy the view was but a prelude a prelude to the views that were to follow. Looking across the raging flood the first objects the eye caught in the flood swept city was the masses of floating houses and all u surrounded by an immense sea of roaring waters.

It was now the first night of the great floodd flood and then it can be said that darkness and a fierce wind and blinding snow storm and even fire added to the terrors of the situation. Then came flames which even the cold winds and blinding snow of the blizzard could not quence as it was under the wreckage, and this made the disaster all the more fri h frightful. Wreckage floating on the water in some stages was piled high and on top where it was at of reach of the water it was all ablaze.

The wind fanned the flames. The flood even se p swept into a strong forest of trees which though uprooted and floating recieved within their interlocked branches the wreckage of thousands of houses the inmates of but few who had had the chance to make their escape.

And how many of the people were imprisoned in these great jams of floating burning wreckage cannot ever be known as they were not even recovered but the number was estimated at between one hundred thousand and two hundred thousand or more, and borne down further and furtherby the deluge this wreckage would part at times and thus no one was ever red recovered. Some of the floating wreckage would be found passing by within sight of those on shore to piled to a height of thirty or more feet, and flames leaping out from the summit. What ever caused it was impossible to say. It could not be blamed by the fires at Schleedertown caused by wrecked buildings razed by the concussions of the explosions because perryville was the first hit by the deluge but nevertheless whatever set fire to that part of the series of floating wreckage jams above water it nevertheless made the scenes then witnessed by the frantic people on shore beyond any des description whatever..

There was never nothing like it. It was a horror beyond comparison. Shrieks and prayers and screams from the unhappy beings imprisoned in the floating masses of debris from the wrecked hom s pierced the air, but little could not done by those on shore for no one would dare the suicidal attempt to even reach a wreckage floe by a boat because of the exceedingly dangerous current of the flood.

But there were countless unknown numbers of men women and even little children, held down on the upper layers of the floating jams and were compelled to watch with indescribable agony and terror the flames creeping c slowly tward them untill they were burned to death, and even those who were not burned quickly enough were slowly either slowly roasted or e en frozen to death.

Finally one of these horrible wreckage floes reached within close distance of the shore, and the spectators could hear many who were only held fast in the floating wreck by an arm or a leg begging pitiously that the imprisoned limb be cut off.Some succeeded in getting loose with mangled limbs only to freeze to death or be drowned in the waters. Those on shore strove like demons to save the unfortunates from the flames and though they succeeded in saving a few the wreckage finallh finally floated off to deeper waters again, and after hundreds were burned to death before their eyes, the wreckage was suddenly torn apart by the strong current and the victims were hurled into the icy wa ers and drowned.

Meanwhile perryville had been literally wiped from the face of the earth, three quarters or more being being swept entirely away, and all the little towns and villiages around the city was a thing of the past...The little villiage of Jackson with a pu population of less than two thousand had nothing left of it but one little wooden house which was not reached by the high waters because it was on too high a piece of ground even though it was surrounded by the flood, and only its occupants escaped though they lived in terror for as long as the flood lasted. Tonawala was Tonawala was gone and North Bend swept away. Hundreds of thousands of people were drowned in their homes, or swept away in their de dwellings, and met death in the debris that was whirled madly about on the surface of the flood, countless thousands may have have been burned, and thousands who sought safty on floating driftwood were overwhelmed by the inundation washed to death against obstructions or frozen to death as it was below z zero . The instances of great heroism and self sacrifice were never excelled perhaps not equalled in even the dreadful Galveston horror of 1900. Men rather than save themselves alone died nobly with their families, and mothers willingly gave up their lives rather than abandon their children or friends children.

Indeed as said before only a few hours had elasped from the time of the breakin of the dam of the lakese when the waters had rushed down upon the whole city engulfing every one almost before they realised a flood had come. Most of the scoffers then realised their folly for now they saw that the Glendeliniane were wicked enough to do anything. Because of the wicked Glendeliniana the dam had been blown up and the immense body of water which had rested in a basin nearly as large as lake Michigan in America was let loose to begin its worse kind of destruction.

The towering wall of water swooped down upon the city of Sperryville with a force that carried all before it, the city was literally wiped off the map and every thing went before it and had the flood been able to pass the large mass of wreckage a good portion of the city might have been saved and nothing of such a sort would have occured.

Emperor Vivien himself gained the first indication of the flood in this fashion and this is what he said in a counsil to his generals when trying to find a way to fix the blame of the flood on the enemy as well as the neglect of some of the scouting parties.-

" It was about twelve thirty in the afternoon five days ago, November the 13th on Wednesday when I tried to telegraph something to the Mayor of the city of Sperryville some order that I wished immediately carried out. The operator of Sperryville, was was cheerfully ticking away the answer to me, and she surprised me by saying she was wiring from the second floor and that the water was was gaining steady. I did not know what she said, or understood her words and said "

" What water? Is the pipe bursted in your room.?"

" No" she answered to my consternation. " The whole city is flooded. I am frightened and ma many of the houses around here are flooded even up to the first floor windows."

I believe this was evidently before the dam was bursted, for I said something to her to encourage her, and yet she was talking back to me as only a cheerful girl operator can when suddenly my skilled ears caught a sound on the wire made by no human hands. At two oclock generals the girl was there at her duty, and five minutes later wemight as well have asked the very grave to talk to us. I believe the fires wires had either grounded or the house had been swept away by the flood, no one knows which now. The next day when my army awoke from the nights rest and prepared for the advance which I planned I found to my surprise surprise a sea of water before us where before there had been dry lands and beautiful farms. The water was full of wreckage and floating houses, and my soldiers picked up thousands of people who had been drowned. We too were marooned by the flood for five days though our camps were never reached. "

Indeed general Vivians army had been about half way surrounded by the flood but it remained with the purpose to do all the rescue work possible. Colonel Anton Adrotia saw several men women and children floating down on the flood half frozen with the upper part of their clothing covered with ice and though he faced the same danger as they he called a squad of men to him, and they plunged into the raging torrent and after desperate work brought the men women and children half frozen and dead to the shore,. They were then stripped of their clothing and snow was rubbed desperately on their bodies untill they were revived and then other care was taken of them.

While this was going on other soldiers thousands of which thronged the shore of the flood saw the upper story of a big wooden house float by, on which floated two women, five little girls, two boys and two nuns and one priest. The ol soldiers plunged in after them and after most difficult work in which two of the soldiers were injured and had to be rescued themselves succeeded in saving these also.

Elsewhere soldiers managed to save three hundred people who were taken care of immediately. At Hollyquarters six men, fourteen women, and nearly fifty children were seen floating down on ice covered drift and wreckage. The masses of debris commenced to part and by desperate efforts the men succeeded in getting the children on a big floating tree, which just then washed in close to the shore. A soldier aided by others yelled at to them to keep up their courage that they would do their best to bring them saftly to shore. Then a long rope was thrown out the soldiers advising each one to grab the rope as it was enrolled, and then the soldiers would pull them all ashore at once. This was obeyed and about fourty to fifty soldiers began pulling on the rope and had them just about half way across when a floating house struck the rope. The rope was cut in two and in a second the horrified soldiers saw al all of those whom they tried to save plunged into the seething waters, being carried to their d a deathes deaths.

Elsewhere all along the shore of the flood as far as the news of the Wednesdays disaster was spread people from towns and villiages everywhere not hit by the inundation thronged the shore despite bad weather and the severe cold, arriving anxiously and like fiends to rescue as many of the victims as possible, exposing themselves to all kinds of perils. Most people probably during a flood would be there just for curiousity too besides for rescue but not these. The flood was a horror for them and their only one desire was to save the victims if possi ble possible.

Charles Mac-parlenia of the city of Glendalerburg distinguished himself by his bravery. He was a messenger on the Aronburgs Limited which was to pass this point at this time but which stalled by the big flood had to turn back at Germman hollow.

As the long train passed a point where the water was full of struggling persons, a woman and two children floated in near the shore. The train was stopped, and Mac-parrenia undressed, jumped into the cold water despite a zero weather, and in two trips saved both mother, father and the children. The very men passengers of the train mostly soldiers and private citizens did their best to rescue the other v victim victims in the water but succeeded only in rescuing three out of hundreds as they could not be reached. The Famious Aronburg Limited pulled in at Big Girl Knool at 9:30 9 - 30 oclock in the evening of Thursday November the 14th sixteen hours late and trainmen said or were notified by the train president that further progress south of Big Girl Knool was utterly impossible. The greatest excitement prevailed at this place, and thousands of citizens from Big Girl Knool had left the city on boats and the like to get to the shore of the flood and help the others there in their desperate effort to save the poor unfortunates that were being hurled to eternit eternity on the rushing torrent. The tidal wave of the flood struck Big Girl Knool just after dark and in five minutes the Aronburgs Sun River rose from sixteen to one hundred and fourty feet, and the waters spread all over the country around Big Girl Knool and people in the city went boating for victims that were being carried into their very srette streets and to head off wreckage from their basements.
All men citizens of Big Girl Knool that could immediately left the city to go to rescue work, and reaching the main flood houses began floating down and clinging to the ice covered debris and half frozen themselves were men w women and children shrieking piteously for aid. A large number of the citizens at once gathered on all bridges and places of advantage not injured by the flood and they were reinforced by those from Big Girl Knool. Many of the men and even women who came also had ropes and these were thrown down into the boiling waters as many of the persons drifted by and frantic almost insane efforts were made to rescue as many of the poor victims as they could. For an hour and three quarters all efforts were absolutely of noavail.

But at last when the rescuers were about giving up all hope a little twelve year ol old girl with her smaller brother clutched tight in her arms who was astride of a ice covered shingle roof managed to catch hold of one of the ropes. She caught it under her left arm and holding onto her brother was lifted up and managed to keep hold and was successfully pulled on the bridge amid the cheers of the onlookers.

The little girls name was Angeline Nelsen and her rescuer was a Aldermen of the city of Big Girl Knool named Antonio Germia. The little girl was taken to Rome and cared for in a home for children. Her story of the frightful calamity is as follows;

I and my brother are orphans. We were in a big orphan asylum in Sperryville, and shortly after twelve oclock after we all had said our Grance after meals and started to leave the big dining room there was a terrible noise of roaring waters and crashing of wreckage, and a tumultious screaming of people and other sounds. We looked out the window and saw crowds of persons running fast in all directions, some climbing from one roof to another, and far off a big green something moving toward us like the wind. A part of it seemed to turn over and became as a white cloud cloud with parts shooting high in the air. The Matron of the asylum told us not to mind as the flood would never rise very high. But soon we saw many houses being swept away the noise was like a tornado striking the city, and then we all became panic stricken and many of us ran to the floors above but how many got caught and drowned I know not . The house was three stories a big wooden one and we were at last forced to the top one. In my fright I jumped on a big trunk. The water then poured into that room too and kept rising and the trunk was soon afloat, and was gradually lifted up.

Then the air in the room grew cold, and I had a sensation that told me the house was moving like a swift boat. Still the trunk kept rising and pressed me hard against the ceiling.

At last I managed to push off the plaster and a section of the roof gave way. Then suddenly I found myself on the roof, a flat one and was carried as swiftly down on the flood as if I had been on a very fast steamer. It was so snowing so hard outside you could not see a hundred feet ahead of you, and the zero cold wind was blowing a hurricane and it often almost blew me off the roof. After a short while when the storm grew worse the roof commenced to part and I was afraid I was surely goi going to be drowned but just then another house with a smalting roof rammed mine and hung on long enough to allow me time to crawl on it without gettingmyself wet and it floated down untill nearly dead with cold and covered with snow I was saved. Now I managed to save my brother through it all I knew not but I knew that as I ran I grabbed him and then we were together on that roof. After I was freed from the water swept house I did not see the rest of the children survive. The Matron of the Home was on a tree but she too must have been drowned or frozen to death as the waters were rising terribly fast and it was awfully cold. The scenes around me was horrible. Thousands of live bodies struggling in the water, and even corpses and jams of wreckage were floating down as far within sight e as the blinding snow would allow us to see all floating down with me and away from me.

I would hear many of these persons shriek and then they would disappear.

All along the shore were immense crowds of people who were trying to save us, but they couldde nothing and only a few were caught.. We even floated past the christian camp and soldiers tried to get us but failed."

Indeed this little girls story would be but one incident and shows what happened to more than one orphan asylum and all its inmates. According to this story then God only would have known what had happened to the many thousands who were in the path of the rushing waters and who could not be rescued by the crowds on shore.The flood by the 15th friday had become so extensive that all communication by rail and wire had been utterly cut off and it was impossible to get anything in the way of news, even by meagre details.

Emperor Vivian himself and even his fair daughters, Violet, and her sisters, witnessed the unparralleled unparalled horror which occured at the long bridge which crossed the widened Aronburgs run at this point and which was too high above the water to be injured with the flood and which was crowded with citizens and soldiers combined all bent upon rescueing people who floated by. Violet and her sisters were right in th the middle of the bi bridge with their father, and saw a young man, six women and four children coming down the river on a large section of snow covered flooring. From far off on the shore a long rope was quickly thrown to them but this theythad failed to catch. When nearing the long bridge Violet and her sisters noticed the man point tward the children and women first, who it is supposed were his wife mother and sisters, and daughters. He was seen to instruct the women and children how to catch the rope which being held by men of course was being lowered from the bridge by Violet herself. Down came the raft with a rush. The brave man stood with his arms around his mother and wife. As they swept under the bridge he reached up and seized the rope telling his wife to hold on to him while he held with his mother with the one arm. This was obeyed but the rope broke and the two fell back on the raft. Seeing that they could not be rescued here some one on the other side with a rope was notified but too late. The current washed the frail craft in tward the bank and the young man was able tosize hold of the branch of a large tree. He held on wit with his hands and rested his feet on a pile of driftwood. A piece of floating roof struck the drift sweeping it away. The young man hung with his body submerged in the water, tortured by wind and blinding snow which shook the tree fiercely.

The young man had before this r placed the others in the tree and the wind forced another bigammount of drift which soon collected and hewas enabled to get another secure footing. The fury of the wind however increased howling like a cyclone and two floating houses came together with a resounding crash smashing each other and a portion of this wreckage floated swiftly down stream striking the tree with its occupants and washing it away. All were thrown into the water and were drowned before the scores of thousands of horrified spectators on both shores of the flood and on the bridge. Violet and her sisters hid the sight from their eyes by covering their faces with ther their hands.

Alittle later a woman with one child was seen to pass under the same bridge clinging to the roof of a coal house.The Vivian Girls managed themselves to lower a rope to her but the woman shook her head and refused to desert her child. Yet it was rumored that both were saved by the soldiers further down, a few miles below the big bridge.. A later report said the soldiers succeeded in rescueing quite a number of people from the flood, women and children.One man succeeded in getting out of the water unaided, and all these were kindly taken care of by the soldiers in the camp.

Sixteen little girls who by the appearance of their clothing were from an orphan asylum passed under the bridge just before dark. One of them was kneeling on a part of a large door and begged them to save her. Every effort was made to rescue them as and as good luck would have it they were.Yet the piteous appearance of these little orphans brought tears to the eyes of many.Nearly all long tnight long as stormy and cold as it was the soldiers stood about the bridge or on it, the torrent rushing past with a loud roar incessantly carrying with it, whole houses parts of houses, furniture, large drifts and trees and human beings . But the flood had evidently increased in its force up the valley for those on the bridge noticed it was twice deeper than before.No more living persons were being carried past, they were onpy on only cp corpses. Many of the soldierd used lantrens and remained along the bunks of theflood and on the bridge untill by day break it rose so nigh as to drive them further back and all the other others off the bridge a part of which was also soon swept away.

When this great overwhelming flood swept through all the streets of Perry ville like the waves did at Lisbon the people further in the town who had any chance to escape ran hither and thiter in every direction, many making for the highest parts of the houses and on roof tops, and saw with unspeakable horror a cront of foaming waters as high as the highest house tops was roaring down upon them from two sides and down from and through the Aronburg's run, and all strove madly to get out of its way but what good did it do. Many foolishly in panic and terror and mad with fright dived into cellars and basements of the houses or took refuge on house tops and telephone and telegraph poles and also on high trees though this surely was certain death. Others got up on the roofs of their houses and tried to clamber over the adjoining roofs to places of safty but the flood did not give them a minutes time. The majority on the out kirts of the city made for the hills which girt the city like mountenous seas but of the people who tried to flee to the hills the waters caught them all its its rushing torrents. Hundreds clung to big trees and roots and pieces of debris which had temporialy lodged near the bare banks but were swept away. No one hardly escaped and those that did manage to save them selves done it my miracles. And yet these people either fro e froze to death while looking for shelter on the hillsides, or they managed to find farm houses which sheltered them. There was a great fear of going back to the vinicity of the terrible flood. And even the people whose houses the waters did at sweep away began to think of Perryville as a city buried n beneath a big sea.

When most of those rescued were brought to the christian lines,, on the day after the disaster had receded a good deal(five days after) they had to put in in put up in tents, old army huts, sheds, barns and country houses. Most of them had to sleep without any covering on them, and were almost half frozen in their wet clothes, and the soldiers had to supply them with their own rations. The women and childrenare housed as far as possible by the army in as many tents as could be spare spared and some idea of the extent of the wreck of the city of Perryville may be gathered from the fact(according to this story only that of a city they might have had as many buildings as Chicago and which may have covered as much ground had only three hundred and sixteen buildings wholly uninjured and of others left standing about 10,000 to these were too badly wrecked to afford habatation...

The survivors,(those who had been rescued) were dazed, many were insane because of what had happened. Many went about helpless through the company streets in the bitter below zero Wather weather making vague inquiries about their friends and relatives and hardly feeling the desire to eat anything.

To make matters more unusual for the description of the flooddafled flood be'll tell something about the many fatal wreckage locks. as they can afterward be called(whether they like to be or not) and which caused such unspeakable horrors horrors which would terrify the supernatural beings themselves to itness witnesss and which was described by Jennie Vivian herself as she and her sisters saw one float in close to the shore, and where soldiers by the hundreds worked madly like insane demons to rescue those still alive;;

" We Princesses with our Father and thousands of soldiers were on a long bridge which crossed the Aronburgs run below "Perryville and whose resistance to the full force of the torrent which reached its height on Sunday the 17th was the matter of no so much talk among among the whole army, was a noble flu four track structure of steel wood and iron, one hundred feet wide on top, one hundred and thirty three feet high above the river, and condi consisting of steel skew spans of six hundred and fifty six each. It still remained wholly uninjured, and yet we believe it remained so because of the accident of its height and edition, and not only to its strength, although it is of great solidity. But the torrent did not rise high enough to do any damage to the bridge, and had it rose above it s we believe it would have swept it away as if it had been built of card board leaving no track behind, but fortunately for usthe flood remained even at its heightway below the level of the upper spans of the bridge, and therefore we and the soldiers had been on it the first day, though we did not go on u during the remainder of the flood as we were afraid to take any chances.

During the late afternoon of the 13th on a Wednesday at about 2.30 2:30 to see a large mass of wreckage coming in tward the shore about one third the width of the roaring flood it being as we observed one inextricable mass, and moving tward the shore with the speed of the flood with the force of tens of thousands of tons and moving forward also at nearly sixty miles an hour, driving the soldiers back because of a fear of the resulting crash when it should ground.

We quickly managed to leave the bridge and with many o soldiers following us ran down to the scene and were within close view of the debris. We were surprised to note as it came in nearer that its spoils consisted of all the trees the flood had touched in its whole course so far, with trifling exceptions, all being the most larges of trees as if a big forest had been torn up(they being firs and pines) all of which we noticed were stripped of their needles and bark and small limbs almost at once by the force of the waters, and all the houses from some tyickly settled town from which we knew not where, hald half the human beings, and all the animals we can think of in a city, man, hundreds of miles of telegraph wiring, mingled with strong poles, many miles of track and track material, rails and all, many locomotives, railway cras and those of freight, pig iron, stones, earth grave, big steam boilers, steam engines belonging to factories, all kinds of heavy machinery, and other spoils of some large town.

All this which had been accumulated into one inextricable mass of materials and which were moving tward us was on fire in the interior where the flood had not made it wet or where the swirling snow of the blizzard did not penetrate.We could see that hundreds if not thousands of human beings dead or alive or frozen had been caught in it, and as we looked a closer we saw that many were caught by the lower par part of the body only. We cannot dare to describe the go groans and cries and screams which came from that vast holocaust for nearly the whole night as it remained ground-ed near shore, it being something almost unbearable to listen to, yet which could not be escaped as we watched and directed the hundreds of soldiers who worked madly insanely in their efforts to rescue those still living. Il attempts were made and though many were saved, hundred undoube undoubtedly suffered a slow death by fire yet we girls cannot dought doubt that the vast ma,ority of the men women and chilc children in that fearful jam which covered fully thirty or more acres were already dead when the fire began though it was fiercely afire when it floated down toard us.

This wreckage was floating down toard joan city and Schloedertown which we heard was also flooded and fina, finally disengaging from shore it broke away and floated toard the bridge untill it got stuck there.

There is no one living who can ever know the real horrors of this disaster unless they saw the burning people and debris which lodged against the spans of the steel bridge as we Princesses did and which we will never forget in our lives.

t would take them to witness the horrors of the scene to fully realize the nature of the awful affair. As soon as possible after it smashed against the spans of the bridge and remained there we again hastened to the end of the bridge where it stuc stuck.

More people were struggling in those blazing ruins than we could count, and imploring and shrieking for aid, and begging the soldiers to shoot or release them. Frantic soldiers by hundreds stood at the end of that fiery furnace that was slowly heating like live coals and incinerating human beings before our very eyes. Every soldier was as anxious to save these poor victims as we would have been to save our very father and mother had they been there, and raved and cursed, and prayed, and heaped imprecat ions upon the enemy untill the air shook with the noise. There was a military system an organized effort to release these pent up persons, and shrieking time and again we would command;

" Go to that place, go get that little girl out, for God's sake get her out" referring to some little child we wanted to see saved. Under the circumstances it was necessary to secure organized organization, and seeing that several Landelinian prisoners refused to join in the work of re rescue when ordered at another point to be attacked by the rescuers, the soldiers advanced upon them yelling like demons, threatening to bayonet or threw them into the wide sea of raging waters. Scared almost to death by the fury of the Abbieannians they finally obeyed.

The soldiers were making every desperate effort to save every person that could be saved and we girls have the satisfaction of knowing that at least fully two hundred were saved from cremation before the big raft floated away again to the middle of the stream and under and past the main under span of the long bridge.

We watched as the men attempted to rescue the little girl I first mentioned. They attempted frantically to extricate her, and succeeded in releasing every limb but her left arm. For three hours they labored, and every moment the fury of the wind and snow storm hindered their progress while the singing under fire kept coming nearer and nearer. I was on the point several times of ordering the soldiers to chop her arm off for it would have been much better to save her life, poor litk little kid even at that less than have her burn to death right before our eyes.

Fortunately God must have heard our prayers for this was not necessary and just before the wreckage started away, from the bridge she was released. "

The flood and fire claimed among its victims not only the living but the dead. many handsome coffins were found in water tossed wreckage floss in various windrows of charred wreckage. In i inside could be found bodies of women men or children even to mere babies but so scorched about their head and faces or elsewhere as to be beyond identification.

The believe is that the flood may haveo swept everything from the graveyards of the cities and towns and most of the floating debris on top even in spite of the blizzard being partly consumed by fire which also destroyed partly these wooden coffins. As the bodies never were reclaimed they had to be buried u in the unknown fields. Sperryville proper is in a large basin formed by the junction of the Aronburg Run, and the almost equally large Sunbeam Creek flowing into the now big flood from the south just ten miles below Big Girl Knool. As many bridges crossing the latter stream was hermetically sealed by the tons and tons of r wreckage hurled against them by the flood and the adjacent embankment formed a second dam about fifty or more feet high, Sperryville serving as a bed of a reservoir which the reader should judge may have been nearly large enough to hold the entire contents of the big lake above, despite the fact that it was covered at the outbreak by two feet and a half of snow.

One big offshoot of the main torrent was deflected southward by the Aronburg Run river and went tearing through and over the dikes and heading on toard Schloederto Schloedertown and t aring through the heart of the more southerly part of the city of Sperryville, and still another section of the flood was split off from from the main torrent further down, but in the main the direct force of the torrent did not strike the southern part of the city. It first struck against that immense walled up jam of wreckage on the north side of the city, and thus lost most of its fierce energy flowing thence southward in a heavy heavy rushing sea and spreading fiercely all over the country w tossing houses all about in the most fantic fantastic way. About half the loss of life was in Sperryville for all Sperryville speedily became an immense lake fourty or more feet deep, and stayed so for nearly three days and nights, and it was here and not in the direct path of the flood that all rescue of people from roofs and floating timbers was able to be accomplished, as not h nothing of the kind could be possible in the main flood itself.

Likewise after the break in the embankment of the big bridge mentioned by the Vivian girls had occured, the flood onthe third day began to recede from Sperry ville and the two other big flooded cities, it was in these districts whieftly that people were carried off down stream on l floating wreckage, and where on Sunday the flood rose the deepest at Schloedervitown while it was receding from Sperryville. All that came within direct path of the flood was fast within the jams of floating wreckage.

The existance of this temo temporary sperryville reservoir naturally broke the continuety of the flood discharge, and transformed it into something not greatly different from an ordinary but swiftly moving inland sea, and which created such long drawn out horrors which stated in proceeding chapters occured in Schloedertown and other places. Schloedertown j just fifteen miles or more below that long bridge mentioned by the Vivian girls was just as badly wrecked as Sperryville but in not so quick a time, with a greater loss of lives, but inthe main from joan city and Schloedertown tow down the flood ceased to be so very destructive!

Itlook out every bridge it came to except the long one, for one hundred and fifty miles, man made many stream stream s become seas and washed away tracks of thirteen railroad lines, and millions of cars freight and passenger, and many expensive heavy locomotives, and did other unusual damage, but the Sperryville "Reservoir saved hundreds of thousands of lives belowe blow it by equalizing equalizing the flow, and preventing Big Girl Knool city from being flooded as ex-ceedingly bad as was expected.

Hunson Slater who was a conductor in charge of one of the Pullman cars of the leading Aronburg Limited train, that isthe first section which was caught in the flood at Sperryville told a thrilling story of his experience.

His train with two others had stopped at different points of the upr Sperryville country station opple opposite a big round house large enough to hold about nearly two hundred engines. He saw the immense flood of water coming and described it as having an appearance of a long line of highmountains moving toard him with the very speed his own train could run, andemaking a terrible roar ad it as it advanced.

He immediately ran into his car and shouted fo to all his passengers to run for their li ves while beyond the engineer made frantic efforts to back the train to higher ground. One of the passengers connected with government duties at Angelinia Agathia was traveling from Sacremento Abbieannia with his wife and three children aged four, six and eight.. This passenger was engaged in getting his wife and otherchild off the car and the conductor himself grabbed up the two remaining children, and with one under each arm started for the highest ground he could reach i with the roaring wall of water right at his very heels. He managed to run a distance distance of only fourty yards and barely managed to place his two charges on safe ground before the flood swept past him with the noise of a rushing tornado.

Mr Slater declared that he could never tell how many lives were lost on this ill fated train. Every passenger car except the one in the rear which were carried away were crowded with passengers men women and children and quite a number of soldiers, and two Counts, and the President of the state of Angeline Vine and he believed all these had perished. At least about two hundred were drowned. A long freight train was between the first section of the Aronburg Limited and the flood on an adjoining track and the flood carrying the freight train before it hurled it against the passanger train and thus all cars except one disappeared into the flood but the baggage car and the engine were lifted clear out of the water and landed most violently and almost in the fashion of a thrown or kicked football on the other side of the flood.

Maybe some idea can be known of the force and speed of the terrible flood from Mr Slatters statement(providing he was not exaggerating) that all the engines of the round house, and large sections of the round s house itself, beside the big heavy turn table swept furiously past him almost clear out of water as if they were boats their many tons in weight not being sufficient to take them beneath the surface. Even to make things more surprising Mrs Vivian the Empress of Abbieannia who was traveling from Pandora Abbieannia to Angelinia Agathia had a wonderful escape. The couch she was in was caught in the swirl and hurled about six miles below Sperryville clear on dry land bottom side up and though all the passengers were drowned or killed she alone was not even injured although all of her clothing was torn from her person and she was providentially thrown by the angry waters clear of the rushing flood against a bigthrong of anxious frantic people on the opposite shore accidentally knocking a number down. But she was rescued and taken care of.

She was provided with a soldiers uniform and rode into Big Girl Knool on another train thus arrayed.Her sister when the flood started made an attempt to leave the rear car on which she rode, and then fearing to venture out into the flood returned to the inside of the car. When the water subsided slightly the crew rushed to the car expecting to find her dead but fortunately the water had not gone high enough to drown her and she was all right though greatly frightened. However she displayed a rare amount of fore thought inthe face of this dire danger, having tir tied securely around her waist a piece of her clothing on which her name was written in indelible paint. She had fully expected that she would be drowned, and did this in order that her body if found might be identified, and Emperor Hanson notified of his loss.

When the water was still high Conductor Bat later made an attempt to get back to his car from the hills, but after wading up to his arm pits in water, he was forced by the tre treacherious current to return to safer ground..... ...

The last train to which the Sunbeam Creek permitted the use of the tracks of the Mic-Hollester and Pandora railroad between Sacramento and Angelinia Agathia rolled into Big Girl Knool City at Midnight on Sunday the 17th of November.. On account of the flood it had become from the Second section of the Aronb ur Aronburg Limited train to a nondescript train, and the train had never stopped at so many wayside stations before in its aristocratic life, and which had been cut off the main Aronburg Limited at Pandora junction to be taken back to Sacramento Abbieannia.

The rest of the train had started from Evangeline St Clare at about Two o'clock not for further transportation as that was impossible because of the flood but to take to shelter as many of the refugees of the flood as could be picked up at these way side stations. The Vivian Girls took the chances to ride to Big Girl Knool on this train and by them it had been changed from the Aronburg Limited to the Sperryville bathtub.

Indeed no trains name ever fitted it better for it had swam without accident through seventy seven miles of water on its slow way, watering water differning in depth above the tracks from six inches to four feet. The seventy seven miles of water covered the track between Chamberlane and Big Girl Knool. Further on the tracks had be been entirely washed away. When the war correspondent train touched with the morning dailies and to some extent the men who make them, dashed drippl drippingly into Big Girl Knool at half past eight in the morning of Monday the 18th it had only encountered sino not a river, but the " Atlantic Ocean in Calverinia"

The passengers of this latter train stated that for some reason or other there was a great increase in the Sunbeam Creeks overflow, and that for some reason or other the water was thick with wreckage, house tops and more bodies of drowned people than ever seen in a battlefield.Yet this was the first reports of the increased flood whichhad reached beleagured Big Girl Knool during the day, and the express started out from Chamberlane with two immense engines, 11,101 and 12,905 towing it and a fair chance of reaching Angelinia Agathia on time in spite of the water car over the tracks.

This was a time when the Vivian Girls on board the train observed the flood close while on a swimming train.. a train which as it seemed might as well have tried to cross the Atlantic Ocean.The original four miles and three quarters of overflow--- caused by the back waters of the Evangeline St Clare River---- as passed without any unusual incident though the passengers saw wreckage and countless bodies floating past them. The water was up to the bottom steps of the car platforms and the go pilot of engineer of the leading 'Puffer' threw to each side a fine billow of yellow water sending an immense swell like that of a river streamer passing Angelinia Agathia in an among the floating out houses of big Girl Knool and submerged slag heaps of the surburbs of the city and bringing cheers from scores of the mends who watched the trains slow ad vadvance from their second story windows and forget the condition of their first floor furniture and other property in their excitement of watching theamphibious prowess of the Aronburg Limited.

" We have seen the worse of this flood so far" said Violet to a couple of excited women passengers as the last three fourths of a mile of billions was thrown from the pilo pilot of the leading engine..

" Yes we have seen the worse of it" answered a conductor who had overheard it her" but I believe the train will have to wait here a little while, for the fires are almost gone lo out.

So 11,101 and 12,905 stood puffing and panting for a long while on the high track while the cold winds made coating of ice on the lower portions of the coaches and the baffled river rolled its burden of driftwood and other wreckage wreckage sullenly southward on their right and left.The dry ground lasted just about long enough to give the long train a quick impetus for another header into the Overflow of the Sunbeam Creek, and it was into the Sunbeam Creek that the header seemed to be taken this time.It was no longer a question of an overflow of a creek in a long railroad cut for the f billows of the leading engine swept not inamong overturned out houses and surbmerged fro ice covered slag heaps but on the broad coffee colored bosom of the river to be broken into a hundred thousand chop waves among the cars churning driftwood. The people in the second story windows forgot to cheer, and the people in the coaches forgot to k joke especially on the the same part, and tofret onthe women while even Violet Violet and her sist while Violet and her sisters were nervious and kept their eyes on the water and the movement of the train. It was a curious and ticklish sitiat situation. The train was running slowly very slowly. The wheels were out of sight, and the rushing waters was swirling among the trucks and lapping at the already ice coated platforms. The only sign of land locomotion about the Aronburg Limited was an audible one, a watery pounding and rumbling of the wheels on the hidden tracks.

The Aronburg Limited looked like a long broad red river serpent wriggling on its belly down along the green watery flood. Gradually there was a simultaneous though not concerted movement among the passengers including Violet and her sisters. They began crowding to windows of the ocare coaches or platforms and looking anxiously toard the land side. Suddenly a breakman breakman broke the queer silence in a voice which had just the least crescendo of excitement in it.

" If you people don't keep quiet and remain in your seats we can't do anything to bring the train through" he shouted.

The demand was a little absurd, the direction of a land coxwain to " trim ship- Still it had its uses for it relieved the tension which everybody felt and no one acknowledged. The passengers retired from the platforms and returned to their seats. joking began again among the men and fretting among the women and crying among the frightened children. Anyhow there had not been much fun looking toard the landside for what had appeared to be a recession of the waters when looked at from the train platform or windows was merely a new swelling of the stream from the overflow of another river which parallels the railroad for many mil s at that point.

All at once the train which had been moving more slowly for each of a good fourty minutes, stopped short. It seemed as if 11,101's sharp nose had scented danger like a sensitive horse, and panting refused to go further. Then the engine crews were seen by the passengers to leap from their cabs tigh deep in water and begin hauling at some submarine squeam obstacle.

" Driftwood" said the same breakman who had commanded quiet. " The water is a perfect lumber boom for wreckage."

So it was. A train stopped by driftwood..it was floating all about and threatened to impede the progress of the Aronburg Limited train altogether. Fence rails from farm far up country farms, planks from dismantled houses and signal stations; platforms all along the line, railroad ties innumerable, brush branches and even small trunks of trees floated against the wheels with disjected stacks of green wheat and other ruined crops upon the ever rising flood of the river which received the waters from the Aronburg Run flood.There had been some dry land in sight just beyond Forster station but as sure as guns were iron and floods were floods the land was fast disappearing. The inhabatants of the drowned lands, who appeared to take the drowning easily, though no such drowning had been known to them in more than a century had been in large numbers despite the severe cold weather keeping company of the train and ice floes for the last six miles in skiffs and punts and other small boats. They rowed close to the cars and towed away the larger drift. They were entirely on life saving service but nevertheless also there was a bit of wreckage in their composition. They towed every wreckage that could be used over into their front yards, and anchored them closely and tightly to their ice covered windo blinds.

Finally the straining backs of the engine crews gave one mighty tug at the hidden obstacle. A huge platform plank floated loose from 11,101 and 12,905 shrieked triumph with her whistles.The wheels began to churn the brown water with yellowish white and 11,101, and 12,905 finally after half a day of traveling in the flood ran up on dry ground like the eagle in the sun to whom the Irish poet compared the Irish troops at Fontenoy.

And as they did it so the clatter of a soldiers train was heard from the south, and a loud sound of cheering. A single engine drawing three crowded suburban carsish shot around what you would call it a bend and run with great speed into the torrent out of which section number two of the Aronburg Limited had just emerged.

" They'll never get throughthe floods." was the unanimous comment of the Vivian girls, and their verdict seemed to be confirmed officially by the very breakman who had been excited.. He stood in the door of the car and shouted;

" This train will be requested by Emperor Vivian by wireless to stop at all small wayside stations between Chamberlane and Big Girl Knool to take in as many refugees as can be encountered. They are to be transported to Angelinia Agathia to night."

A lone Angelinian scout who was above the dunfer line on the left bluff above the city of Sperryville, and who saw the first rush of the death wave, said to Emperor Vivian that he at first believed it was proceeded or preceded by a peculiar phenomena which he at first thought was a volcanic eruption started right from the surface of the earth near the walls of the big dam....He declared that a few minutes before the walled sea of water had startedfrom the f dam there was a tremendous eruption of earth and smoke in the lower part of the wall. He said he sawthe fragments of the wall rise high in the air, there was an awful flash of fire and the next moment saw two lines of flame down through the big white stone wall of the dam in different directions followed by greater eruptions which shook the ground and affected his ear drums with the din; and the wall was apparently torn to pieces torn to pieces and collasped. The next minute with a roar like thunder the water came pouring out and he said he remembered nothing further as the noise of the explosions rendered him in a daze.That there really were more than one explosion that wrecked the dam, even the cause of the fires in the floating wreckage and of the burning of Schloedertown is explained. Light frame buildings in Schloedertown saved in from the concussion of the distant explosion and set on fire by heated stove s stoves were picked up bodily while all aflame and tossed on top of the water and formed into wreckage drifts without the fire being extinguished.

A man was rescued alive from the attic of a house into which the torrent hurled her when she was swept from her wrecked convent. The house had floated from what was formerly Lande street "erryville n to the very suburbs of ig Girl Knool. The sister said her experiences had been terrible. She said she saw unknown thousands of men women and children floating down the torrent to meet their death in the fury of flood and blizzard and cold wave many praying, while others had actually become raving maniacs.

One of the queerest sights in the center of Gerryville in the houses left standing after the flood receded and from over was a four story brick residence, standing with one wall the others having disappeared completely, leaving the floors supported only by the partitions. In one of the upper rooms the searches searchers could see a mantle with a lambrequin on it and a wall clock stopped at about ten minutes and a half after twelve o'clock. In front of the clock was a statue of the Sacred Heart of Jesus; though from the marks on the wall paper the water had been over all these things.In the upper part of the town where all the buildings had remained remained and where the water went into the valley with more diminished force, many strange scenes could be observed: There many wooden houses were to be seen which were toppled over in various shapes and postures and left ripped open where they lay with all their contents gone. One of them was turned completely over and stood with its r roof stuck deep in the soil and its base in the air, and with its insides gutted.Out of this house, six women; and five men and ten children escaped safely and were but little hurt, although they were stood on their heads in the girl and then sucked at by the rush of water.

Very surviving house had its own story.. for from every one some one had been rescued from one which floated for fifteen miles a man escaped by chopping a hole in the roof. From another a woman leaped to the shore as it went whirling past and fell twenty two feet or more and escaped with two broken legs; and an arm; and all his teeth knocked out of his mouth.

Mother is said to have come all the way from the very near start of the flood and finally landed on the flats near the outskirts of Galveston still further south than Chamberlains is from Big Girl Knool. While perhaps a woman said the house as it floated past the suburbs of Big Girl Knool was within sight of occupants of higher houses and who threw ropes from second story windows but failed to reach her.

CHAPTER II N.....

A LONG CHAPTER OF THE SCHLOEDER TOWN O RROR OF NOVEMBER 13 1913 INCLUDING OF THE AWFUL FLOOD CAUSED BY THE EXPLOSION, BLOOD

FIRE AND EXPLOSION DISASTER, PERSONAL EXPERIENCES OF SURVIVORS
HORRIBLE BURYING OF THOUSANDS OF DEAD BODIES, AND EMPTY HOUSES, A DANGER OF PESTILENCE THAT SO FAR DESAFING BODIES LAST UNBURIED
CAPTAINS OF SHIPS AND OTHER CRAFT COMPELLED BY SURVIVORS TO TOW DEAD BODIES TO THE DEEPEST PART OF THE MIGHTY RIVERS.

A FRIGHTFUL explosion which occured near Lake Gilenin and which wrecked from the concussion he beautiful cities of Schloedar town and Sperry ville occured on the thirteenth of november in the year f of nineteen twelve early in the mor causing firstly the concussion of the ex plosionsmany thousands of lives to be destroyed by the falling of the wrecked houses on top of them and the destruct ion of a many millions of dolla r worth of property, and bursted the levees of the Nina nee lake whose floods soured through the country like a roaring tidal wave from the sea ravaging all that part of the country of Southwestern Calvertnia, drowning hundreds of thousands of people inil the towns and villages hatwere devastated and inf licting damage throughout the land which cost count less millions to repair and which eih with few exception have no parallel in the fiction history or any other.

When the explosion tore away the levees of the lake which was a broad one th e water poured from the immense openings like the greatest cat aaffalls that anyone can imagine ten times fatter and with greater force than the Niagara ora hundred time worse than of the floods thatensued from the bursting of the Dam at Johnstown, and the pouring torrents of water spreading over miles of country at once lashing its waves into a tremendous fury causing a wall of advancing waters to rise all but mountain height and then it was, that combining their forces the armor cus torrents of water added by swirling swirling tons of wreckage pounced upontheir prey.

Where the flood first struck, in the short space of four hours and a half the entire site of the wrecked cities of Schloeder Townand Sperryville and scores of others were covered by angry waters, while the current raced atthe rate of twenty miles an hour, all the business houses, public buildings, h churches residences charitable institutions and all other structures g gave way before the pressure of the flood waters, and the fierce onslaught of the windrows of wreckage borne down by the floods and the houses which did not crumble together or altogether were so injured in all cases thatthey would have to be torn down when the opportunity came/.

Indeed such nights of hours and days of quick anticipation as the unfortunate survivors were compelled to pass through could make the reader think of the experiences for one night that the people of Galveston passed through during the big hurricane nd flood thatoccured there! In the early afternoon when the torrents of water first bgan to rush into the streets of Schloeder town the people read residing in the lower quarters of the city were compelled to flee in fear and panic from their homes and sought the highestpoint of the city as places of refuge not even having time to take even the s allest articles i of the houses with them. But with a great noise the flood increased and increased until the evening set in and then as though possessed of a strange fiendish vindictiveness, hastened the speed of its rise and spreading fury and poured over the surface of the city, completely sub erging it------covering the most elevated ground to a depth of twenty feet, and the lower portion to thirty and fourty.

The force of the flood was equally collosant if not more fiendish and cruel and tore great buildings and beautiful homes to pieces in an hours to the, scatter scattering the debris far and wide and wide; telegraph and telephone and other wires were thrown down with the fall of the poles; all railway tracks and bridges; the latter connecting the city with the other on the opposite side of the river which ran into the lake--torn up and washed away, and the mighty tangled masses of wires, bricks, sections of houses, floating houses, sidewalks, fences and other things were hurled before the swirling currents; uniting a huge moving raft of All the debris before ev which everything went at its pressure.

A million people------men women and children crowded in terrors for four days and night a afterthe flood started the intense blackness of night added by awful thunderstorms and then cold waves and snow storms, the switching and lapping of the waves, the demoniac howling of the cold wave winds with temperatures ten blo w zero, and the indescribable and awful crashing, tearing and rending as the houses hundreds; hey thousands at a time were wrecked and shattered ever scrambled in their cats, on heaven knows how many frots to dea death in that dreadful calamity, where they huddled wet an forlorn in the top stories of floating houses and d ing instantly. Often do the freindly shelters where whole families had taken refuge would be swept away plunging scores upon scores of help less ones into the swirling icy waters which flowed through every street of the town and many fathers and mothers were compelled to witness the agony of see ing their children drown, with no possibility of rescue whatever, hundreds by thousands lost their wives, and as many wives lost their husbands, and the flood elements and the fury of the November cold waves and blizzards were only merciful when they destroyed an entire family at one////////

All during th ese four frightful days and nigh ts of with every hour and gloomy dawn of the day breaking upon the horror stricken city, the entire population of the city of Schlesdar Town stood face to face with with grim death in all its most horrible shapes, t hey could not hope for anything more than the results of the awful flood and the cold weather and blizzards, and as they realized that with every passing moment many souls were being hurled into eternity in it at all wonderful that after the strain was over and all danger gone, and the flood had gradually subsided, reason among many should finally be unseated and thousands of men women and even children break into the unroaring agony of the insane////

And indeed not one inhabitant of the city of Schlesdar Town old enough to have any realization of the awful situation had any idea either thatthat death was to t be the fate of all before the end of the flood came, and when this long and weary suspense to which added, the frightful exposure to the full fury of the intense cold waves,storms and blizzards and the crushing pans of human souls went last broken by the subsidence of the flood thatmorning was not entirely welcome for the face of the sun was hidden by ugly and morose clouds from which fell at dra dreary intervals blowy and blinding snow flurries.

Any even countless thousands were swe lowed up during the nights of darkness and their bodies were either mangled and cut to pieces by the battering wreckage which had been tossed everywhere and left for the coming sunset to decompose in theslimy ooze deposited by the flood, or forced to follow follow the rushing torrents in their sullen retreatsinto the waters of the bloody rivers/rivers.

Dejection of all kinds and great despondency and even despair at hatred of the Glandelinian soldiery succeeded fright, the majority of all the best hum ness men of the city had suffered such losses thatthey were overcome by apathy, all the homes of the people were inruins total or partial, the streets after the flood were impassable, as the and the dead lay thickly on every side, all tele graph and telephones wit all their wires were down, and as miles and hundreds of miles of railroad tracks had disappeared and al bridges across the streams carried away there was no means of any communication with the outer world to be obtained not even by boat as even all crafts had been washed away or dep demolished/ by the floods. The stra strangest spectacle was then presented of the richest city of that part of Calverinia lying prostrate because of Glandelinian engineers blowing up the levees of the lake the inhabitants of the city hopeless and absol utely helpless, and more cruel will a prey to Glandelinian ghouls vultures, har pies, military thugs and thives and assassins and military outlaws of every sort its ravished people who survived starving and wi with the coming of the summer the danger of the many bodies becoming putrid and breeding pestilence/s

Floods which moved with th e appal speed and force of that which swept Schlesdar Town and Sperry ville and which were a common disaster in the greatest of all were ever known invariably originated because of the wicked designs of some general of a distant Glandelinian army ad the flood was started by the actual bursting of the levees of the big lakes of Calisia. In this particular instance the lake was situated sixty miles south of the city, and north of Sperryville. The advance of the flood at this point varies in breadth from sixty to several hundred miles and at the advancing rise was and at its advancing part was about seventy feet high like a advancing wall of wat water from the earthquake produced tidal wave rushing in from the sea/s.

The flood therefore which originated or which swept these two cities orihi originated at a considerable distance south of Schlesdar town. It first formed two waves of roaring water which as they progressed from the lake finally met at an angle and this caused the whirling motion of th e flood which finally spent its influence elsewhere. It is seldo that a flood originatin in this fashion moved so far over a flat stretch of stretch of land as did this on but it was not however unprecedent.The reasonthis flood reached so far a an Schlesdar Town was that the town is situated on a grad gradual slant of the Indianaipe s landscape and therefore the flood was forced to move twice as fast as it usually does over alevel piece of land.

This flood though it first spread in that direction missed the city of Chamberlane and Glorianna and therefore was deflected to the east. And c add to add to the horror of the flood, terrible snow-storms driven by a sixty mile an hour gale with cold waves prevailed in Calverinia and in all bd of the many districts just north of the course of the big flood, which seemed natural to occur during such disasterous if the very elements itself was takin part of the inhuman Glandelinian enemys ad about the two cities the condition of the land were such that when the flood reached them they had no possible means of escape and hence the dire results.If t h ere had been chance for the flood waters to have further west nlon along its course the force would in all probabilities have passed the two cities giving those places no more than a severe shaking up or just pouring enough waters into the streets to go boating forwhich no one and no harm. In this event the worse effect w. ld in all probability have been flat only over farm lands and lumber woods not far off.

It was an absolute i mpossibility for the best ofall readers or writers to re form an idea of theextent and awful magnitude of the disaster within two weeks of its occurrance. The morning of the day when the dreadful flod had sub sided the streets of bot h cities were found clogged with masses of debris of all sort and thickly inter ingled with bodies, an indeed the surviving people of either Sperryville or Schlesdar T own could not hardly realize for three days what had really happened. In Schlesdar Town fourt y thousand houses had been entirely de olished and even then hardly a single survin surviving building in the city was either fit for habitation or for any other necessary purposes/s

The survivors were apathetic, they could be seen wandering around the wreck ed streets str streets in an aimless sort of way unable to do anything or even make preparations t to repair the great damage done. The day following the great disaster both ruined cit ies were practically inth the hands of the dangerous disguised Glandelinian vandal aries some of them Glandelinian child scouts who not only robbed houses and wreckage but the dead and mutilated the many corpses which they would find lying everywhere, ran thmaking he the business houses and all the residences, and creating a a terrific reign of terror which lasted until christian aries could come up close enough t take possession of the ruined cities and then until the officers inco mand of these aries sent large companies of men to patrull all the streets and ruins of the cities and to shoot to kill every vandal sighted whether he be a man or even a child scout. The generals of these aries who came up all the way from Dorothy Dorothy Gale city ordered out all the Regiments of the main Abilenan tan National National Guards and various associations of large and small business men also supplies men who assisted the soldiers in doint patrol duty inthe two cities and their suburbs.

Yet the depredations of this military lawless elements were of a most brutal and wicked character doing anything an thives to procure what they desired to carry on th e war for their most wicked of all causes. Thousands of unprotected women whether found upon the streets or even intheir hour houses or in hospitals were subjected to unspe unspeakable outrages and assault, and rubbed even of their very clothing and everything the robbers believed could be used for the sake of the wicked Glandelinian cause.

It seemed ev ry hour somewhere the very pedestrians were held up inthe very streets withcut mightor inthe broad daylight and compelled to give up all the valuables in their possession and the Glandelinians only returned to them what they felt sure they could not use for the sake of winning the war.

Even the bodies of the dead, whether men women or children were despoiled of everything and in their haste to secure the valuables the ghouls and Vandals would even cut up the corpses even cutting off fingers and hands to obtain the rings and bracelets and ther jewls jewlery and amputating the ears of women and children to get the earrings t hey were.

The majority of th ese Glandelinin Glandelinian their thieves belonged from the identifications found upon them from many various Glandelinian aries and were reinforced from Glandelinian desperadoes from the main aries, under the Yankeys, Federal, I ner Vriesia and so on we took advantage of the rush t these cities immediately after the flood disaster obtaining free transportationby military boats upon a pretense they were relief parties of christian soldiers going to these two cities for the purpose of working with th th e many relief part ies and the cause assignede for burial of the many dead.Indeed their outs rages became so unusually terribleand the people of the cities been s so terrified inconsequence of their awful depredations and even of the settling of the wreckage suffers at many places that the authorit ies of the city unable to cope with them most of even the officers of the police department having been victims of the flood an appeal had to be made to some near christian army and to their hird est general to send troops and pre procure the preservation of the order needed. General Vivian whose army at the time was said to have been close by was also implored to lend his aid in putting down these droves of lawless exiles and he accordingly sent all the men out of his army which he felt sure he could spare, as who had not failed in their courage inbie battles and other war squabbles.

However there was some considerable in getting the military to Sperryville and Schlesdar Town because of so many il miles of railroad had been washed away and because of the state of existing flood elsewhere an of forest fires,So the arch general being compelled to notify the military mobilization corps at Dorothy Glad city by wireless, but he general had nevertheless had ordered his men be sent on the way at one and wit instructions to promptly shoot all soldiers o matter what uniforms they were found despoilin the dead and raiding ruined houses or seting the wreckage on fire. All of the Vampires were Glandelinians in all kinds o' of disguises all of them being as savage in their treatment of the dead and of their robbin the alive as the most abadoned of the other robbers we read so often about in the newspapers.

It tok the soldiers thus sent six days to get to the nearest of the two stricken cities and when they arrived there they were placed onduty on the following mornin, and before they had been an hour on duty had shot sixty of the disguised Glandelinian thugs who were executed on the spot when found in the act of such horrible robbery. And inevery instance these terrible human harpies were searched before being searched and inthair pockets were found jewelry and many other valuables ad in many cases important papers belonging to police officials and the like were found inthair possession. These were about fifty in number who had been despoilin the ruins of houses and the bodies of the dead found thickly intermingled with the wreckage and with exact promptness the soldiers had put these Gladelinian ghouls ad the like nder arrest and findin the proceeds of their strang robberies inthair possession lined them up in the middle of the street and without the slightest mercy shot every one of them. And in case where the villainous soldiers were ot killed at the first fire the commanding officer administered what we know in the ilitary as the "Coup de Grace".

However none of the Glandelinians thus captured begged for mercy, they were totally defiant and threatened that for every ghoul shot downthat many children would be massacred in revenge.

Whenone of the armies arived from Dorothy Gale city their soldiers took the same severe measures and the result was thatwithin fourty three hours the two cities appeared to be as safe as they had been before the floods. Even the soldiers nd those of the police who survivied arrested every person who acted suspicious and the surviving jails and the cells at police station were soon filled to overflowing. These people were deported as soon as possible and notified that if they dared to return they would be shot without warnin, ed treated as the very ghouls themselves. As Even the very temper of the surviving citizens of the two flood torn cities were such that they would not temporize in any one case with even those who were neither criminal spies or inclind to work.

Therefore every able bodied man in the two cities were immediately impressed for duty in relief and burial parties and wherever even a man or a womenrefused to do the work required she herself was deported, and the man shot. By the third morning after the flood all the men nd others required had been obtain d by co conscription and relief and burial parties were quickly filled to the measure deemed absolutely necessary, and also the work of the disposing of the many bodies of the dead administering to the wants of the wounded and sick and the clearing of the streets from debris was soon proceeding with satisfactorialy results.

The dead lay inthe r frozen waters and wreckage of the streets and vacant places by many hundreds all frozen bodies and it was somewhat fortunate that this did occur in winter for if it had beenhowever the hot sun no doubt doubt would have haven to show its natural effects.Then decomposition would have surely set inand no doubt the stench would have been so unbearable that the survivors would hav have been compelled to flee from the two cities. At first an effort was made to identify the many corpses but it was soon found that such work could not be proceeded wih wi with, as any delay only lost more time and surely would imperil the living and the nature of he city itself. Fears were entertained in regard of winter pestilence because of so many of the inhabants being exposed so long inthe open to the cold as already the people of the city had been taken ill by very severe colds and even deathly colds by scores my hundreds. It was absolutely difficult to obtain enough men to perform the necessary duty of burying so many bloated bodies that were frozen stiff and consequently the surthorities of the city ordered thatthe many dead be loaded on surviving barges, taken to the middle of the river or out to the main waters weighted and thrown into the wters/.

The very ground being wat ersoaked so thatit was i possible to even dig graves or trenches for the reception of the bodies also was ow frozen so deep that even otherwise digging was impossible although in many instances people were said to have buried relatives nd friends in their own yards and the ground surrounding their ruined residences.. Along the shre of the almosttotally emptied lake many hundreds of corpses were buried inthe sands ad grow ground but the ajority of the burials were by water and cremation oreration. By the third day twenty two thousand six hundred and sixty six bodies had been cast into the waters of the big river running past about thirty miles west of the flod, while about five thousand had been interred within the city limits. Precautions however were taken to mark the graves when the ground had dried sufficiently or thawed out sufficiently during some of the fall warm spells the bodies were removed and taken quickly to the various graveyards where after burial suitable memories were erected to mark their last resting places. No attempts were made at identificationafter the third third day, and only lists were simply made of the numbers of the victims.

Great difficulties were experienced in securing the right number of men to transportbodies to the river wharves were the barges and boats lay inreadiness and it was also absolutely an impossibility to get any one to touch the bodies of the waterlogged frozen victims because of their stark frightful appearance and had it not beenthat members of the soldiers volunteered their services the remains of these victims would have remained unburied for a longer time than they were. Finally however patice patience ceased to be a virtue and orders were given all the soldiers within the city to shoot any man who refused to help in clearing up these bodies and therefore the result was that atthe beginning of the fourth day after the big flood there was less delay inthe matter of disposing of so many of the dead...However in spite of the activities of the may burial parties the work of clearing up the streets of so many corpses was an unusually a most tedious one.

The forcast official of the Abbiennian War and other Bureaus at these two ruined cities made the follow following report about November the 23th on the flood to the Abbiennian Government;;;;

The local offices of the War, Weather and News paper bureaus recieved the first messages in regard tothe dreadful flood onthe early morning of November the 1912 thirteenth nineteen twelve at about four oclock in the morning. In the vinicity of the great lake of Gilesia there had been a series of greatexplosions whose very concussions had literally blown out windows of the two cities and wrecked a considerable number ofhouses, butthe flood took some time nevertheless to strike the city of Sperryville which through some mystery recieved the flood first, even though Schloeder powren,t really got the worse ifit. The flood was then moving southwestward over the farmli farming lands wiping out scores of farms and their families and destroying thousands of heads of cattle ad other live stock and sweeping away whole woods of trees and other materials before it, and also evens flooding the rivers till they overflowed. Each hour there after untill the flood struck the two cities, hasty warnin s were signalled by telegraph and phone and wireless by every kind of signal sation at ation giving the real progressive movemens of the gia gigantic flood. At noon the great flood had moved down over all portion of that section of Calverinia covering more than three hundreds of miles of lad engulfing three hundred small villiages nd hamletsand little towns in its path wiping out all their inhabitants ad was and was central off the Lucillia nickson region at about twelve thirty, when the flood beganto ent er the streets of sperry ville and drive the people to the upper storiesof their houses. At two oclock the flood had increased in energy and was still spreading out deeper ad deeper and that was whenthe entire city was in grave danger. The telegraph ad telephones at all offices in the city was busy untill the po poles and wires went doendown and the buildings had been enflooded to the very third floors, many then could not get the use of the telephones on account of the depth of the rushig waters, though earlier in the flood people had come to these offices and in numbers droves inquiring frantic ally about the conditions of the flood ad asking how severe it was going to be and where all the waters came from. At the same time the information had been given to all alike

" The flood is now spreading over the country for hundreds of miles around, the waters are now pouring into the city, and in c and increasing south of us therefore if you reside in low parts of th is city move tothe upper stories or by to escape by boat if such craft is found as it is probable the current will not have disasterous effects just yet."

But the unfortunate people had to pay prepare for the worse was which was to surely come and all the col consoling words that was givenby these offices had no effect upon the people ad when no informdomation could not be given out any frther terror prevailed in every part. Many Many of the local forcast officials and even the observers remained at some of the bigger offices hrough throughout the duration of the flood, although eventhese big buildings were flooded to the third floors and the officials were surrounded without food or warmpth during the cold weather which occured during the height of the flood. One of the forcast officials and his assistant took the chances to go out in the flood by a large row boat to take the depth of the flood at about four o oclock in the afternoon of the third day, and another observer had left after he sent the last telegram which could be gotten off, it being filed at Angelida And Agathia over the telegraph wires about five oclock the fourth day. All of the city was covered by the deeph waters by that day and another of the observers left for home at about six p m after he had done all he could as his own office was being wrecked ad police and wires were going down. The entire city was then covered with water water from twenty five to fourty feet deep. On his way home in a boat he saw thousnds of people surround in their upper stories of floating woodenhouses and he informed all he could that he was sure the worse was passed, and the people who could not hear his voice on account of the roar of the flood and and onaccount of the distance he motioned them to remain remain within and not risk the dangers of exposures on the roofs, as a blizzard then was raging. The swift est pressure of the waters by observations of floating wreckage was about twenty eight miles per mile an hour at 8;IO p.m. on the fourty Nday but at some places the speed of the current was said to be greater th anthis, according to the speed of floating houses and wreckage that passed by. The depth of the water at that time however appeared to be slightly a lower stading from fifteen to thirty feet throughout th e highest parts of the city where before it was from thirt y to fourty feet, with the water pressure varying according t how the lad lay where the waters swept over. The highest pressure of the water by observating floating wreckage or by pressure tests was anty six miles an hour from the northwest on the third day of the disaster, ad the biggest houses were being crushed or moved from their their foundations or roomsbeng wrecked and turned inside out. At many parts of the city t he biggest houses fell in at this time and the pressure of the waters might have still beengr a greater when the depth of the water was at its height when the observer estimated that at some points even inside the city tward the center the water seemed to rush the wreckage by at a rate between one hundred and two or one hundred and thirty miles an hour with a roar that was almost deafening deafeningsIt was fortunte for the city city however that the waters did not advance like a tidal wave upon the city or otherwise the waters would have carried off more houses than it did. Also the observers believed from the records he managed to save that the flood moved over the land from its source inthe formation of a large triangler lake the center being at the point where the two cities were so hard hit.

The warnings of the signal stations were the means of saving many of the survivors but the flood was so severe however that it was impossible to prepare for such destruction. The signal station observers at Schloeder town to relieve the apprehension stated on November the 23th that the lake had beendrained of most its water, that a christian army was near by with icffficials to investigat investigate the causes of the explosions, and so far there was n indication indican indication of another such flood following.

The surviving people of these two cities did not of course awakenfrom sleep on the morning following the sudden abatement of the height of the flood, for they had not hardly slept the night s before because of t h e many weary hours of which every one of them had stood face t o face with death, ad kew knew that many thousands had yeilded up their lives, and that hundreds of millions of dollars worth of property had been destroyed.

There was not a single building which was not eith er entirely wiped out or severely damaged ad the people of the city literally lived in the valley of the shadow of death, helpless and hopeless, deprived of all hope and ambition merely witing for the appearance of the official death, roll ad and also fearing of the approach of rebel armies that takig taking d advantage of the flood might come upon the wrecked town and massacre or make slaves of what children he the flood had spared.

Confusdon and dreadful chaoes reigned everywhere throughout the whole region of the flood outside of the cities itself, deathand desola desolat ion was on all sides, indeed wreck ad ruin were the only things visible where ever the eye would meet and with all business entirely suspended ad and no other occupiat ion than the search for and the burual of the dead it was very strange that th e streets of these tw cities ad other hard hit towns were not filled with insane victims of the floods frigh tful visit/.

For daus and days the people of these two cities knew knew there was great danger ahead, for they had beenwarned repeatedly that suspacious men had often beendriven awy from the dikes of the lake butthey laughed at all fears, business weh on went on as usual qn ad when the blow came it found the two cities unpre pared and withcutsafeguards, and there was n army near by to even prevent such a disaster caused by enemy engineers.

Owing to the immens stupeifaction following this awful disaster the surviving people and there were few too were inno conditionwhatever what ever eith er phy sical or mental mental to provide for themselves and therefore depended upon the outside world for food and clothing which the nearest Glandelinian armies were preveting by meas to watching every railroad track and of raiding such train whenthey came along on the tracks that had not been destroyed by the flood. The inhabatants of these two cities needed immediate relief but how they were t to get it was a mystery for these two cities were not yet in touch with th e outside world by rail or sea and enemy armies had cut off all cumunications that was possible and guarded all approaches by camps and long lines of batteries of artillery so that large christianarmies would have t force an opening so relief could be sent to the stricken. The two cities and other places were sorely stricken, and apealed to the country at large to send food, cloth ing ad fresh water and other well need d lies water and other ne ll neededcupplies. The waterworks were all swept away and the near by rowers were com contaminated even though frozen o e over so that the lack of water was one of the most serious of all the troubles. Never did any flood in any other kind of country do navoc more completely, or work more surely. All the eletric light and telegraph poles and other things were prostrated, and the streets were littered with snow covered timbers, slate, glass and every conciewvable character of forzen ice and snow covered debris mingled with frozen bodies of the drowned men women and children, and and even animals. There was not one single house of the city to fit for occupitation and every one of the business houses were either wrecked entirely or even so badly damage damaged and with the floors so thickly covered with ice left by the waters that they could not hardly be occupied.

On the day following there were many deaths from hunger and exposure to the cold and the blizzards, and the list swelled at an alarming rate. The surviving people were living the best they could----compelled to in the ruins of their homes, in the hotels churches and in wrecked railr railway stations and in surviving schoolnouses or in tents erected in the streets by the side of their beloweddead.

Indeed the desolation was so great and so greatly extended that no one could imagine a more sorrowful section of a country, or of such forlorn cities as these two. Not one street car was running, no trains from any lin line could reach the town only sad eyed men and women with forlorn wrecks of little children walked about the streethe in the biting cold and pelting snows, the dead and wounded monop9lized the attention of any one who might have been able to do anything whatever, and for days after the flood disaster the city or both of them were at thevmercy as mentioned before of Glandelinian ruffians and s; spy thieves.

Every one of the finest catholic churches were in ruins the priests not have had time to save even the west oly of cities. At the portions of the cities were the floods entered noy a vestige of a residence of or of any kind of structure was to be seen ever, thing having been swept clean, and to make matters worse in the business sections of the city the water had been more than thirty five feet in depth, stores of all kinds had been entirely washed out, and stocks of all kinds including food stuffs were total losses. And after the disastervit was a most common sight---that of the inhabatants of the cities wandering around in the cold and snow in a forsaken and forlorn way not caring whether they froze to death or not, indeed indifferent to everything around them and paying a no attention to inquiries of friends and relatives. And yet many times already during the war many such scenes had been enacted throughout tyis country and it was thought that the ve vengeance of the wicked Glandeliniens a had been visit ed in its most appalling shape upon the places which had incurred the wrath of the Glandelinian states.

And it was fortunate after all however that all those who men were compelled to endure such trials were temporiarly deprived of their minds, and were so stunned that they could not appreciate the enormity of such a disaster. The first loss of life was reported at Rogers resturant near near the surburbs of the city where sixtyof the most prominent citizens of the city lost their lives and many others were maimed and imprisoned by the wreckage. These men were sitting at tables eating their dinner and making light of the danger of the floods, being on the seconn floor or of the casiono when the walls suddenly caved in and came down with a crash killing them and letting in a terrific torrent of water. Those in the lower parts of the building escaped with their lives in a strange manner as they managed to clambur to the upper portions of the ruins or to crawl above the debris and thus saved them from drowning though they suffered great exposure to the cold. One of the waiters who was sent to look for a boat to take off the rest to better shelter did not comprehend the real depth of the water and he was drowned at twenty second street his body being found a day afterwards on a river s bank.

Fully 1,700 people mostly women and children were thicly packed together at the big city hall most of them more or less injured in various ways. One of the men who came from princes street reported the loss of a hundred and sixty lives in the building from which he escaped and he himself had been severely injured on the arm and about the head. Passing along yo: Kenman street out as far as Thirt, Fourth, climbing over the pi piles of snow covered timbers which had once been residences, four hundred bodies were observed in several yards and many in rooms in other places, while as many as six hundred corpses were seen lying singly or in groups in the space of less than a block. The body of a nun was found near a wrecked Catholic School on the corner of Abedeer Deener street and "orden avenue, her her lips smiling but her features set in death her hands grasping her rosary tightly. The remains of the other sisters of the school were never found.

The report from St josp joseph's hospital showed that only two persons escaped from that Infirmary, though the number of patients was one thousand, and the nurses and Interns one hundred. The St Mary's Catholic School chosen as a place of refuge by the people of that locality collasped before the before the pressure of the flood and not one person who had taken refuge there escaped--how many where there was not told-- and will never be told for their bodies were never recovered and most of the wreckage was swept away. Never before had the sun of the morning of the fifth day after the flood risen upon such a dreadful sight and as tyough unable to endure it He soon veiled his face behind dull and leaden clouds and not only refused to shine but a blinding snow-storm set in, and surely ,i without doubts whatever itwas enough to draw tears even from the most inanimate things. At the depot of the Mic-hellester and Abbieannia Railroad rescueing soldiers picked up forms of children ranging down to even little babies within a few feet of the station, and wel weither they blonged to various parents or a home for children it could not be told. The railway station had been selected as a place of refuge by nearly two thousand people and although the water kept rising high a higher a na and higher and the occupants expected every moment to be their last escape was utterly impossible for about the building the water was fully thirty five feet deep and rising inch by inch every hour.

A large number of small shanties were floating about but there was no means of making rafts or securing boats. Every wrecked building had to be used as a hospital and temporarily repaired as far as possible and as for the dead they did find they were being put away anywhere and anyhow and within other buildings wherever space could be cleared were occupied by the many wounded. It was nothing strange for any one to see the many dead and as many crippled everywhere, and the living were so fascinatedny by the dead they could hardly be dragged away from the spots where the corpses were so thickly piled.

There were dead by the thousands, by the scores of thousands and by the hundreds of thousand; they were virtually two great cities of the dead, a vast battlefield, the slain being victims of flood and wreckage of fallen houses. The dead to be sure were at rest but the living had to suffer for there was no aid at hand, and in the business portion of the two cities the damage could not be estimated. The wholesale houses had about fourty seven feet of water even up to their fif th floors and all windos pane and glass protectors of all kinds were demolished. Every street had about the same depth of water and all provisions in every one of the wholesale groceries and goods on the lower floors were not only saturated and rendered valueless but in most cases completely swept away.

In clearing away the wreckage of many buildings heartrending evidence of the bravery and love of the parents were discovered. Bodies of many of the little folk were found at various places which indicated by their positions that the most heroic measures were taken to keep them close together so that all might be saved. In some instances the parents had tied their children together, and fastened the cords around their own waists and by this way had hoped to quiet the childrens fears and lead them to safty in the upper floors. But it was evident that the flood had stuck many of these places with such terrific force that the structures first fell carrying the inmates with them and burying them under tons of floating wreckage killing many instantly or drowning the others. Many familes children and all and children attatched to their parents were found at many various places and in one heap the children were piled on their parents, and the arms of two little girls were clasped around their mothers neck.

In the total wreck of these residences the number of men women and children thus killed were not known. It was first believed that the mahority of the people drown in the flood had been washed out of the two cities by the water but the discovery of so many childre children in the ruins indicates that more were killed and buried under the wreckage than drowned in the water.

Many of the days following after the flood were days of great suffering, although the population had hardly sufficiently recovered from the shock of the mighty disaster to realize that they were really hungry and in danger of sickness and death from the exposure to the intense cold of coming winter. And on the days when the news of the disaster had been broadcasted, all relief trains sent from other cities tward Sperryv Sperry ville and Schloeder town were forced to turn back, either because the tracks were washed away or because rebel raiders were lying in wait to wreck such trains and secure the provisions for their own use. On the fourth day after the disaster some a ammount of relief had been sent in, a railroad line to Sperryville having been repa red repaired by many work men guarded by the military and boats under heavy guard took the needed supplies from that point to Schloeder town.

Yet food and clothing were the things most needed, and even on account of the cold weather the men themselves could not hardly get along with the clothinig clothes they had on and even what they had secured since the flood, and they too suffered as much as the women and children, and in consequence of the weather there was much sickne sickness sickness among them especially colds and grippe. It was very notiable however that the best of the women of both cities had however to some degree by setting the example been the cause of the re revival of the drooping spi spirits of the men and even some children were instr instrumental also.

And in some cases there was a better feeling among the inhabatants as some news had been already recieved five days since the disaster that within a few days the acute distress would be over except in the matter of shelter. Every house standing was damp an and water remaining on the floors and in lower portions had frozen fro frozen into ice and none of the inured were getting along as well a s they should, and none of them could be sent to other cities because of the remaining flood conditions outside of the cities and because it would have endangered their lives to even remove them.

It was said that at every other hour hundreds of disguised Glandelinian looters and vandals not were actually shot by citizen guards or soldiers but literally shot it out with them to evident success shooting down more citizens and soldiers than they lost among their own number. One of them who was captured was searched, and seven important private letters were found in his possession and money and jewelry and the finger of a little girl with a golac gold ring on it was clutched in his hands. While some were not looking he suddenly drew a gun shot and killed the searchers and escaped.

In the afternoon of the same day at the suggestion of the head of police a mounted force of sixty men n under the leadership of a police officer was detailed by the Mayor of the city to search a number of ruined houses where Glandelinian looters were known to have hidden themselves with plunder.

" Do not give them any quarter boys. We want no prisoners"said the chief of police. The plunderers changed their location however before the arival of the detatchment, and the raiders came back empty handed. One hundred and fourty cases of looting were constantly reported between two and three in the afternoon one of these reports being that thirty vandals were crobbing a ruined house at Twenty First and Vivianana Avenue. " Capture them" Commanded the police chief, as about sixty of the citizens and some soldiers, led by a sergeant mustered before him for orders. " I want every one of those Glandelinian looters dead only do not take them prisoners."

This column left on the double quick. Half an hour later, a few of them came back about ten reporting that only six of the looters had been killed in the fight and that they had killed the rest of the citizens and soldiers. This caused a great sensation indeed.

And yet the day before the Mayor of Schloeder Town had been compelled to sent out the following appeal to the Emperor of Abbieannia;

" It is to be my own opinion based on personal information that about one million two hundred thousand have lov lost their lives here, in Sperry ville and in other regions swept away by the flood. About three quarters of Sperry ville I heard had been totally swept away, and there are many thousands of the survivors who are without homes and who are destitute and exposed to all kinds of weather--how many there is so far there is no way of finding out. Arrangements have been first planned to have the women and children sent to other cities not reached by the flood but there are no means of transportations, the flood though not affecting the cities still surround them and there is no means to obtain pr provisions. Countless thousands are injured and need care. We therefore appeal to you and the country in general for immediate aid.

HENDRO PUEBLO.
Mayor of Schloeder T w Town."

Starting as soon as the flood waters, began to recede after four days of seige, a series of relief parties began the work of rescueing as many of the wounded asthey could and to remove the dying and the dead from their snow covered ruins of the houses and windows of wreckage. And yet the scenes what they witnessed were almost beyond the description of the best writers in the world. pro Droves of screaming weeping women all bruised and bleeding without hardly sufficient co clothing on them to cover them from the cold, many of them even even bearing the lifeless forms of clothi naked frozen children in their arms, men broken hearted and sobbing, bewailing the bewailing the loss of their wives and children, streets filled with floating wreckage covered with ice among which there were many frozen bodies of the victims of the big flood made the part of a most awful picture a picture which couldynot be correctly made by any artist. And as far as the eye could see in every direction the scene of desolation and destruction continued, and still surrounded by waters of the receding floods which was covered with seas of floating wreckage.....

At such sights the stoutest hearts would have quailed and grown sick, and yet the searchers knew too well that for days and days to come they would not be able to unveil one tenth part of the misery the destructive flood elements had so quickly and so unmercifully brought about..

Th y They also knew that the full heaviness and dis terror

They also knew that the full heaviness and disasterous effects of the blow could never be realized for weeks to come, and even though those of the relief parties and those who had accompanied them were prepared to see the full and natural evidences following upon the heels of the mighty flood they did not in the least exep expect such frightful and unusual revelations. It was worse than butchery, it was was a wholesale massacre without precedent, a wholesale gathering of victims that was so ghastly as to be beyond the power of any man to even picture, to even comprehend. And as the party went on the members would come across others and made reports of things that also had come under their notice. There were said to be fifty thousand killed or drowned in one section of Schloedertown, one hundred thousand in another, and fiffty five thousand elsewhere.The list grew alarmingly larger with every report.It therefore was a matter

6 pf the greatest wonder, and an increasing wonder, an astonishing one too, that a single person in either of the cities escaped to tell the tale as every person in every small town and villiage also struck by the flood were killed before they knew even what was the cause of their being drowned. In either of these ruined cities no one seemed at all sane, indeed there was madness in the very air, and to make it seem even more crasier all moved silently as if in an atmosphere of great gloom, indeed it was difficult to move and breath with so much scenes of death on all sides. And yet who could keep his or her eyes off those horrible fascinating corpses which frequently riveted the gaze and life and death seemed to be so closely intermingled that they could not be told apart it being the apotheosis of the frightful..

Those who had escaped drowning in the flood were searching for the missing dear ones and working thus in such a listless way as to irrestibly bring on the idea in the mind of a personthe idea that they did no, care whether they really found them or not. But this was only the languour of despair, and hopelessness. Hundreds of those who had lost their all, their families, and property, were merry, and even joked exceedingly about it as if it had been the funniest thing to occur on earth but this was the glee of insanity. As the morning dawned when the flood first receded the still flooded streets despite the biting cold winds were lined with people, men women and children all half clad and crippled and wounded in every conciveable manner, nobbling through the cold waters as well as they could to places where they could recieve attention of doctors for themselves and summon aid for friends and relatives relatives who were too badly wounded to be even moved.

In Sperry ville the police of chief who had been awarded a prize as the bravest police officer probably in the whole country was severely injured and in a very sad condition, one foot had been amputated, four ribs were caved in, his abdomen torn almost apart and his head badly bruised, but he declared his condit condition was nothing compared to others.

" My house with wife and children had been swept away in the flood" he said to the doctors. I do not see where I should live as I have nothing left."

Though no house escaped destruction of any kind yet the houses more substantial were were turned into hospitals as were also the leading churches and even hotels and schools and there was not one ruined houses left standing which did not contain more than a score of dead as well as many injured and other refugees. A blizzard coming on with a high wind the party went back down Sulco street tward the main part of the city.

The untold misery of the poor people, all mangled and hurt, pressing to all places for medical attention was greatly increased by this blinding blizzard storm. Stopping at a small house to escape the fury of the blizzard the party found it packed with injured men and children. The building contained a store also but the provisions had been swept away entirely and there was nothing for the numerous refugees who came hungry, tired and cold. Indeed instead of a sote the place was more like a hospital.

further down the street they came upon a place that might also have been a store and sale which had been completely submerged by the water, and here they were serving soggy half frozen crackers and bread and a little cheese to the cold and hungry crowds that stood before it. The people who served it out had nothing else to give and the food was soaked full of water, and the people who were fortunate enough to get this were hungry and therefore did not make any complaints.

It was hard to determine wa what section of either one of the cities suffered the greatest damage and the greatest loss of life. Yet information from any point of one city was very difficult to get at the time, in fact it was almost next to impossible but nevertheless the reports that could be recieved indicated that every section seemed seemed to have suffered the same fate as the rest of the cities. Thus the relief parties facing the wind and snow seemed its way through the snow thitened streets which but four days before were teeming with life.

Now indeed they were the snow covered avenues of death, and it did not even seem as if they could ever resound to the voices and foot steps of the people again, and that it would take many years to even remove the wreckage. As to rebuilding it appeared as if that was totally impossible.

Indeed annihilation was everywhere as far as eye could reach.

As was later marked out those of the military maps and charts of the Hibernia war bureau at Angelinia Agathia the flood which struck struck the two cities of Sperryville and Schloedertown had nearly the same peculiar course that a tornado usually takes when it runs often out of its course. It first devestated towns and villiages south east of Allenbytown and within two hours later the flood was approximately at a point fixed at between the towns of Polychrome and Rosa which also felt its force but which which was not so badly as damaged by it. From there it made a course almost due south west passing through the small villiage of Turner Runnertown and yet if it had continued on this same course it would have struck Upper Sperry & Sperryville and Schloedertown just the same but at a much earlier hour than it did.

The flood apparently was meaned for the two cities all the time but about twelve oclock it happened to change its course so as to go almost due south across an extensive country of farm land and moving tears the very city of Mombi itself. Here before of the conditions of the land the flood then made another sharp turn to the westward and headed again almost straight for Sperryville and Schloedertown. It was this sharp turn to the southwestward which could not be anticipated so the many signal stations sent out its flood warnings for every city and town whether it was in the path of the flood or not well knowing that the prec prediction as to many of these places would certainly fail. As soon as the head of the gigantic flood turned once more to the west the operators of the signal stations knew that many cities and towns closest to Big Girl Knool and Angelinia Agathia were safe, and turned their attention tward the cities of Sperryville and Schloede town Schloedertown.

It was said that the people of these two cities had abundant warning of the coming of the flood not when it was coming but of the purpose of the foe engineers planning to wreck the dikes and levees of the lake itself but of course they scoffed the warning, but anyway the signal corps had no idea whatever of the destructive energy the inundation would gain on the way tward these two cities.

The military had been informed im informed through spies that the first signs of Glandelinians trying to wreck the levees of this lake was on August the 30th near the dam close to Levee Mc One. On August the thirty first the rebels were again reported in the same locality and a party of troopers came up and drove them away. When the rascals finally succeeded the flood even then did not develops any real destructive features saving its first rush from the opened levees and during its slow passage over the immense farm lands in that region and across it but it resulted in tremendous inundations as deep as a lake itself, all farms being covered by eighty to a hundred feet of water and overflowed many small streams and turned them into lakes and big rivers.

During the first twelve hours of November the 12th the beginning of the flood from ten to fourty feet of water spread over a hundred miles of ground and by the morning of the thirteenth the brunt of the flood was a short distance northwest of Sperryville and slower rising of flood waters had commenced over the northern portion of the town, a torrent of water rushing at a rate of fourty eight miles an hour being reported from the town of Allenby and fourty miles within the street of streets of Sperryville. Conditions of the land at other points ter so as to prevent the advance of the flood tward Angulinia Agathia tward which it headed first, and it therefore continued southwestward over the lower lands. At twelve thirty in the afternoon the flood was apparently central north of Sperryville and the people of that city were making hasty preparations to flee to the upper floors. The flood was accompanied by the worse kind of weather believab believable. First and sence second days of it was with below zero terms tr temperatures, and the third and fourth days heavy storms raged big wind and blizzard storms of unusual intensity causing misery beyond description among the flood marooned people and tar the fact that the waters did not freeze was because the inundation moved with a terrific rapidity.

Angelinia Agathia and Dorothy Gale was the only hope for refuge by the stricken survivors of the flood and yet to make things more serious for the inhabatants of these places later on immense Glandelinian armies approached to within a mile of the recent flood scenes and as the Glandelinians were of the fierce Turmerranians and Omarians the surviving inhabatants had therefore been compelled for fear of the lives of their remaining children to flee before the rebels leaving the ruins behind. This caused a serious complication of things for the people began to flock out of the city into the open country exposed to all kinds of weather, without proper clothing and forced to wither tramp in slushy waters or in deep snow and most of them barefooted. In addition to this thousands of Glandelinian cavarly followed hard after these unfortunate unfortunate refugees, and hearing of such doings the aurthorities at Angelinia Agathia was at a loss to what to do about it. These refugees were enormous distances away, so were the christian armies, and it was found too that nearly a million soldiers in general Kindernines army had relatives in the flood stric stricken districts, and so feared the worse about them that they desired more than anything else to advance to their rescue. The unfortunates were indeed panic stricken, for the greatest number of the Glandelinians who came to harass them were the deaded " WHEELERS" almost frantic in their efforts to get at the stricken inhabatants and destroy them and the children and to feed their wicked clarion eyes on the sickening repulsive and terrible disease breeding scenes.

In addition to the horrors of it all there were thousands of the sufferers who becoming lame and almost overcome by the cold and exposure were forced to fall back or become straggglers and where the relentless Gargoylians could get at them and their children. The question of the military going to the rescue of these hundreds of thousands of refugees came up at a hasty five minutes mass meeting of Emperor Nivian and his generals held on a Monday evening. It turned out that general Kinfe Kindernine and Calderlinia with Roswell Buster Johnston and Concentinian Aronburg should advance with their armies to their succor with the orders to spare none of the rascally persuers to give the brutal Glandelinians no quarter whatever. Every incoming train brought scores of thousands of more volunteer soldiers, and i.e immediate action was necessary. It was decided finally to send immense bodies of Concentinian and ₚinkie Abyssinkillian cavarly in advance of the infantry and to get to the scene as soon as possible.. Attention also naturally was to be given to the survivors of the flood, and to bring them to the ranks of the army. Major general ₚurner sent word to the Mayor of Angelinia Agathia that as many soldiers and officers as can be spared from Dorothy Gale and h r har mobolizat ion camps should be sent to the immediate aid of the refugees as soon as possible with the same order to" Take no prisoners from the persuing Glandelinian army.

The refugees when rescued should be well provided for, he said . The urgency of his message because of the depopulation of the two cities because of the advance of the foe he explained was that untill the enemy could be hurled back every body possible are liable to perish from cold and exposure or at the hands of the Gargoyliens on the way side.
It was believed that nearly five hundred thousand of the unfortunate survivors were fleeing into the open before the advance of the enemy hundreds were overcome by the cold suffering from frozen feet and hands or ears and all the serious ill died on the way and a large number of them were children. Every little place that could have been opened for the refugees were quickly in possession of the foe, and the persuing rebels were making it as uncomfortable for them as possible, they were still further being deprived of food and clothing, but still despite of all this suffering they were only grieving for lost ones left behind---fathers, mothers, sisters, wives and children. Nearly every one in the bands of refugees had some relative missing, but few of the people were certain whether they were alive or dead. Alll knew however were satisfied they were dead...
Though it was cold even unto ten below zero men were bareheaded and barefoot plowing through snow and slush, many had their ears and feet frozen till they dropped, all appeared with sunken cheeks and hollow eyes, women and children with tattered clothing, and bruiseddarms and faces, and swollen feet and more infants with bare feet bruised and swollen were among the refus refugees seen plowing through the snow and still half frozen flood waters reamining in the open country. Women of wealth, and refinement with hatless heads and gowns frozen to their bodies gowns of rich materials torn into shreds were also among the refugees and suffered the same as the rest. At times a man and his poor wife and sometimes with one or two children, coul could be seen treaping through the icy waters together shivering with the cold, but such sights were infrequent for nearly all who now had fled from the cities before the advance of the enemy had suffered the loss of one or more of their dear ones because of the flood..
But with all this redoubled and continual suffering there was indeed an awful ammount of heroism shown. A week before most of these os people had happy homes and their familes were around them. The day following the disaster they were homeless penniless and with nothing to look forward to and fugitives before a ruthless rebel hoerde . Yet there was scarcely any complaining though there was of course weeping andother wise crying and even swearing. Many walked about with the crowds as if in a trance and when the christian cavarly finally moved into sight and drove back the persuing revels rebels the refugees accepted the assistance with thanks and appareni t ly ere were greatly relieved at being fl free from the rebels.
When they were finally brought to the christian army which also had moved forward they were all made to feel at home, that they were more than welcome and every thing in the power of the army would be done for their comfort and welfare and yet they did not seem to undert stand half that was being said to them. General ₚurner s fee of those who had followed to rescue the refugees reported to the Mayor of Angelinia Angelinia Agathia as soon as the people were succored as follows;

" To the Mayor of Angelinia Agathia;
On arriving at Larmie this morning I was was informed that the largest numbers of bodies of the flood victims was seen scattered all over the country and in the farm lands and still floating in the waters of the parts of the flood still remaining and which is rapidly freezing up. Fifty six thousand were buried yesterday and two days before within less than ten miles extendin extending upoisite this place place and tward the city of Sperryville. It is yet sixteen miles further to ₚur Sperryville and the bodies were thicker where I was passed than where they have been buried. Soldiers coming with the Concentinian Cavarly inspecting the opposite direction after the persuing enemy had beendriven back report dead bodies scattered thickly over the ground for more than sixty miles. He says it looks almost as bad as a vast battlefield of this war. The refugees of the two towns who we rescued from persuing glandelinian armies have lost everything-- not a single building was left to them and they have been too busy in their flight before the Gargoylian Hords to look after other personal affairs and even to the burying of their own dead...
Those who had anything left had been forced to abandon it to the enemy who advanced upon the two cities, and there is more suffering among the refugees than any one can even think. most of our soldiers have given away nearly all their own provisions for hungry children and frozen persons are under medical care. 10,000 helpless half frozen women and leggarred children were escorted to general Vivians army after being rescued from persuing Glandelinians this afternoon and who had no place to go to and not a bite to eat and exposed to the cold of coming winter.To morrow many others are expected to be rounded up from other points. Every ten feet along the path of the o very flood tells of acts of Glandelinian vandalism, not a trunk, valise or tool chest but what has been rifled.The soldiers buried women this afternoon whose very entrails have been deliberatelyborn out of their bodies by Glandelinians."

General Turner.

Emperor Vivian furnished several hundred thousand tents for the rescued refugees which was to be placed under the Abbiennian Marine hospital aurthorities.
General ₚaderlinia who was sent as near to Sperryville as he could o go by the ₚmperor of Abbiennia to inv investigate the conditions of the flood still said to be prevailing there made the following official statement to the ₚmperor on the flowing day November the 25th 1913.....

" To his Majesty ₚmperor ₚivian November 26th. 19123 1913
From the Adjutant general-
Arrived as close to the scene of the recent disasterous flood as possible could having having been ferried across the flood in a small rowboat.It is impossible to describe the condition existing. Have met some other refugees who told me of their experiences and they told me the flood struck the cities about noon on Nemver the thirteenth and continued to rise with the current constantly increasing with speed and strength untill after early morning on the fourth day. The two cities were inundated and many other places, hundreds of expensive farms have been wiped out and the height of the flood was from thirty to fourty five feet. ₚuring the flood there came on two enormous blizzards and the wind during these storms were perfect cyclones of cold waves and intensified the suffering of the panic stricken people. With few exceptions there is not a single whole building remaining and so many have been entirely destroyed that the enemy who had advanced tward them seeing the buildings useless for the soldiers have abandoned these towns not even being able to set fires as the wreckage is wet and frozen thanks to God for that. All the mobolization camps near this city except one rapid fire battery at the fort of San Jacinto are practically destroyed, the enemy having failed to move the battery as the guns are frozen hard in the ice left by the receding flood. At Schloeds town every building except the grand railway station has been swept away. Twenty eight thousand soldiers are said to have been drowned and all the members of every battery have been wiped out. All members of the hospital corps are lost and the loss of soldiers therefore in the whole camp as none are found to be alive probably is 100,000. All bridges over the river portions of the city are gone, all the waterworks are destroyed.and all the telegraph lines are down. The city has been entirely abandoned by the inhabetants and not a record of any kind in the mobolization camp there is left.
And the refugees of the cities who were saved from the persuing hordes of glandelinians had nothing but rags on their persons, nearly all are without shoes and faced the dangers of freezing to death when exposed to the intense cold. There are probably from each city more than a million inhabetants homeless and absolutely destitute, who had to be clothed sheltered and fed by your army. The aurthorities at Angelinia Agathia have ordered rations and tents for the refugees and an army is advancing from Dorothy Gale under general Vivianna. Have wired commissionary general to ship about 300,000 rations by express and boat. The main general in charge of the mobolization camp at Angelinia Agathia will make his way to your army and investigate matters.
GENERAL GLANDELINIA.....

General ₚurner Turner when seen after he said he had completed a tour of inspection of the National works at Schloesertown used red in one of his statements;
The glandelinian armies have taken possession of all points of the unflooded ground north of these ruined towns and the glandelinian armies are as good as staying there for always and there is no driving them away for a certainity.. They have put up unassailable positions with fifteen pounder implacements, with one hundred batteries of motars mortars and carriages on hand unmounted and placed in such a situation as to sweep down a whole army that would charge against it. A Certain part of this rebel army has taken up position at Crockette run and have formed up positions for the len; length of eighteen hundred a yards with batteries of machine and other guns, and all approaches to this Glandelinian army is impossible for even scouts. It is probable that the rebels mean to stay here and opposre our advance and to frsutrate our purposes to succor the ruined villiages and cities.
I fear these two cities and all the villiagesthat have been swept by the floods are destroyed beyond any means to recover and that it will be impossible to drive any Glandelinian army out of this region as they have too strong a foothold on the lands all fortifications and other works in many places have been so wrecked that the slightest restoration is absolutely impossible and that from what the enemy have been doing right along I firmly confirm the report that the foe's victory in this entire war is surely only a few months away. We we'll never win and I can prove it." This gloomy prophecy for the countrys future was reflected also in an official report to the Mayor of the city of Angelinia Agathia by another general who had spent many days of his life at battles and investigating many disasters and finding out their cause and results. His statement claimed that seventy five per cent of all the christian armie armies had been demolished, all the best cities have been ruined and that the very world firmly believed that there was no more hope for the Abbiannians winning the war than th there was for a man dying of Hydrophobia. The very Mayor of Angelinia Agathia said hi in answer:

" For all the ruin either by explosion, battle fire or flood and for the many times the enemy have crushed our armies the situation of our very country itself beggars all description. Not only am I co convinced that your statements are right but also that the Abbiannian nation itself is already wrecked for all time to come and that it is a matter of a few weeks before the rebellion will be won by the Glandelinian armies and our emperor and his daughters forced to flee to a foriegn country for their safty. More than seventy five per cent of our armies have been destroyed, many of our cities have been already irreparably wrecked, and the same per cent of damage is to be found among our beautiful forests."

The city of Joan itself had been in the path of this flood and along the river wharf fro front great river steamers have been bodily hurled upon dry land or had been thrown on the big piers and remained there, great masses of destroyed iron and wood, that even a fire could not totally destroy. The great warehouses of this city along the river front have been crushed in by the pressure of the flood which made the river turn into a rushing sea some of them were even unroofed and gutted throughout their length their contents either piled in great heaps on the warves or entirely swept away by the flood. Large tug and hundreds of beautiful sailing craft have jammed themselves half into the buildings where they were landed by the pressure of the flood waters, and re left by the flood as it receded. Houses everywhere where the city bore the brunt of the flood were found packed and jammed in great confussing masses of broken windrows in all of the streets.

Great windrows of human bodies, dead bodies in countless numbers, dead animals half or totally frozen vegetation, ice and snow covered furniture and snow covered fragments of the houses themselves were to be seen piled in confused windrwos right in the main streets of the city. Along the river front human bodies were to be seen floating among the slabs of ice as thick as cord wood or like lumber in a log jam, and intermingled with them were to be found carcasses of horses, chickens, dogs, and frozen or water logged vegetable matter. Above all could be seen floating houses with people on top of the roofs c frozen to death or killed by exposure and half frozen to the roofs of these structures.

Along the wraves where were located other big wholesale warehouses and stores, the sitim sut s situation was even worse. Immense stores of fresh vegetation have been invaded by the incoming waters and are now turned into frozen garbage piles and frozen so stid stiff that not one of them could be pulled apart. The flood waters played at will with everything, smashing in the lower floors of the houses, dps depositing the human bodies where they pleased, and then receded leaving the wreckage to tell its own tale of how the work had been done and as a result the many great wholesale houses and big ware houses were also tombs wherein were to be found the dead bodies of human beings and many carcasses of animals and also fishes almost defying the efforts of relief parties. And in the immense piles of wreckage and debris throughouth other portions of the city in the frozen waters and scattered throughout all portions of the city especially in the residental portions were to be found unusual masses of wreckage and in these great piles were to be found more human bodies than even the most dumb person would believe and broken ice covered household furniture of every destruction description. Also many handsome pictures even of religious houses were to be seen intermingled with the wreckage or resting beside the nudge figure of some man woman of child. The great windrows of e debris seas of it were not to be confined to any one particular point of the city. The waters of the flood, and the cold winter weather and fierce blizzards spared no one who were exposed. The flood whirled houses around in its dreadful currents and eddies, and the waves of the flood piled their shattered frames high in the most confusing masses and dumped their contnts contents on top. Men and women were whirled and thrown around like so many logs of wood and left to free freeze stiff in the withering cold blasts of the below zero weather. And it was evident that with the best exertions of a million men it would require nearly two years to secure some semblance of physicial order in this city of ruin, and then it will be doubtful even then if all the debris will be disposed of.

Many of those who came to investigate the disaster declared they had never seen such seas of wreck in all their lives. From all along the river front to the center of the city from the water back the flood flood wave left desty and total destruction in its wake. And there was no family in the whole city of Joan whose household was not short of a member or more and in many instances entire families had been washed away, and either killed or frozen to death. Thousands who succeeded in escaping from the fury of the flood did so only to become victims of a worse kind of death either by being crushed by falling buildings or by being frozen to death. In the main business portion of the city the foundations of nearly all of the biggest buildings had been washed completely away the force of the flood carrying towering structures to their totql total ruin, and these ruines being washed across the streets and disposeted there formed immense barricades on which ga gathered all the floating debris and many human bodies many of which were still alive, and the top of this wreckage being dry big fires broke out and many of the victims thousands of them died without the possibility of rescue. Many of these bodies were even stripped of their very clothing by the force of the water and there was nothing to even protect those who did not die from water or fire from the biting winds of below zero weather, and these died of the cold, and even millions of fishes were found among the water logged and fro s frozen and smoking ruins. Many of the bodies not burned were frozen so stiff that they were incased with the thick coating of ince ice in the wreckage and could not be pulled from it.

Some of the most conservative men of the city placed the lose of human beings at not less that 75,500 and possibly 100,000, while others said it would not exceed over 365,000.

Emperor Emperor Vivien being asked his opinion of the idea of reforming armies at every lake and river where dikes and levees were formed thus to preventing such disasters i in the future replied as follows;

" I do not asdi advise such things because it would be of no avail at all. It would be best for all people knowing what nature this war has, that those who live in towns which can be in danger of floods, should leave said cities and go to towns and cities th that are situated on higher ground. It is true that floods produced by Glandelinians sometimes occur in such a measure as to even reach cities on high ground but such occurace occurances are not frequent. Within the last few months no flood of like severity and results has occured in any part of Calverinia. There are many bottom lands inthis country country as most of them occupied by cities the size as these destroyed by the floods that are equally exposed to the dangers of such floods, should the enemy break one of the levees or dikes, and obtain the proper position relative to them. It would be therefore more advisable to abandon these towns and cities because as long as this war lasts there is a remote possibility that at some futi future time a flood of the same cause may be the cause of great loss of life and property.

We are entering a winter that may give warning of very low temperatures for the below zero weather of this month of November has no parallel within the last thirty five years.

It is so far a record breaker for low temperatures, blinding blizzards and other phenomena of winter which have destroyed lives which the flood have spared, and which makes it seem as if the elements have taken part with the foe. As long as we have to keep our vast armies moving here and there like jumping jackets there dosesnot appear to be so far as we know n just now any hope of preventing the reoccurance of such floods. It would therefore seem that rather than taking chances in the future means should be adopted by the inhabatants of all cities and towns lying near rivers and lakes and other similarly exposed cities to erect buildings only on the heaviest stone foundations that should have solid interior of masonry to a height of thirty thirty feet above the level that floods might rise. Rigid building regulations should allow no other structures erected for habatations in the future in any city or town loca located near rivers or lake and below the flood level and that is exposed to the direct sweet of such a flood.

But nevertheless the survivors of the disaster such take heart as the chances are that not once in a hundred year years would the same spot be so terribly stricken and high solid foundations would doubtless make the cities and towns almost totally impregnable to loss of life by all future floods. The courage of most of the men of the ruined towns and cities under these distressing conditions was shown by the utterance of one of them and who was one of the best known residents of the city of Sperryville. He was asked by one of the soldiers on the say the refugees were rescued by the army for an opinion as to the future of the city.

" I believe I can say" that what can be done here as soon as the foe moves u off and allows us to return will be wonderful. But it will take us four months I fearbefore we can estimate the loss in everything. But the surviving citizens are going to straight en out everything under any conditions, and we are going to stay there and work it out come what may. We will have to clear offthe wreckage first however, and business also can be resumed and as soon as possible to traffic can be handled throughout the cite cities . But I think it will be months on account of the hinderance of the enemy before business can be carried on but I'm going to stand up for my own city even i if it will cost me my last cent. We can put about twenty thousand men at work while we are waiting for railroads to restore the lines and bridges and terminals in our city. And if necessary we shall bring business by boat boats and barges down all big rivers and load in midstream. In this way we can not only resume our commercial relations with other parts of our country but we also shall be ableto put as many abled bodied men surviving in the city to work. Most of our river ports holds the advantahge over every sea port of this country of Calverinia for accommodating any kind of commerce and in inviting these as we have to continue their business through our own river ports we must in our reconstruction do it on the same lines employed by the communities of Angelinia Agathia, Dorothy Gale and Big Kirlknool. The port of our city is all right despite the flood. The ever alert military and other engineers in charge of the river har tharbor here have already taking their very soundings and declare that the fullest depths of the water remains and because of these conditions the restoration might be more rapid than many will belie e and if the enemy do not interfere the flow of commerce will brea be as great and for the courage and fortutide fortitude and forsight to look beyond the unhappy events of the flood as prepo prosperous and secure as in any par part of our war torn country".

The aurthorities of porothy Gale city sent to devastated oan well known grain elevator builders which arived at oan two days after the flood had receded in response to telegrams from the general Manager of the oan Wharf Companies. He at once set to work to make inspections of the grain elevators and their contents and then said that no grain elevators in the world suffered more serious damage than these. The spouts had been torn away, and the wheat and grain in the elevators were ruined by water, that very little of the wheat and grain cloud could be saved for even the conveyers were swept away. It was suggested however that as soon as it could be done large forces of men should be put to work to clearing up all of the wharves and for the restoration of the grain elevators.

It was said also to avoid pestilence with the coming of summer all the bodies were to be burned in trenches of sunk into bogs and the water as soon as possible as for their frozen conditions these bodies could not even be burned. On the day following the flood in oan upwards of four thousand bodies mostly women and little children were hastily thrown into bogs and trenches or hurled into the river with weights on them, they all having been gathered in n heaps of twentyfive and fifty bodies, and carted away to their peculiar burial places.

On ovember the 27th one long trainload after another of provisions, clothing disinfectants and medicines and fuel being lined up at a small town known as Flebie six miles from perryville all sent to the suffering survivors of the flood torn cities were suddenly seized by immense landelinian raiding parties from the main army situated near by and either o sacked or destroyed by fire and derailed. Across the flood in general vivians waiting army were hundreds of thousands of people, all friends of the dead and living waiting impatiently for the news of the missing ones and an opportunity to help but only the meager ammount of relief that the army alone could supply was only given out to them.

Attempts had been made to put up telegraph wires and restore partial communication to let the outside world know that conditions were far more horrible than was at first supposed but the enemy even prevented this. And that was not all. It was not that which was needed, it was a more complete connection with the ruined towns an the christian army encampesewithin sight of the frozen flood waters. The army itself had done every thing to carry succor to the suffering, and the suffering to succor, but the enemy was doing all that was possible to prevent this and though the military worked diligent ly day and night the service was small in the extreme. And the refugees were still suffri suffering--the sick dying for want to medicine and supplies, the well growing desperate and hateful tward the enemy and in many cases gradually losing their reason entirely and soldiers were forcsed to make tremendous sacrifices to succor them. While the refugees could be provided for as far as the army itself could do it because the necessary articles for them could not be carried in as the enemy had cea seized all, there were thousands who had been benefited by the soldiers themselves, but out of their own rations even at the risk of placing themselves in dire want.Those supplies which could have arived and which could have been of the greatest assistance did not arive, except for the enemy to take possession, but these if they had saftly saftly reached the christian army were far fromample to provide for even a small number of the flood sufferers, estimated within the christian lines as over two million three hundred thousand.

Even the rich were hungry and in rags. The greatest efforts was therefore being made on the part of the army itself to provide with its own rations for those in the greatest needs, but this was found to be difficult work, for there were so many there in sad condition and the soldiers had to divide as much as possible of their own provisons for the sufferers. Therefore a rigid system of issuing military supplies was sat established by the generals, and soldiers and officers were sworn in a as military supply and quarter master sergeants. Asno real clothing had could be had women and men had to wear soldiers uniforms and boys and girls as girl and boy scouts. The sergean sergeants attended to the issueing of rations which the army itself could spare. Yet every effort was put forth to reach the dying and sick first but all sorts of obstacles were even then encountered because many of those who arived were so badly maimed that they were unable to apply to the military relief committees and the latter were so burdened by the great number of direct applications that they were unable to even send out messengers.....

The situation of course grew worse every minute minute, everything was needed for the refugees disinfectants, prepared foods, and especially sufficient clothing to combat the cold weather, and soldiers had to sacrifice their overcoats for the men refugees. Scores of more people died in one day as a result of exposure and unavoidable inattention and many more were on the verge of complete dissolution for at best it would be many days before a train could be run into the camp on a line not too close to the encamped landelinian army and the only hope was the arival of more troops so that a direct attack could be made upon the enemy and recover some of the goods if possible or secure provisions belonging to the enemy.

The christian generals held a council and decided that everything must be done to reclaim the ruins and some suggested that it should be for the sake of the refugees done under a flag of truce but Emperor vivian laughed at that suggestion saying that the enemy does not respect a flag of truce. There was plently of volunteers for this more but such a proposition was not agg agreed with and was rejected by many of the generals, and it was decided even among the higher citizens who joined the council that it would be best to request or impress the surviving men citizens of the disaster into the service of the army for surely they would be only too glad to do so to get at the enemy for the flood.

Also should Emperor vivians army be compelled to advance word was recieved that refugees would be carried from the army to some point of refugee, and therefore an effort was made to endues all who were able to leave to go under strong cavarly escort, because the danger of the results of so much suffering was frightfully apparent.

There were only the women and children willing to depart however, and there fore immense droves of them were taken to unused wagon trains and after these having bee been loaded with scant provisions was filled with refugees. Then they headed southeast under a strong cavarly escort backed by a hundred pieces of field gathling guns. The safty of these women and children refugees was a paramount consideration, and the action of the military aurthorities of Angelinia Agathia in sending other large bodies of cavarly was hoped to greatly relieve the situation but far out these trains of wagons filled with refugees were not too frequently save from dreadful attacked by the dreaded" WHEELER" glandelinian cavarly and though they were as often beaten off they did succeed in massacreing a number of people and burn a number of windows wagons.

The cavarly escorts had their hads full in any event and the nurses and doctors also who accompanied them and these attacks often resulted in the death of many...

In the full estimation it was believed that more than$ 23,456,666 would be needed for the relief work in the city of oan itself. The surviving banks of oan City subscribed about $ 5,000 but personal losses for nearly all the citizens of this city jhad been solarge that f very few were able to subscribe anything whatever. Even the total confis cation of all foodstuffs held by the few surviving wholesale grocers and others were were decided upon early in the day by the relief committees but when this was attempted it was found that they too had hardly enough to go around for even less than one thousand persons.There it seemed that starvation would quickly ensue,, unless the supply was not only dealt out with care but that more would be forthcoming.

All kerosene oil was gone and the gas works and eletric light plants were destroyed. The committee asked for a ship load of kerosene oil, also a ship and train load of drinking water and tons of materials for fuel such as coal and wood for immediate use. And money and food next.Not even the smallest candle could be bought for any price for there was not one in the city and light of any kind could be obtained,.....

No baker was living to be able to make bread for every baker was killed and milk was remembered as a past luxury only.What could be done therefore?Even to make matters worse everything was gone inthe way of ovens and utensils, therefore it was absolutely necessary to let the very outside world know the true state of things and even that could not be done.

This city was unable to even help itself and other towns being cut off from the scene of destruction by flood and landelinian armies were just as helpless to render qid aid and send provisions untill the christian armies could re restablish communications with them,..And in fact a great part of the mighty southern part of the Calverinian state was prostrate.Even the whole Abbisannian nation seemed to be somewhat paralyzed at the surprising extent of not only this disasters but the many that have occured before , and with so many armies already out watching every move of the enemy, andwith so much communications cut off and railway lines ruined was for the time being powerless to do anything herself..The entire world of christian nations when hearing of the disaster was thrilled with fa fear and horror, and yet all these nations instinctively felt that the worse had not yet been made known.

In oan city more than six hundredcand twenty thousand people needed clothing food and fuel, and all of these needed to be supplied with household goods as well, and immense sums of money was required to repair the ruined structures still standing... During the first week after the disaster it was almost beyond the possibility of any one to even estimate as far as reasonable the amount of money necessary to even for the shortnest time relieve the sufferings of the unfortunate people.....As a full means of enlightment the Mayor of the city of oan was asked if he would care to send but a statement by a swift messanger to the Angelinia Agathia Times, with the purpose to have the pap pr publication disseminated throughout the world as far a the situation of the war would allow and he therefore dispatched the following to the general Manager of the Angelinia Agathia times at the main newspaper headquarters at Angelinia Agathia city and it was published as follows #]]].

Joan City, Calverinia No
November 21th 1913.

Angelinia Agathia Daily times.
Angelinia Agathia.....!!!!!!

A great Summary of the main conditions prevailing at Joan City and the three other big places is more than the best writer or any man can ever des describe or than any human intellect can master(providing he is your master)Briefly stated the damage in the city of Joan alone is anywhere between $ 100,000,000 or $ 210,000,000. The loss of life is just now too far to be estimated for no list is being kept and all is simply guess work. Those buried intrenches and thrown into the ivyriver or into bogs of quicksand and peat and buried on the ground wheresever they have been picked up over a country stretch of a hundred miles all around the city will reach the horrible total of at least 333,000 souls.
My estimate of the o loss of the two cities of Sperryville and Schloedertown and the immediate surrounding districts, is between one million and two million deaths.And I do not make any of these statements in fright o: excitement for thousands of proofs have shown this to be true. The whole story of the extent of the disaster will never be t gtold andcannot be told. The ne ce necessities of those who survive the disaster is beyond comparisons and yet is not arriving because of communications being cut off eit either by the flood having de destroyed so many railroad lines or by the wicked effort o of the enemy.Not a single person in any of these three citi es escaped the biggest property loss and loss of families and dear ones, every building either having been totally swept out of existance or destroyed beyond redemption.What our own needs are as well as the tow cities two cities can be computed by the world at large by the state ment here herewith submitted much better than I can possibly make them. The help is immediately needed needed but how it can be obtained is a difficult question as the one enemy try to hinder everything....

Mayor of Joan city....**

The city of Joan began on the 21th of November to slowly emerge from the valley of the shadow of death into which she had been plunged for nearly two weeks, and on that cold day of great wind and blinding blizzard,,, and yet for the first time despite the fury of the early winter storm acr actual progress was made toard the general clearing up of good parts of the city. The bodies of those drowned or killed in the wrecks of their houses has for the most part been quickly disposed of. A large numberhad been found when the debris was removed from the many wrecked buildings throughout the city, but on that date there was no number of dead bodies of men and women or little children to be seen save those far outside the city and here they were observed thickly cluttered in the ice sheet of the now frozen flood..And therefore as far as sight at lea least was concerned conc rned the city itself was cleared of most of its dead, provid ing the city was was not almost dead itself,.Many had been burned, thrown into the waters of the river with weights on them buried in trenches or quicksands and other bogs anything to get them q quickly out of sight.
It was just now impossible to bury or despose of the dead outside of the city especially the large number of unburied cattle and human beings frozen into the ice of the petrif iedwater of the flood but this however was not in the city proper but was a condition prevailing on the outskirts of the three cities and in the country as far asthe flood as had extended.Therefore the greatest trouble of all was the inability to organize large gangs of laborers for the purpose of clearing the streets, not that the men were unwilling to do the work, but because there were so few men who survived the dreadful disaster.....
And yet the situation in the sad stricken city of Joan on the 21th was horrible indeed. Even at this time men women and children were dying from o cold, and for want of food, and hundreds went insane from the terrible strain to which they had been so dreadfully subjected.....
In his own appeal fo to the whole Abbé Abbieannian country for aid, issued on the 21th to another point,, the Mayor of Joan city said fully fifty thousand people ad had lost their lives either from starvation and exposure, this estimate being based upon the personal information of many witnesses. The military who took possession of the city to keep out the ghouls said the death list was liable to be even greater than that id if aid did not arive soon and he was backed in his opinion by hundreds of other very conversative men who even did not dare to make any exaggeration in the losses, and who felt that they were justified in letting not only the whole Abbieannian nation but the whole world us a well know the fullest extent of the disaster in order that the necessary relief and sympathy might be supplied and extended.And to make it better it was the general opinion that for any one to hide hide any of the facts he would deserve to be jailed as a criminal. The Mayor of Joan Joan city or others were not any such things as sensationalists but they well well knew that the people of the very nation and the christian world itself wanted nothing else but the truth, and also if the people of the Abbieannian country felt that they might be deceived in anything they would be justified to close their very pocket books and refuse to give anythingeven to the aid of the cause it itself.. And when all was the truth they would and should respond to the appeal for aid most generiously.

When relief was finally being sent it was remarkable how soon enemiy enemy raiders tried to interfere with everything, but the christian military was close by here, and most of the provisions were directed safely into the town despite the attack of the Glandelinian raiders and when the supplies came in the surviving women of the city plucked up courage and even were seen to go to work with the men. The women too had suffered frightfully but they as well as the men had refused to give up hope, and hundreds called upon the Mayor and upon infamieries and offered their services as Red Cross and other nurses.Others prepared all bandages possible for the many wounded and aided the many doctors in procuring medicines for the sick and injured and food for the starving.
They even went along with the men cold and stormy as it was and cheered the men who were disposing of the dead bodies by their bright faces and soothing words. Indeed they were everywhere and indeed their presence was as rays of sunshine after the black clouds of a great storm. A regular long line of freight cars was plying under heavy guard between Chamberlane city and Joan only sixty miles distant, and whose only railway communication had not been destroyed by enemy or flood. And as another railroad line toward Joan city had also been repaired by thousands of workmen trains were sent in there as close together as possible under heavy guard but this did not prevent the many thousands in Joan city from dying of starvation, or from freezing to death, and exposure and lack of medical attendance.
One of the soldiers who took charge of the military work in Joan city gave the following description of the dreadful reign of terror caused by the disguised Glandelinian thugs and ghouls.
"Joan city to my view suffered in every inconcievable way since the dreadful disaster of the 13th of November. Flood, and cold waves and blizzards came first, then famine, exposure, and and then raids by cavarly soldiers of the enemy and dreadful scenes of vandalism. Scores of thousands of reckless Glandelinian spy criminals and others at nigh night would flock from the near by Glandelinian army by every means that could bring them there and despite resistance of the christian soldiery were absolutely unchecked in their dreadful work of the robbery of the helpless dead for nearly three days.
On the fourth day however a portion of general Vivians army had moved up close to render what aid it could, and the generals sent seventy thousand men and three hundred with an rtillery batterly there to go on guard duty in the streets and elsewhere and being ordered to promptly shoot all those Glandelinians found looting, and they carried out their instructions to the best while great hordes of christian cavarly were stationed at all parts of the citys surburbs to keep the Glandelinian cavarly from making future raids.
(Over 1,000 ghouls were shot in one afternoon and evening after fierce fighting withthem and no mercy was shwo shown to the vana vandals who were captured. If they were not killed at the first volley of the troops, the coup-de-grace was administered. All of the robbers were found to be disguised Glandelinians, and after being shot down and searched were found loaded with all kinds of sp l spoil, even jewelry wrenched from the bodies of women and even little children, money and watches and silver silverware and many other countless articles taken from the ruins of residences and business and other public houses.
These Glandelinian fiends did not only rob the dead for the sake of their wicked cause but they cut up the bodies as well, in many instances fingers and ears of dead women and children being amputated in order to secure the jewelry and other arc articles. All of the business organizations of Joan city that survived also furnished many guards to assist in patrolling its streets and fully twenty thousand men were placed on guard duty. Most of the vandals who were killed fight or fought it out for d hours and many did win their fights and routed the military, but then a portion of the cavarly would join in and the ghouls would be vanquished. The Glandelinian bandits as a rule obtained entrance to thecity by representing themselves as having been christian citizens from other towns engaged to do relief work and to aid in burying the dead. within two days nearly 10,000 ghouls had been shot and then the outlaws were afterwards puthout of the way by hundreds, and by the score, it being their habig habit to travel in immense gangs and never insmall. In every instance the pockets of g these soldier bandits were found filled with every inconcievable plunder a person can imagine een even private and public letters and every other kind of mail correspondences.....

Though Chamberlane and Pass, and also Topsy was not injured by the flood though the flood came there also to a depth of ten feet in some places and only hasted provisions in lower stores bodies by thousands brought from the wrecked cities were tossed into the streets of these places by the flowing waters, and within two days after the recession of the flood upwards of 23,567 bodies had been gathered up and thrown into the water of the river or burns buried in trenches. Even Captains of river barges were forced towork and help in towing the bodies of dead to be sunk into the river and hundreds of barges containing seven hundred bodies each were sent out to the deepest part of the Aronburgs Run River the corpsses then being thrown into the water after having been hu heavily weighted to prevent the possibility of their aft erwards coming to the surface. In this city were were many volunteers for this unusual work but men wereulso impressed into the service, and handled the bodies of men women and children.

The authorities of these three places slightly affected by the flood at first could not understand where all these bodies came from when they found out quickly enough that no one in these three towns had been drowned by the waters. But no attempt had been made to gather up the water logged and frozen bodies at night because in one of these towns especially Chamberlane the gas and electric light plants were so badly damaged that they could furnish no illumination whatever.. Three days after the flood however some of the street lights were ready for use. There were so many of the bodies which floated into the streets of these towns that no effort at identification had been made by those disposing of them it being suggested that the bodies being disposed of as soon as possible. While the barges containing the bodies were on their way to the deepest part of the river lists were made but that was the only care taken in regard to the victims many of whom were the most prominent citizens of the cities of Sperryville, Schloedertown and Pass. Of the scores of thousands buried at Rose and Topsy and at other places in the flood swept districts where the waters only ran to adepth of six to only four feet in the streets not one could be identified, and the bodies were so badly frozen that they had to be broken out of the fields of ice left by the more stationary portions of the flood freezing up during the below zero spells.

Ninty six thousand bodies were buried at Ophelia city, toward which the flood had also brought them from Sperryville or Schloedertown, and all but eighty hundred of which floated to that place from which--well to say better only heaven knows where.None of these either were identified and they too were all frozen that they were as hard as logs of wood. Some troops here stationed at Ophelia city and Chamberlan and also Rose and Topsy to prevent all those who could not give a satisfactorily account account of themselves from boarding trains bound for the three badly wrecked cities. In burying the dead outside of Ophelia no coffins were used, the supply being completely exhausted and there was notime to even knock an ordinary pine box together. The people of the city even buried the strange corpses in their own yards.

As far as possible the bodies were even cremated vast funeral pyres being erected but outside the city and the corpses placed thereon the incineration being under the sup supervision of the military. Matters even came to such a pass that even the casting of bodies into the river was not only difficult for those who handled them out there was the utmost danger in carrying the bodies to the boats for fear of the workers crashing through the ice of the frozen flood, in an effort to bring them to the barges of the on the river beaches.

All the graveyards of these cities because of the flood were not fit for burial purposes and even no attempt was made to reach them because most of the flood had remained outsi outside inthe country and had frozen hard. It might have been deemed very unfeeling and even brutal but the fact wasthat the bodies of the undified unidentified victims which flouted into these tows recieved as it seemed no consideration wha tever being handled roughly by the men who worked to dispose of them and were thrown into bogs and trenches as though they were animals and not human beings. No prayers were uttered save in isolated instances and the more mangled bodies were consignedto the trench as quickly as possible. The burying parties had no time for any sentiment whatever and also so accustomed had the workers in these dead gangs become to their grewsome task that they even laughed and joked about the fact that the flood brought strange dead bodies into the town from other places,while they were laying away the corpses.

But special attention was given to the wounded and some refugees who had fled to these towns for shelter. Doctors had to be onduty all the time and victims not so badly hurt were putuidaside for those suffering and actually requiring the services of the surgeons, and there were thousands of them. There were not one of the refugees who did not bear the marks of wounds of some sort.

The experience and adventures of those who were in the great and disasterous flood and af escapte after undergoing the most frightful anxiety should make unusual reading if not interesting. The thousands who did survive the flood and who emerged in safty from the fearful inundation were more than unusually fortunate when it is considered that possibly more than a million in Schloeder town and Sperryville alone lost their lives and hunureds of thousands fell victims to the fury of the wildest and most extensive flood on record in the territty adjacent to the ill fated cities.

Jack Galves member of a local Local branch of the Calverinia State board of the Gemini and residing at St Charles was present when eight hundred and fifty five highclass soldiers and officers conveying away to an Abbisannian camp about two hundred rescued child slaves on a Government special train on the Aronburg Lines which left near the christian armies under Hanson Varian early the day before the flood lost their lives. Jack Galves was on this train and fortunately together with a few others sought safty ina big log cabin on high ground near Alven Point and was saved. The train reached the vinicity of Chamberlane about noon and all preparations were made to run the train on a bridge which crossed the Aronburgs Run whose waters recieveing that of the flood was then at the level of the structure and also overflowing the land for miles. At this time the flood was rushing past so swiftly that it was impossible to cross the bridge and the confuctor conductor of the train after allowing it to stand on the tracks for a few minutes started to back it toward Big Girl Knool. The force and pressure of the flood waters increased so rapidly coming in from the open sea of flood waters that soon the water had reached a level with the bottom of the seats within the cars. It was then that a few of the passengers including Jack Galves sought safty in the log cabin on high ground but in spite of all efforts the remainder of the passengers including the child slaves were carried away or drown and as the train was soon engulfed by the flood and entirely wrecked/

Many of the killed soldiers were fromigeneral Hansons lines as this being a soldiers train made direct connections with the Mic-hollester and pandora Aronburg Limited on the two nights before. Those who were saved however had to spent five days in the miserable log cabin on almost no rations and without fuel. The experience was one they will remember as one of thes most terrible of their whole lin lives. The place though not reached by the raging flood was surrounded by water all that time.

One of the graphic descriptions of another manns experience was given by a forig foriegne foriegner who was a world tourist, and he claimed he had come from America. His story was especially interesting because it therefore shows with what suddenness the great flood assumed a dangerous character!

" I have seen many floods and read of them, in my own native country and elsewhere." He said. I remember the flooding of Galveston, Johnstown, and even other places by tidal waves and the breaking of dams, but nothing like it here.

There was on the first day some high waters in the streets of Sperryville and also a high cold windo d wind was blowing and it was snowing. But so little at first was thought of it however that I and some of my companions started down to the lowest floor of our building just to take a interesting look at the sudden appraing waters in the streets. But to our surprise the waters came up so rapidly that we turned and hurried as fast as we could to the upper floors of the building warning the others in thr the building meanwhile. Before we reached the second floor however we had to wade in water coming into the building waste deep.

Within half an hour women and children began to flock to the upper stories of the building for refuge having fled from those lower down. All were panic stricken as the rising of the flood showed no signs of abating. Outside I saw the streets filled with rushing waters and in the water were many bodies floating past. I saw three women with some children trying to get into the building by a window but they were swept away and drowned before any of us could aid them. This foriegner was one of the first to cross from Sperryville to Big Girl Knool after the flood subsided. He paid a boatman fifty five dollars to make the crossing. When he reached that point he found the wreck of some long train of passenger cars with the water several feet deep around them and the cars crushed in and the seats torn up and the engine swept from the train and lying about four hundred yards off. While he then waited on top of one of these cars waiting for the waters to go down still more the bodies of men women and children floated against the train. He counted fourteen hundred bodies that had drifted up against the cars all showing that they may have died more frim being dashed against wreckage than from drowning.

Another man who passed through a flood and storm near Calverine city six years before the outbreak of the war suffered such hardships in the city of Pass during this big flood that he was convinced that the hurricane and flood from the Sea was nothing in comparison to this flood produced purposely by the enemy. He was one of the refugees picked up at Chamberlane. His name Turner Joice a workman p workman on a farm and before the flood he had gone to the city to visit friends and relatives.

" Though not too deep at first the waters came into the streets so suddenly that I and thousands were surprised," he said. At about two oclock fearing that some river was overflowing its banks I left for home. I got to my folks about ten minutes after two and found the house surrounded by six feet of water with the flood running through the streets with the speed of a race horse. The waters roared and swirled debris before it, and it began to grow worse and worse, the water getting higher rapidly, and its pressure stronger until it was almost as bad as the inroads of the sea in a storm with its raging turit torrents. Finally the house was hurled from its foundation and demolished.

There were about eighteen families in the house which was a large two story frame and of the one hundred and ten men women and children residing there, myself and little daughter were the only ones who could get away. I managed to secure a air raft of drift wood or wreckage, and got on it going with the direction of the speeding flood. I had gone down but only a block and a half with the flood before some wreckage protrud ing from the water in an upright position struck my raft, a piece of timber hit me and knocked my little girl from my arms. It was impossible for me to save her and I was com, elled to see her drown. I was carried swiftly on by the flood, sometimes on a raft, and again I was thrown from it by coming in contact once more by pieces of timber, parts of houses, logs and floating roofs and other things which were floating around in the flood which to me seemed so wide you could not see across it. Many and many a terrible knock I got on my head and body untill I became black and blue all over. The current of the flood was taking me forward at a most terrific rate of speed, and the waves rushed and roared. I drifted and swam for two days and nights, not knowing where I was going or what in br in what direction and most of the time rinsing the water warm I kept in it as much as it was safe being a good swimmer, for above the flood the air was so cold that I could have frozen to death if I remained half an hour on a raft. About on the third day the raft grounded on a shore, and then I knew the flood Had thrown me to safty. I clambered out of the water, and facing the cold winds wandered around with my clothing frozen to my body untill I came to a farm house on a slope, and there the f farmer gave me some dry clothing and good attention to prevent t the effects of my dreadful exposure while in the flood.

I had lost most of my best things soon after the flood started, and only wore a coat and trousers, had no shoes, or underwear. I was in the water exposed to the winter temperature for more than three days and nights, and this sensation together with the feeling of all these bruises I have on my head and body, and of facing the zero winds is surely not a pleasant one. I managed to saf save my own life through the hardest kind of struggle but with the weather so cold I thought more than once I was surely done for and I lost all I had in this world,----relatives, and all that were dear to me and also my home which I had saved money for fo forty years to build.

Francis Hendro a well known citizen of Schlesedertown,,, saved about ten lives during the very beginning of the flood but lost his very own. The story of his great hero ism was told by his wife who survived the flood who has a summer home at Big Dirin Dirin Big girlkndol.

" My husband was reading a morning paper at our home" said Mres Hendro" when my husband rushed into the building and called from floor to floor for every one to run for their lives. The flood coming through the streets like a tidal wave was on them in an instant and almost before t ey they could leave the building to go to a higher structure and where the Melby's big brick mansion stood some five or six blocks away the rushing waters were allabout them nearly five feet deep. Mr pendro struggling againstthe flood elements be bore me to safty to the Melbys home, the both of us miraculously escaping being crushed by a heavy jam of swiftly moving wreckage which the rushing waters of the flood carried along the path way of our escape. u peturning immediately despite the peril to the house Mr Hendro in like manner brought hartly to the brickhouse his aged father and mother. His next act of Heroism was to rescue a woman and her two daughters daughters two grand children and another woman who happened to be his aunt. Then after the successful rescue of two other women he was engulfed in the flood waves. The Melby Mansion withstood the pressure of the flood but our own home and many houses and [illegible] and within our view were either demolished or swept away. "

George Anders who was a passenger on the first Aronbur Limitied to arive at Big girlknoo Big girlknool the day following the great flood disaster spent four thrilling days and nights in a big hotel in the city of Joan, One thousand one hundred and sixty five persons shared his memorable experiences. The Hotel Hotel stood alone and isolated from all other buildings and therefore was exposed to the full force of the flood. He states the experience as follows;

" The potel, standing as it does isl isolated and alone" he said" believes the full brun of the greatest and most destructive floods I have ever seen in my life, an and the first strong push of the current occured at eight oclock in the evening and shook the big building so hard that it was followed a by a tremendous sound of shattered glass which I believe was that many of the windows overhead had given way on account of the vibration, for under the irrestible pressure of the floodthe building shook as if there was an earthquake. This was the beginning of ninty four hours of mortal dread. All night and the next two days the flood continued to increase and rise in depth with unabated fury, and the roar of the waters and the banging of the wreckage was continually accompanied by the same sound of crashing glass as one after another of the many windows was broken by the vibration s of the building. Frightened panic stricken women clasped their children in their arms as if though they expected to be tornasunder the hd next morning. All of the men in the lower portions of the structure were seen to be scanning the stairwaas and beginning to go up to the upper floors with the intention to take such positions as seemed to be the best and most conductive to safty in the event the huge building was either bloo flooded to the upper stories or raised by the force of the water.

The crashing of so much glass was often by such shaking of the building followed by many other sounds especially that of rip ing and tearing. To add to the terror and confusion the eletric lights in the building suddenly went out and the building was left in absolutely darkness except where the hotel hands stood with lantrens and other lights. Section after section of build buildings were seen tofloat past ad move at a rate as it seemed of a hundred miles an hour. Many of the people panic stricken be because of the darkness started to move tard the entrances of the big building with the evident intention of seeking safty inother places but when they went down a flight they found the lower floors flooded, and then looking out the windows they were surprised and horrified b by the blinding sheet of water which was rushing past with great speed and mighty force and which lay between them and any place of refuge. They then hesitated between a choice of being caught in the roaring torcents and possibly engulfed by swirling windrows of wreckage or remaining in the hotel untill the end. The question however was soon settled.

Even as they looked a whole row of big buildings on the opposite side collasped before the pressure of the flood waters, the whole front side of another big hotel was torn off and many of its inmates hurled without warning into the flood. A lmost simultaneously a series of outcries and loud screams went up from the people in another building across from the hotel as the skylight and a portion of the roof on top was shat shaken down by the vibration of the structure and fell crashing down upon those seeking refuge in the upper stories causing great pandemonium. This therefore seemed to satisfy those in the hotel that no matter where you might try to go you could find no haven of safty, and they therefore determined to make the best of the situation.

Just then above the roar of the flood, the crashing of glass, and the noise of wreckage floating past, or pounding against the hotel a sudden new sound was heard. It seemed to be that of falling bricks and timbers. Everyone in the rooms stood crouched, prepared to leap to either side as the occasion might require for it is true that everyone realized the awfulness of the situation , but strange to say there was no shrieking, and neither did any of the women faint.

Even the women stood the awful ordeal with such unusual fortitude as to lend courag courage to the most cowardly man. Even the children were mute and clung to their mothers nggks necks in horror and breathless despair, for nearer and nearer came that awful and most strange rumbling. A tremendous shower of brick mortar and timber fell in their front some were hit some were not but no one were killed. Yet fd fee if any doubted that the end had come and that in another moment all of them would be buried n beneath the ruins. But suddenly the sound had ceased and nothing else came, and the building still seemed to be intact. It was soon learned that at one portion of the hotel the wall had been driven in by a house being hurled against it. As soon as this became known the effect upon the one struck mass was eletrical. The men were seen to light cirgars or cigarettes, women cheered and laughed, and though chimneys fells more glass was shivered, and the dashing wreckage continued to pound furiously against the building untill the flood finally receded, there was no more panic or confusion, and all felt that the building would withstand the pressure of the flood before it receded. And it did."

ge george anten a war correspondent of the Angelinia gathia pally Imes told to his paper an interesting story of how how he managed to get into and out of Schlesedertown during and after the flood and of hi his observations in this stricken city. He went to Schlesedertown on the morning of the flood, over the Evangeline St Claire railroad, arriving a few hours after the flood began. His narrative is as follows;

"When we crossed the bridge over the Arenburge Rum River going into Schlesedertown proper said the war correspondent" the water already had reached an elevation equal to the upper caps of the pile bents, or one foot below the level of the tracks. I at first thought that some heavy storms had caused the Arenburge Rum River to overflow but the waters seemed to come from a strange and opposite direction to which the river flows. After crossing the bridge, and reaching some point about three miles beyond we were stopped by reason of a washout ahead probably of the tracks, and were compelled to wait three hours and a half for a relief train to come over the Evangeline St Claire railroad track. During this period of three hours and thirty minutes the water rose about four feet and a half running over the rails of the r tracks and almost up tothe level of the seats in the coaches?

The relief train signalled us to rr return a mile and three quarters to higher ground where the passengers were quickly transferred, the train crew leaving with the passengers and going on the relief train. The water by this time had reached an elevat- ion of eighteen inches above the tracks and was flowing in a northwestward and southeastward direction at a terrific speed. The train crew was compelled very often to wade ahead of the engine and dislodge wreckage and driftwood from the tracks. In the next hour we arived at the main railway terminal. At that period of the dead day the flood was increasing and the speed of the waters was about thirty four miles an hour. After arriving at Schlesedertown I immediately went to the big hotel which withstood the big inundation and where , remained the bla balance of the flood untill it receded to a level of two feet. On the afternoon of the fourth day the water began to fill up the rotunda of the hotel and by the evening it was fourteen feet above the third floor of the hotel and about fourty feet above the level of the streets. The lower windows of the hotel were washed out and the skylights over the flooded rotunda fell crashing into the water below by the effects of the vibrations of the building. The refugees who had fled to the hotel at the beginning of the flood had crowded to other portions there being about fifteen hundred persons women and children who had sought refuge there. The upper floorsxwere strewn with terrified people for five days and thirteen hours. The manager of the hotel and the help did everything in their power to help the sufferers from the effects of the flood and to give them shelter. When the flood was on its fourth days duration the waters rushed by at a velocity of an express train but a on the fifth day it had reached the climax, the speed then being fully seventy miles an hour.

The vibration of this big hotel was like that of a building when an earthquake rocks it back and forth. I tried to get some sleep that night but there was so much noise and confusion from the crashing of buildings all around and the pounding of wreckage against the building that I and even all the others could not get an rest.. I arose early on the morning when the flood had abated. And the sights in the streets were so appalling that you can not comprehend it. The water which had still remained from a blizzard now was raging with a seventy mile an hour gale flinging the loose wreckage in all directions. The streets were mass of debris the wires were all down, and all the buildings were either totally leveled or totally wrecked. You could see nothing else for six blocks north, and seven blocks south of the Pranter hotel. Not one building had saved though the hotel in which I was in seemed to have gone through the flood without a scratch.

The refugees came pouring into the heart of the city, in the face of that fearful November blizzard, many of them having but little clothing, and hundreds were almost naked. They were homeless, and without food or drink, facing death from exposure to such weather, and every one had lost property or their all, and were really here in destitute and desperate circumstances.

The Mayor of this city issued a call for a mass meeting which was held that afternoon at ten oclock and was attended by a large number of the surviving and most prominent citizens. Steps were taken to furnish the provions which might still survive in the city and to shelter the living from the cold; relieve the suffering of the refugees, and bury the many dead. A conservative estimate of the number of speople kille killed in the city or drowned is from 445,100 to 500,000.

Early in the morning it was learned that the main water supply for the three cities in generals had been cut off from some reason that was perfectly unknown to even those who made investigations about it. I myself presume however that it might have been caused by the force of the water which may have dislocated the many water pipes running underground. But whatever be the cause, at all events the three of the sleit cities were entirely without water, and something had to be done by the citizens of Angelinia Agathia and also Dorothy Gale to relieve this awful situation. People on the outskirts of these cities who had depended upon wells had their resources swept away, and there were no reservoirs to even be found in any section of these three hard stricken cities.

At Jean city itself the scene on the river docks was a more terrible one than I even expected to see. The small working fleets river fishing fleets, and the larger schooners and river steamers hundreds and hundreds of them were washed up over the docks and into the streets of the city also and even pushed into the very railway yards of the city four miles away from the river in the most frightful confusion. All of the docks along the river front of the city were either frightfully demolished or entirely swept away. All the grain and other big elevators were torn to shreds, and even bigger shippin shipping were anchored off the docks and were in a most frightful condition. The damage to the shipping interest is something immense beyond comprehension, and even all the immense improvements had been swept away.

Hearing of the frightful danger of facing some of these dreaded Glandelinian vandals in disguise I tried to get out of the town as quickly as I could and succeeded in securing passage on a long rowboat. I went alone. When we got outside of the wreck strewn harbor we found a terrible gale blowing and a blizzard raging and the waves of the river was very rough. Yet we took the chances I and the boatman and set our course for Big Girlknool.

As we passed Jeans heights we could see ruins of long lines of ships anchored off where the railroad yards should be, and came to the conclusion that these ships had evidently been carried all that distance from the river to the yards. We also passed within a f w few hundred yards of where a big grain elevator had stood but could see no evidence of that huge structure it having been completely washed away. The frozen remainder of the flood were strewn with immense swarms of dead animals. We had a very hazardous passage running against a strong river current and the river full of floatingice full of floating ice but managed to reach Big Girlknool in the next morning half frozen and hungry. At BigGirlknool we found evidence that the flood had made itself felt there slightly the building c buildings in the outskirts hav g been waterlogged and people had been compelled to wade through three feet of water in the streets. While ther there were no deaths reported in Big Gi d Knool or any property damage to amnon ammount to much there had been many hardships endured during the fight against the flood and then plenty of work for the men to dispose of many bodies which had been brought ther e from the ruined cities and towns. "

One of the most awful tragedies of all times and caused purposely by Glandelinian engineers purposely blowing up the levees of Lake Gellela has visited three cities near Big girlknool in southeastern Calvarinia, close to the Angelinia Boundary line. The three cities are entirely ruined one quarter of the buildings have been e entirely swept away and the dead will probably number 1,000,000!"

So wrote George Alcoss another well known War Correspondent from Angelinia Agathia th the first of his reckless profession to come from one of the three stricken cities after the mighty flood, and who arived at Dorothy Gale city after a perilous trip. He continued;

" I am just from the city of Jean itself having been commissioned by the Mayor and Citizens Committee to get in touch with the outside world itself and make an appeal for help. Dorothy Gale city was the nearest point at which any kind of working telegr telegraph and other working instruments could be established, the wires as well as all buildings in the three cities, and many towns and villages between here and Big Girl knool being washed away or totally wrecked. When I left Jean city shortly before night two days ago, the surviving people were even then organizing for the prompt disposal of the dead, the distributing of food and all necessary work after a period of such a disaster.

That the wreck of the city itself as well as the two others near by was brought on by a flood so immense and so terrific that no one can ever describe the intensity of the rushing roaring waters, the flood turning the tree cities, and especially Jean into a raging sea.

The flood began I believe on a Tuesday morning, previously to that the immense flood had been devastating Merryville, and even then the water in Jean city was very high. Th The flood waters at first came from the North and seemed to be in direct opposition to to rushing of flood waters from the east. While the flood assailed the city upon its eastern side, the river overflowing for some unknown reason piled the water upon the west and north side of the city. About evening it became absolutely certain withoutbthe slightest doubt that this city too was going to be visited with absolute destruction.

Scores of thousands of residences along the river front were hurriedly abandoned , and all the people fled through three feet of water to dwellings in higher portions of the city. Every home was opened to the refugees, but to increase the terror of it all the waters kept on rising and rising; and the speed of the waters carried wreckage past with express train speed.

By ten oclock at night the waters from the east and west met; and by midnight the whole city was submerged. The flooding of the elstric light plants gas plants and others left the city in total darkness, and to make matters worse a terrific bit windand snowstorm set in. The winds continued to rise and grew colder and colder; and it snowed in suchblinding clouds that even night was turned into a strange white shroud and the sk sky looked as white as the ground. The wind was so fierce that it raised waves even against the current of the flood and dashed the spray into peoples faces with such force that the drops cut like a knife. To go out upon the flooded streets was to commitb comite suicide. The flood by morning still rose higher; and the wind of the blizzard storm was then at its worse; while immense buildings by scores; were falling falling before the force of the water torrent, and the noise of the wind; the strange hissing of the blinding snow; and the roar of the flood added by the crashing of buildings, and the pounding and assaults of great windrows of floating wreckage against remaining buildings were terrifying in the extreme.

For nearly four days the flood continued to rise, even though the sun then was shining, and it was dreadfully cold; I believe ten below zero; but then we know running waters waters di do not freeze. During all this time day and night the people of Jean city were like rats in a trap. They faced the fury of flood, exposure to the cold without proper shelter and starvation. The highest portion of the city wasthirty was thirty to fourty five feet under water, while in the great majority of cases the lower sections were submerged to a depth of sixty to seventy feet. The sides of floating houses, or even those resisting the pressure of the flood were shermuted in immense sheets of ice and floating wreckage also. To leave a house was to either drown or freeze to death. To remain was to court death in the wreckage. Such five days and nights of such agony probably has never been equaled before.

Without hardly any apparent reason on the morning of the sixth day the floods began to gradually subside, and within three more days the waters had gone down three feet, and before another week was p the streets were practically freed of flood waters. Though I do not know if it is true or not it is said more people froze to death in the exposed ruins of their houses than drowned in the flood waters. And in the meantime another" Beautiful blizzard" storm with a sixty mile wind let loose to add to all the other complications.....

None of the buildings had escaped injury to even the slightest extent, and when the floo flood receded even so slowly afterwards the lower po tions of the buildings still remaining were so covered with ice that they looked more like the ice br by icebergs that are usually observed in the Polar Regions and the wreckage in the streets were

yet when the few survivors who who had escaped death went out at daylight on the day following the complete disappearance from the flood from the streets, to view the wreck of the torrent, they saw the most horrible and sato antonishing sights that even a saint himself nor an angel either could even believe could be true(lost my shoe() in the six blocks or as far as you could see from Turner Avenue to St Angelonies strret street I saw the ruins of buildings seemingly pretending to be ice burgs and intermingled in the frozen wreckage I believe I could estimated eighty thousand bodies. Four hundred corpses were observed within two blocks. The whole of the business front for as far as they could be viewed along the friver front was stripped of every vestige of habitation, the buildings, every kind of structure, the great river bathing and other establishments the elevators, and every structure having either been carried entirely away f by the flood or its new ice covered and frozen ruins piled in long windrows far into and outside the city, according to the awful and unusual vagaries of the inundation.....

The first hurried glance of this new ice logged city showed that even the largest structures of all, supposed to be most substantially built to even resist tempests and earthquakes, suffered the greatest. Six immense Orphan Asylums which I saw were blocks long, and from some of the remaining ruins had been from three to six feet high on Twenty Eighth and Albro Streets had been entirely washed away by the force of the flood torrent, and how many of its little inmates have been swept away with the ruins no one can ever ascertain.

Of the sick in twenty hospitals and infa infirmaries it is understood no one had been saved, may worse than that where these buildings stood there is now only a windrowed sea of frozen wreckage of timbers and brick. The Old Peoples Home on Children Avenue collasped by the force of the flood and was also washed away, and on Bargin Street the St Anns big Catholic School is a flatened mass of wreckage. The Galileo High School as I observed is an ice covered empty shell looking more like walls of ice with windows than the remains of some huge building. Every church in the city, are also in a similar condition and also presenti the scene as broken ice burgs.

At the fortified works swept away by the flood all the garrison are reported either frozen to death on floating wreckage which they might have sought as refuge, or drowned, they having only been in temporary quarters, which gave them no protection whatever against the flood, and blizzard storms.

The entire river front of the city was totally wiped out, and the docks are wrecked and even the great warehouses have either been half leveled or entirely washed away. The elevators that are seen still standing have lost all their their superworks and their stocks are all damaged by water. The river life saving stations were carried away the crew who survived however being swept down by the flood for a hundred miles through exposure to storms and cold but most of them survive. I saw Captian Miller yesterday and he told me his wife and children, and two of his crew freze to death on a raft.

The flooded region near and within Sight of Big Giri Knool, Chamberlane, and Jean and Topsy contains enough wreckage to rebuild a hundred small towns. Eight hundred persons who were swept across the river by the flood were picked up there half frozen and hungry but alive. Countless corpses were picked up in the streets of these towns a sight which astonished the people greatly; in addition to the living and the dead which the flood cast up at Big Giri Knool city and other places countless caskets and coffins from the washed out cemeteries of the three wrecked cities, and elsewhere were fished out of the water, at any of these places, but near Big Giri Knool proper.

The big provision mills, tanneries, bagging factories, cotton mills, the gas works, the electric light works, and all the industrial establishments of these three ruined cities are totally crippled, and wat waters of the flood that had remained any where ha has now frozen tight so that at the deepest part of the remaining floods way but in the country people could go skating without danger of breaking through. The wreckage so frozen together had to be blasted so the bodies could be removed, and the work therefore performed is immense.

Many of the stories of the escapes are unusually miraculous. One man whose name I could not learn was buried in the flooded ruins of a mill and when dug out after the flood had receded had no further injury than a few bruised finger fingers and suffering from the wet andcold. The secretary to the Lumber mill which also was wrecked and all the lumbdr in the yards swept away, was knocked senseless when his home collasped but was revived by the water, and carried thirty miles away by the flood and dispossited on dry land on the higher elevatelen and there rescued by people who thronged the shore for many miles looking for those whom they could rescue.

To make things more strange three women who had just given birth to a child were carried from their homes to a house six blocks distant, the man who carried them having to hold them high above their heads, as the water was six feet deep when they were were removed. Many stories hundreds of them were told, of houses falling and inmates escaping only to be frozen to death. Jack Quimble, editor of the Jean evening News had his family and the familes of three neighbors in in his immense wooden house when the lower half crumbled before the force of the flood, and the upper half slipped down into the rushing waters. Not one in the house was hurt, but some of these died of exposure to the terrible cold. Of the Begilis famili family all perished. Of the Arenburg family only one is known to have been saved and that was a little boy. The Family of general Herdrugo in a general in charge of the camps at Dorothy Gale was reported to have been saved. Of the southern Calverinia Lumber works little remains but the foundation. Half a hundred million feet of L. lumber was swept away and the owner of it said as far as his company was corne concerned, it might as well start all over again. Eighty big river steamers were torn from their moorings and stranded in the streets of the western portion of the city. The Abbiss nn was carried over the river flats from the Fourty Second Street river wharf clear to within sight of Big Girlknool and lies in the wreckage covered pier at the front of the city. The Alcove steamer is stranded between Big Girl Knool and Chamberlane. A big ocean liner even was swirled around through the flood, crashed through the houses, and is now lying in a few feet of water near the wreckage of the railyard yards.

The steamer Argon was carried across the Turner Flats and is stranded about fourty miles up toard Jean town. The Arden Steamer was torn from her wharf and dashed upon the Turner Flats and the bow of the Abbieannian steamer called the Red House which had previously been hurled there ? The stern of the Arden is stove completely in, and the bow of the Abbieannian ship is crushed. Down the river channel to where the jetties were many other river craft lie grounded and wrecked. Many river schooners, barges and smaller craft are to be seen strewn bottom side up in every portion of the land where the flood swept. It will take months to make a list of all the dead and the losing missing and to get an idea anything near the monetary loss. It is safe to assume that all of the property of every place in the path of this mighty flood is wiped out, and that all of the surviving people will be facingabsolute poverty.

At Chamberlane several people out in the country were drowned. The searchers came across a flooded but now frozen farmland and the body of a farmer and those of his wife and children were found frozen hard into the ice. Many other men ventured too near the flood during its height just to see it at its worse and were caught in the torrent and drowned. Chamberlane was flooded to a certain degree but few of the buildings are injured but all of the structures nevertheless tell the fury of the flood and their lower portions also are covered thickly with ice, yes better to say dressed in skirts of ice. The hotel on the outskirts of that town has a seating ice for seating of ice for three stories up and all the windows are out.

Wherever a person may view the now frozen remains of the flood it is a most common sight to see countless small craft, such as steam and gas launches, schooners, row boats, and other sleep fro frozen in the ice and also almost nothing but ice themselves. The life boats of the life saving station was carried by the flood into the streets of Big Giri Knool, while a vase vessel that had been anchored in Ft Peters bayou near Jean city lies high and dry five miles south of Big Giri Knool.

The flood certainly did wonders in strewing these ships and craft all about the country.

The great f. flood which had devastated these three cities and villages and towns is probably the most terrible flood disaster that have s pt over a city or town, and my experience was similar to that of the many others who escaped. The situation of many cities and towns in Southern Calverinia exposes them to fierce flood whenever there is a disaster j such as this. The city of Jean is about fourty five miles long and ten miles in width. The city is b t closed to the banks of the Mighty Arenburge Gun River and the opening to the ri lies the water a free sweep into the streets of the city h when ever a flood starts.. In this way flood waves running several feet high can pour immense volumes of water into this treacherous river causing its waters to ri e rise many feet and flood all the low lands. In the rush of the waters back toard the river the flood therefore sweeps the whole city. It is very rare however that floods are so severe that they can inundate such big cities like this flood has done. In this heavy flood however the great waves of water swept across the city from the river, and the eastern flood added to the destruction in rushing back to the river from the northeast.....

When the flood struck Jean city I was in shouse near the rivers edge. The flood lifted the house off its foundation and dropped it into the water. With other familes we took refuge at a house at much higher elv elevation but even there we were driven to the fourth story..

Another man whose name is said to have been Jacksonia Francis and while who owned a large flat building and whose wife was killed, and for whose body and those of his children he was seen searching in the leveled debris of the structure, said there were two hundred families there when the house collasped before the force of the flood, and he was the only survivor..... The Policeman of this city at the direction of the Chief and some others rescued about five hundred people during the very height of the flood, and indoing so faced the fury of the blizzard storm then raging raging. They returned to the police stations only when the high water floated the patrol wagons and threatened to drown them and their teams. They had no idea that the waters of the Arenburge Gun River had invaded the western part of the city with worse disaster where they lived untill after they returned to their stations. Then seeing the flood still rising and growing stronger in its speed they started immediately for their homes but they found their homes and their families had been swept away. The chief of the Police lost his wife and five children and a father and mother too. Many refugees, thousands of them were picked up at Chamberlane, and taken to the hospit als there where they were given every possible attentio. Many of these refugees were suffering from injuries and having been in the water most of the time and facing exposure suffered from the effects of the strain in the ice cold water and the cold of the weather. In all the three cities wherever the debris had not been wetted down too much by the flood great smouldering fires raged among miles upon miles of heaped up debris, covering the very sky with the most intense clouds of black and white smoke, and at night throwing a terrific glare upon the heavens.....

The people who had been picked up at Ophelia and who in spite of cold and storm had floated in on drifts and rafts reported that what may have been left of the cities might soon burn up in the fires whose lights could be seen as far as Angelinia Agathia at night. One of the party came ashore near Big Girlknool on a large ice crusted and covered table, and another on a plane.

No one in Big Girl Knool knows where they came from but nevertheless nearly a million ammunition boxes, and gun cassions were found near the outskirts of this city, and a hundred big pile drivers, de dreg dredges, and locomotives and railway cars of every kind was was driven toward Big Girl Knool by the flood and left within a few hundred yards of the city. The prairies all around Big Girl Knool was covered with wreckage drift frozen hard in the ice of the petrified flood, dead cattle, and human beings, craft of all sides, thousands of bug buggies, wagons, autos, household furniture of every description, books, musical instruments of every possible make, pictures, and such like that persons could find in every Stationary store. The searching parties had to blast the fo frozen flood to remove the many dead bodies and bury them.

One of the refugees who arrived at Angelinia Agathia on the first relief train from Big Girlknool, and who had a most harrowing experience as well as a sorrowful one was the Sheriff of one of the country towns which had been completely swept away. His family consisted of his wife and seven children. When his house was washed away by the sudden flood he managed to get his seven children and wife safely on a large floating side of a house and with them he drifted helplessly about. With the blizzard storm raging, the wind caused his raft to collide with wreckage of every description and also floating trees and finally a big tree split it in two and he was forced to witness the d drowning of his wife and children being unable to help them in any way. This sheriff said that were the country towns had stood and farm lands was now a sea of water frozen solid.

After losing his wife and seven children he had remained on the other section of the raft until the current of the flood drove it partly near to the shore and then by swimming and drifting around for hours finally reached solid ground. Despite the difficu difficulty he experienced in keeping afloat and of facing the cold weather, he held out to the end and reached the shore safe and sound. He said wherever the wreckage even in the country was seen piled up high, in spite of it being frozen at many places it was a dreadful smoking smudge, and so many fires of this sort were burning that it gave the appearance of a great fire burning up the very country side itself.

Another survivor came ashore at Popsy city in driftwood half frozen and ill. He said he had been attatched to a soldiers train which passed through the territory not far from Gehleodertown and said that at Little Chillie creek the train f crew and passengers heard cries coming out of a pile of fiercely smoking and blazing wreckage. Many persons answered the cries, and found a number of women and children fastened under a crushed roof, and underneath flames were quickly licking toward them. Most of the wreckage was so frozen and wet that the debris had to be blasted in order to loosen it but they finally pulled them out before the flames reached them, and they then informed their rescuers there were others under the debris. A continued search resulted in the finding of two hundred and fifty nine dead bodies, all women and children half roasted in the smouldering fires that burned around them. They were literally cremated.....

When the train arrived at Big Girl Knool it was seen the flood had been there too?

One of the most prominent citizens of Angelinia Agathia City and who had been among the missing for four days and six hours, arrived at home about the evening a week after the inundation, direct from Sperryville and indeed was recieved with joy by his family. This man whose name is Phillips Alton Altos went to Sperryville three days before the days of the disaster, and was there all the time during the terrible flood, and a week after, where he laded in the work of rescue and saw some sorrowing sights, and the greatest fires ever known. He said long windrows of wreckage miles long burned, the upper portions of buildings which were not touched by water were afire, and he said that those who did survive the awful flood got through the horrible disaster almost by a miracle.

He said he saw many young men and women who had been black haired the days before the disaster flood come out of the awful ordeal with hair turned completely white on the day when the flood had fi finally receded.....

"It would take 5,000,000 men one year or maybe two" said" to clear the streets and towns of the three ruined cities, providing the big fires did not do it for them, so complete is the ruin. He also said that so sudden had been the vibration caused by the explosion which ripped open the levees of the lake that in the town of Glacklin over seven to eight thousand were said to have perished in the wreckage of the fallen buildings though six thousand bodies were only recovered from the ruins that had not burned by the fire which almost wiped out the town itself....He said the biggest liar in the world could not exaggerate even to save his life the existing conditions of the affair brought on by explosions, fire, and flood..He continued;

" I was in b the big Stanchlin hotel during the great flood. I heard the explosion when sounded t like rolling thunder, and all windows in the building vibrated, and I saw many windows break and fal, in pieces to the ground from houses on the other side. Pondering what the cause of the noise and the storm of glass from all the windows was the people fled to the streets, many believing it was an earthquake for the fact as heard later furniture in all houses acted like as if they were either haunted by strange manner manifestations or were taking sudden fits.

These manifestations and the noise occured early in the morning. Then tward noon came the flood. Then within a few minutes the big hotel was thronged with refugees, women were praying throughout the day and night of the flood, and above the roar of the waters and swirling debris banging and pounding against the house could be heard the crash of bui buildings and loud splash of the waves against the building.

We were marooned in the big hotel for four days and six nights and every minute we expected the hotel to go down the pressure of the flood shook the building so.

At daylight three days after the flood had receded enough that only a foot or two of water remained in the streets, and many others started out to view the ruins. We passed eight thousand bodies within six blocks, and amongst this wreckage great clouds of smoke issued, but some of the wreckage was snow and ice covered and with smouldering fires beneath where the debris had not been made wet by the flood the wreckage smoke and billowed like large volcanic craters trying ti to disgorge all vapors possible.

Even the oder of burning flesh was in the air. When we reached the outer limits of the city where the flood now filled with floating ice cakes was still running high, we stayed some time and while there, about one hundred bodies per minute passed us, floating with the now slow current. Homes which were formly beautiful were now masses of frozen or smoking wreckage. Many of the wrecked houses at portions where the flood had not entered the floors were seething red hot furnaces.

When I left the burning city the stench from burning human bodies was simply terrible and almost unbearable. And it is with the greatest difficulty that any one could get to them at all for the wreckage not burning is so tightly frozen together, that it will take the fiercest kind of blasting to tear it apart, if the wor ers on intent to get rid of the bodies without waiting for summer.

As the Glandelinians are fully responsible for this disaster it would be advisible for the authorities to send under guard all Glandelinian prisoners held in internment camps and make them do the work. The sight of so much frozen houses, burning buildings and wreckage, and frozen bodies stuck tight in the remainder of the petrified flood, odies that had been removed from wreckage of town city after the flood had been immediately piled on drays and hauled to the wrafs of the city by the river where they are lowered into the half frozen water. They are to be seen piled on top of each other like so many animanal animals it being impossible to give them any attention because they are so hard and orfrozen. The bodies of the rich and poor at are treated alike, in this manner. Where the wreckage is burning there is no attempt to put out the fires as it is absolutely useless, as the water systems are wiped out and to let the city burn seems sad indeed. Thousands of men and women even despite the exposure to the cold and danger from the fires n and who are seeking friends or relatives who are among the missing surround the places were the bodies are handled, and their cries of distress are almost unbearable.

There was not a living animal in the city so far as I could even see. Thou ands Thousands upon thousands of heads of cattle and horses were drowned or killed and their frozen bodies are seen thickly cluttered like grain in the frozen waters for miles and scores of miles. No cats or dogs survived the flood, and not a bird is to be seen.

No one can make anything like a reliable estimate of the number of deaths because so many of the bodies have been carried to where God only knows by the flood. I had to walk for twenty miles over the frozen waters of the petrified flood from the place where I started before I got out of the wreckage and windrows of burning debris, and miles of dead bodies. The water swept over the land for a lengthy distance of more than two hundred miles and is a distance of fifty miles in width and dead bodies and wreckage frozen into the sheeted ice are to be seen all over this territory!

I made a forest of trees frozen into the flood on my walk to get a train which showed that the flood may have swept down upon some woods and carried all before it.

The stench of burning bodies in fire swept ruins and windrows of debris not to soaked by the water is awful. It is estimated that o over fifty five thousand head of cattle were drowned by the flood throughout the whole section swept.....

One of the most peculiar and heartrending stories of suffering in Schlosdertown where one quarter of the wreckage was a inferno of flame and smoke for days, was brought to light ten days after the flood had receded, when the Arenburg Limited arived under heavy guard at Angelinia Agathia, from Big Girl Knool. Among the passengers was a woman whose name we cannot recall who was acting so crazy that every one had left the car except one man. This woman had come from pandora Abbie annia and the man who had accompanied her was James gerone of pandora Calverinia. This woman came from pandora Abbiannia to Schlosdertown ariving there on the first day before the explosion and flood accompanied by her husband, who was said to have been a detective of the pandora secret service.

This unfortunate lady and her husband took pa apartmentsin the Stanck hotel a fash ionable place in the eastern portion of the city. All those four days of the b flood her husband had been suffering from an acute of toothache brought on by facing the cold before he arived in the city, and had remained most of his time in the room lying down on his bed with his face on a hot water bottle. When the flood added by the terrors of a violent blizzard and windstorm became very severe after ten oclock at night, the fourth day he arose and went to the window to look out into the night hoping to see whether or not there was danger of complete destruction as was greatly feared.

Suddenly there came an unusual roar and a wall of water burst with a thunderous report against the wall of the structure, and an unusually violent torrent of water poured into the room and washed around so fiercely that he was washed out of the window directly opposite to the one out of hi which he had been appearing and he was literally pulled out and taken along with the flood. His poor wife so far as she was able toexplain instead of being drawn along in the direction of the waters which so suddenly flooded th the room was hu hurled in the opposite direction against the door of her room which burst open by the pressure of the water, and she s was swept into the hall, and in her fright she frantically shrieked for help untill some one came from a floor above and took her out of the water. Later that room and hu liway was flooded clear up to the ceiling.

When she finally came to her senses she found she was not severely hurt, and began to wail for her husband. however there was no reply and several above soon came to her assistance and cared for her untill three days after the flood had subsided.Then they went out together and searched every portion of the smoking frozen city as possible for her missing husband. But not a trace of him was to be found. The search was kept up for three days by which time all the wounded had been cared for An the best possible way, and all the unburied dead had become roasted in the fires among the windrows of burning wreckage and house tops. Then Mr James gerone brought the poor woman via Girl Knool to Angelinia Agathia and they immediately returned to the Arenburg Limited and remained on it untill they reached Pandora Abbiannia the trip also being attended with frequent peril because of the Olandelinians who often tried to wreck the train.

Her husband had on his person some very valuable jewelry and a very large sum of mney money at the time he so mysteriously disappeared. Luckily however Mr Merons had enough money on his own person to pay her way back to Pandora Abbiannia. She was so complete ly overcome by fright, exposure and grief that for a certain time she lost her reason and though she was only thirty years of age she now had all the appearance of being a frail decrepid old woman so terrible had been her recent and most trying ordeals. She had to be closely watched and cared for all the distance while traveling. fortunately for her she had before leaving pandora left her three children, two girls and a boy in the care of her sister in Pandora and therefore they had been safe, and she still had them.

Hansonia D Michael who lived at the address of 10654 Allenby Street Dorothy Gale City,,, was absolutely unnerved by the awful scenes he had witnessed among the ruins of Schlosdertown on the day after the flood had subsided, and hastened as quickly as possible to leave the stricken city, and arived in Angelinia Agathia four days after late in the evening. The sights, of the burning and ice covered wreckage thickly interlo interlocked with many dead bodies constantly before him, and according to the statements he gave he had been absolutely without sleep since he first set foot in the ruined city.

Hansonia who is a bridge engineer, had a run from Angelinia Agathia to Alby Calverin in the state of Calverinia but when he reached the end of his trip and heard of the disasterous flood that swept three cities and destroyed completely many towns he decided to go with a relief party leaving Alby Calverin that morning.The relief train was onlyable to pro proceed as far as Big Girl Knool(sound up on a spool) and from there the goods and provisions were transported to long sleds to be brought over the frozen flood to joan city which place only the survivors had remained as no foe army had appeared there, as it was succored by general Viviane main army... Hansonia wasaccompanied by his two assistants, and although they were with the relief party,, they were frequently stopped by the pickets near the christian lines, and once also by Violet, and her sisters themselves,,, and after much difficulty and hard work to convince the Vivian Girls Girls who they were, they finally gained a view of the city and the dead... while while they were in the midst of their night seeing they were suddenly accosted by a party of Abbiannian soldiers and commanded sternly to assist in the blasting and other work among the burning windrowed wreckage and house tops in the recovery and burial and otherwise disposal of the many dead bodies,, " pretending to obey they after a while managed to draw away from the soldiers and then when no one was looking made a quick run for the limits of the place. They then unobserved were able to leave the city but were forced to make a forced march and a dangerous one across fourty miles over fourty miles over the frozen flood before they were able to reachany railroad line to take them to Big Girl Knool. Reaching Big Girl Knool l- late the next morning they started at once for Little Girl Knool and Angelinia Agathia. Is companions stopped at Jessicia City and Hansonia came steaight straight through.

When interviewed later at his own residen ce in Dorothy Gale City Hansonia said:;;

" The most horrible sights that I have ever witnessed in any of the three wrecked cities which I went through was at joan city proper but first I went to schlosder Town. The wreckage was burning in many places the fire being so hot you could feel its singing effect a hundred feet away and dead bodies were everywhere, either frozen stiff in the ice or cremated in the flames. A large part of Schlosdertown had been entirely blotted out. For a distance of six miles along the north scores upon scores of thousands of houses had been entirely eqshed away, not even the foundations were left, and there now is a endless frozen sheet of ice in which many human bodies are frozen hard.None of the water had hardly receded outside of these wrecked cities therefore turning into ice with the cold weather, and where miles upon miles of business blocks, and residences had once stood were either simply holes marking the foundations or a sea of frozen waters.

This was filled with debris and the bodies of the drowned frozen hard into the thick ice. The sight was ghastly in the extreme, as the working parties would arive at some point and would blastthe ice to remove the bodies or even put explosives among frozen ice covered debris and blow it asunder and then start to drag the bodies of the dead from the flames and from frozen pools of water. The lower portions of the houses are a sight, looking like night mares with their shredded sheets of ice and immensely long icesolues.

Every one abis was expected to work at recovering the dead, and the soldiers forced me and my two companions to assist in the work. At that timewere were standing watching a party of thirty soldiers and men workingunder a guard. They were blasting burning wreckage and then lassoed the cremated bodies and pulling them out also from frozen ice logged debris or ruins of houses, and piling and dragging them out on the higher places and then piling them on dredges and wagons and sleds preparing to bury them.

Just as some of the Abbiannian soldiers were guarding us and directing us at some of the work we were surprised at hearing a loud and terrible outcry which suddenly arose from the many men enguged in the work of recovering the bodies. running quickly to the scene of trouble we saw some strange man was in the grasp of one of the soldiers while another soldier was covering him with his rifle. The man who ever he was was dressed shabbily and were a large drooping hat and stood sullenly eyeing the crowd with his right hand in his pocket.Suddenly we saw his captor grasp his arm and roughly drag his hand from the pocket, and a number of letters, jewelry and some mutilated fingers, and a picture of some little girl dropped to the ground. The fingers themselves had two rings upon on them.

With the sight of these evidences of crime before them the workers seemed to go mad and with cries of' Lynch him' 'Burn him' made wit for the unfortunate wretch with pick axes and crobars and clubs uprisined. Before this he had stood solid and unmoved but the approach of such danger shook his courage, and he sunk to the ground pleading piteously for mercy. But there was no mercy for such a monster and the men were only prevented from killing him then and there,, by the interference of th the soldiers.

" Leave this Olandelinian vai Vandal goy mpy to us" said the sergeant in charge of the party as he ranged his men around the prisoner. " We will atr attend to such cases as this ourselves."

And with that he had the Olandelinian marched over and placed against a wall not more than twelve yards from the bodies he had mutilated. Selecting ten soldiers as a firing squad he lined them up ten feet from the doomed man, and with the word fire" fire "Fire" ten bullets pierced the ghouls body and he fell deadddd dead.Such indeed was a measure of speedy justice which is ben being meted out to such Olandelinian spy vandals in any place. Besides this case I heard of many more where the guilty men were not even giving the benefit of a short court marshall, but immediately shot.

I told my two companions that I did not want any of that kind of work, and that I never could stand the ntion of handling the bodies, or see such sights of bodies crushed in burning houses and wreckage, and suggested that we escape. They finally agreed with me and we gradually edged away from the soldiers and finally made a run and reached the surburbs of the city. Here we finally reached the main flood outside in the open country now solidly frozen over and we walked over it more than fourty miles before we could reach any railroad line to take us to Big Girl Knool. Bad as it is the scenes ar are nothing in Sc Schloedertown compared to ,own city, and it will be a very long time before I ever will want to return to that place or before I can ever forget the terrible scenes I and my two com anions witnessed there. Since I left there I have been seeing the burning dead bodies and others in the petrified i uster all day lying stark and frozen stiff and blue with looks of terror on their frozen faces as though they had realized a sure death was before them without a possibility, of escape or rescue, and night after night I have dreamed of having been forced to handle them. I tell you such things want on the bravest man and I will bless the time and thank God when I can even forget that I was ever in any of these ruined cities.

At ,oan the ruins show that the flood from the river side must have struck the city broadside like an enormous tidal wave, as the buildings are all washed away almost in a most perfectly straight line back from the river shore; and docks. The flood wave from the overflowed river swept away buildings as far as sixteen blocks inland for a length of twenty miles, or the full length of the river side of the city, leaving not even the strongest foundation.

And this ruined part comprised all the best part of the city. All of the biggest city buildings and the entire business portion of the city were swept away and nothing whatever remains to mark the spots wo where business and other blocks woo stood except half submerged and ice bound foundation holes, filled with boards and dead bodies frozen tightly into the ice.

The inhabitants who were rendered homeless and were not albe to able to leave the city are now living in tents furnished by the Abblesanian army stationed close by. A large number of distributing military stations have been established and forces of soldiers were busy issuing food and clothing to the unfortunate people. At this point only the army seems able to supply the provisions as the enemy seem able to prevent other provisions from reaching the stricken places by train. While we were there the cold weather was almost unendurable, and on the level more than two feet of snow was on the ground; and from the fires yet burning and smouldering in the long high windrows of wreckage the stench from the many burning bodies made the task of the relief party anything but pleasant; yet the heat of the flames made it some what comfortable to work despite the twenty below zero weather and deep snow and hindering ice....Water had to be made from thawing out the ice. The elstric light plants were destroyed,; and the city is without light; but the moon has been shining brightly and the working of blat blasting the wreckage to e secure bodies has been cari carried on day and night; the flames lighting up good portions of the city.

Conservative estimates of the number of drowned and those frozen to death made by persons familiar with the city place the loss of life at five hundred and fifty thousand.However no one can really say how many are reallly killed; and it will be very difficult for an accurate statement to w be made as for one reason the marthotiri Authorities are making no attempt at identifying the dead, but also that so many of the bodies have been entirely washed seemingly all over the country and down the river by the flood and scattered all over creation. At first realtives of those who were killed were allowed to accompany the searching parties but this was found to be too slow a method and now the pickets have recieved strict instructions to prevent any person or persons without a pass or card or who are not connected with relief a g parties from entering even the surburbs of the city.

For the first two days after the flood when the cold weather had slackened slightly the dead bodies had been carried out to the middle of the half frozen river in steamers and barges and dumped overboard; or sunk in quick sands and other bogs; but most of the bodies are cremated in the burning wreckage and nothing an be done to reach them as the h heat is so fierce. It hardly seems probable that they will ever be able to rebuild the three cities as long as this war continues. Many refugees came southward, with us and every one man woman or child seemed to be in a hurry to leave the scene of horror and desolation. They act as though they are dazed, and half crazed and no one will talk regarding their escape.

All along the line we were frequently besieged with questions regarding the safty of different persons but of course were not able to give our questioners any reliable information. Hundreds of smaller towns through out the region were a washed away by the flood however it seems these three cities arethe only places to suffer a great loss of life from the inundation. Most of all the dead are drowned or fro s frozen and but few were killed by falling wreckage. In Big girlknool the streets were also gloof flooded to several feet but no damage of any amount was done though the flood brought many dead bodies to that place."

CHAPTER FOUR.

FIRES BURNING IN WINDROWS OF WRECKAGE BELIEVED TO CREMATE BODIES BY SCORES OF THOUSANDS IN THE WRECK STREWN STREETS OF EITHER RUINED CITY. WORKERS FAINT FROM THE EFFECTS OF THE COLD WHILE HANDLING THE FROZEN OR C RNATED BODIES. THOSE WHO ESCAPED GIVE A THRILLING ACCOUNT OF THEIR EXPERIENCES. LIV S LOST AND PROPERTY DAMAGE SUSTAINED OUTSIDE THE THREE CITIES. THOUSANDS OF VICTIMS AND SCORES OF MILLIONS IN CROPS AND OTHER MATERIALS SWEPT AWAY.... ESTIMA ES MADE..

IT WAS believed by estimators that fully eighty thousand bodies pinioned amid the windrows of burning wreckage were cremated at ,oan or Schloeder ,oan and no effort could be made to reach them so fierce was the heat of the flames. Many of the workers who handled the bodies in the wreckage not afire, were overcome by the cold, or suffered from c frozen feet, hands and ears and also noses, and others had to take their places so the work could continue on. To keep their noses and mouths from freezing the men bandages their mouths and noses with cotton cloths, and were relieved by other volunteers every half hour. Those who worked nearer the big raging fires were comparatively warm but those who worked elsewhere suffered intensely from the zero weather. The usual plan however was to collect all bodies within two blocks in one spot and then having them taken away on sleighs and wagons to the river. On the remains of many women were valuable rings and jewelry but the men did not attempt to remove the jewelry for it was buried or sunk in water or quicksand with the owners. The Abblesanian officers reported that their two big gangs of men dragged from the burning wreckage fully 2,345 bodies, the majority women and children. Indeed the percentage of deaths among children was absolutely frightful. Colonel Turner and his soldiers in blasting a pile of burning half scaked and frozen wreckage drew out one hundred and fourty burned bodies so badly burned they were almost charcoal. There were many Catholic priests in charge of gangs of workers also and reported 12,000 bodies burned in the smouldering wreckage.

The sanitary experts pushed the work of getting the dead from the wreckage and there was so much blasting that it sounded like a tremendous cannonade. The bodies were disposed of every way possible even by reburning and no other disposition was even even considered. Even the people who had lost relatives and friends seemed to make no rejections or objections and seemed to look on the plan with favor. Every means for work was used as never before in the world, and at many places extra fires were started purposely to prevent the many workers from being frozen to death for as hard as they worked they often complained of half fro frozen feet hands or ears. The smell of the charnell hell was prevading the whole region from that of burning corpses. It was also decided that all gangs, guards, foremen of gangs; and working parties or otherwise acting under the orders of the city and other departments were use all the diligence possible toard preventing any hardships on private persons or impressing men for servce. The conditions however were becoming so critical, that it finally became so necessary that sanitary precautions be taken to preserve the lives and health of the survivors of the stricken cities, that it was found necessary to secure other volunteers by general impressment. At first this was hoped to be avoided but it was seen the opinion that furtyer delay or procrastination will bring with the coming summer a dread pestilence to fi l finish the dire work of the great flood; the interest of no person firm or corporation could for one instant be spared to secure volunteers for work, and if case of necessity every able bodied man was to be put to work to clear the wreckage; ti fight the big fires; to return all cremated bodies found under smouldering wreckage, and save if possible the lives of those yet remaining.

The miracles of the survivors were many. There are probably many of them even which even if really happening would not be believed by the most dumb of readers. Brought to the hospital at the outskirts of Big Girl Knool was a eight year old girl whose name she said was Rutter Lion; she was found half frozen the following morning lying behind a log on the land side of the flood near the small town of Handle which is thirty miles to the northwest of Big Girl Knool. The little girl when brought to the infirmary had to be treated in every possible way to prevent her from dying from the results of her exposure to water and intense cold.

She told the sisters of that Catholic Hospital that her father mother and two brothers, one sister, and her grand mother and father, and Uncle and Aunt remained in the house. There was a terrible noise of approaching waters, the house went to pieces before the shock of the torrent, and the little girl said she caught hold of a log when she found herself in the water, and floated off with it. She is sure all the others are drowned. She had no idea where it took he her but when daylight came after the first day she was a across the flood, and sat upon the partly submerged mainland near Big Girl Knool.

One of the Nuns of the St Gabriels Orphan Asylum saw more of the flood disaster than fell to the lot of most of the survivors who had the luck to live and tell of it. She had been spending the dreadful time at a large hotel only a short distance from the main flood, with the remaining sisters and the children whom they had been able to save.

At the beginning of the flood the water had quickly risen to three to 6 feet. This was of course at Sperryville. The sisters waded back and forth toward the big hotel bringing the children as many as possible at a trip. This was about tel twelve thirty in the afternoon. At the last trips they had to wade waseist deep in the rushing waters. At two oclock the Sisters became greatly alarmed, and with the remainder of the children they left the orphan asylum and started for the bigger and stronger building. At first neighbors had laughed at the fears of these sisters. Yet though the hotel stood before the force of the flood all houses on every side of it were completely swept away. During the rescue of the children from the home these brave nuns waded and swam alternately seven blocks back and forth until they rescued the last of the children. During the last of the trip they had hired a man with a long dray and told him to take them and the children to the St Francis Hotel as it was called, it being operated by Catholic Authorities.

Within three blocks from where the start had been made, in this way the horses got in too deep water and trapped by an avalnch of swirling wreckage was killed or drowned and the wagon almost upset. They however managed to reach the hotel which was six hundred yards further away. The Nuns declared it was the hardest part of the trip with the rushing waters full of wreckage of every description, and the waters was icy cold and the weather terrible. In the hotel they remained until the flood had gone down totally or that the remaining waters froze hard. Then they went out to the site of the orphan home. The gate posts was all that served to locate the place and beyond was a stretch of water like a wreckage logged sea half frozen and still moving.

No Houses were left standing for miles around;,,.Dead bodies of every kind lay every he everywhere. The nuns with the fifty children went to the main section of the city. Passing a clothing store with plate glass windows and doors torn out they went in with the purpose to hell help themselves to what clothing for the children they could find but the flood had washed everything out of the building. High to the ruins looked like a big piece of ice so thickly covered wh were the walls of the structures, big ice cicles hung from the ceiling and the walls inside and floor were sheeted in ice. They were finallyrefuged by the near by christian camp and the children properly clothed.....

There were thousands of instances of devotion of husband to wife, of wife to husband of child to parent; and parent to child which should and would be mentioned.The first goes asdds as; One poor old woman with her child and her father, was cast out into the raging ice cold waters. T By the force of the raging torrent they were quickly seperated as a swirl of wreckage hit them.both were soon jammed in drift and both believed they went out in the main river and returned,.....The mother was finally half frozen but was cast upon the drift, and there she was p unded by the waves and debris, until she was pulled into a house against which the frozen drift had lodged, and during all that frightful ride she held to her eight years old boy, and when she was on the drift pile she had lain upon the child and covered him with her half frozen body that he might escape the blows of the planks hurled about by the force of the flood waves.. She came out of the ordeal cut and maimed; but her son had not recieved a scratch nor any injury whatever.;;

St Anns Church as one of those in the town which indeed presented one of the most strangest contrasts, with the roof and three of the walls down, and nearly the whole of the interior of the structure washed out, even the wall in the back of the alter carried away, and with debris from other places deposited in the Church. Every wall had collapsed, all the pews and other things were gone, and wreckage of every descriptio description not belonging to the church including every kind of furnuture and several pianos and mue music boxes were there, but the alter was not even in the least least injured in any way; and the smallest of all statues around the alter no matter what kind they were including that of Our Blessed Lord,and the frail life size statues of St joseph and the Virgin on the alter itself were not even reached by the water, moved or harmed in any way.

When their own home went to pieces the members of the allentor family, husband wife and six children--climbed upon the roof of a large wooden house floating by. For a time despite their exposures to the cold winds they felt entirely secure, but without the slightest warning the roof suddenly parted into two pieces. Mr and Mrs Mrs Allentor were seperated. Each had three children. The parts of the raft went different directions in the coming darkness, and to two of the children fee fell of and disappeared.Not until some time three days later was the family reunited. Even even the two children were saved, one having caught a table, and the other a f lo floating chair and clung to them until they reached a place of safty.

Another man took his wife and family from one hous house to another by swimming until he had occupied four, of them. Each house fell to pieces in its u turn, and then they took to the waves and swarming windrows of ice covered debris and at times they were seperated, and each as the persons above mentioned mentioned later to their friends believed they were carried out to the river, and that the river itself may have carried them out to sea. After six hours in the water he heard them and the children calling for help, and finally rescued them..... James Edward Stanck, Francis Pedro, and Alexander Crumble arived at Pandora ,orthern Calverinia the evening of the sixth day after the disaster from Sperryville. They left Sperryville in the morning on the Mic-Modesto and Pandora train with six hundred and thirty other ref refugees and were taken from there far up Northeast to Sacramento Abbieannia. Until they arived at Sacramento they were clad only in under garments and were hatless and coati coatless.

They escaped at six thir y on the morning when the flood was at its fo worst from a shuttered house on the more exposed side of the city, by clinging to logs and floating wreckage and allowing themselves to be swept to higher ground ground. Stanck was struck r repeatedly by floating wreckage but was frequently assisted by his companionsto to safty. A little child a girl she gave these men warning, was also saved with them. Stanck was naked, and the other men were in their night garmentswhen they reached the panic stricken crowds gathered near the big Stanck Hotel but their appearance was similar to that of thousands, hundreds and hundreds of women and even children being rescued for whom clothing had to be at once obtained.

At noon on the second day of the flood they had sufficient space to even move around with comfortalthough filled with the greatest anxiety and penned in on all sides by the rapidly rising waters. Four hours later the fr few streets still above water were congested with immense crowds of hysterical women, crying and frightened children and frantic men?

The seperation of families produced the most saddest of all scenes, when mothers mourned their offspring and men lamented the loss of all dear to them. Yet there was no confusion, only a clinging closer todd togethter without discrimination of class or sex as the waters advanced foot by foot.

At dark on the second day the misery deepened and the women occupied the big hotel and all aprocaches the highest points in the city, and yet the waters continued to advance and to rise buildings and stores were thrown open to provide refuge in the upper stories. The men gave the better positions to the women and children...As midnight approached conditions became worse, many of the women became demented, and in the hotel the women kissed each other and said good bye. They eve even prayed and sung hymns in turn and yet with each announcement that the waters were still rising many of the men and women gave up to the terrible mental strain and fainted/

The survivors paid a high tribute to bravery in the face of death of the women and even the children of thos city and stated that, although abject melancholy had fallen over over all that the spirit of fortitude displayed by the women hevered the Herved the men. The horrors of that night were to be equaled and increased on the succeeding days and nights as the waters continued to rise until they reached their highest marks.

Of all the heroism and dogged tenacy of purpose noted in connection with the big flood which destroyed so much probably none was greater than that of Frank L Arenburg of Big Girl Knool. Mr Aronburg was a engineer for the construction of city bridges and his wife, and three children, two boys and a girl were visiting Mr Aronburgs father and mother in Schlesdertown when the irresistible torrent struck the city... early on the second day of the flood despite the extreme peril when the first news of the effects of the disasterous flood began to drift in, Mr Arenburg announced to the railway bridge President under whom he was working as Assistant or vice President that he intended to start immediately for Schloeder town.

Many in the working crews inlo including the president and others, tried to their to prevent him from venturing on such a seemingly suicdal task but he went to one of the depots and fortunately caught a train leaving for Schloedertown. He boarded it but on account of the flood the train was forced to stop slate sixty miles before it even reached Aronburgs Run River. He then walked on the shore of the flood inall the cold weather one hundred miles driving at the most placid part of the flood near joan city, where it was now covered thick with floating slabs of ice intermingled with wreckage as thick as immense log jams and bodies of dead human beings and animals.

There was no boat in sight, not even a skiff or a canoe; He nevertheless found a large number of immense cypress railroad ties near the waters edge, and having ropes with him he made a large sized raft, and got astride of the risky thing after having placed it in the water, and set out on a most dofficiulit and dangerous journey across this fifty mile wide expa expanse of wreckage ice covered water. Thus he labored for sixteen trying hours in all the cold wind and almost overcome by the blizzard storms raging, the cold wind beating down at him, and his body half covered with the swirling snow; At last when almost in the goal was reached and he pulled the raft to shore and soon found himself within sight of the town. But he had to wait ina farm house close by until he recovered from exposure and until the flood went down. Then he continued toard the city and after having passed on his way more than a thousand frozen bodies of the victims of the flood, the heroic man set about finding his wife and children but feeling sure with a sinking of the heart that he would only recieve the their bodies. After a lengthy search he found them but alive. but he had lost his father and mother, and his wife, had also lost her parents, brothers and sisters, and everything she had. The children who were living had been utterly stripped of their clothing by the force of the water, and both they and their mother had an experience that rarely comes to a mother and her children. . The story she told her husband is as follows(Whether it followed or not) it was indeed most pitiful. She had visited his and her parents together in the same house near Stanislis road and fourteenth streets. When the flood burst after the explosions which shook the town andcaturted fires among building so suddenly tumbled down by the vibrations she and they were alone in the house with her children.

She seized one under each arm and rushed from the frail structure in time to chat she cheat death among the falling timbers of the home.
Once in the open with her babies under her arms, she was swept into the roaring flood with countless thousands of others. She held to her precious burden and by skilful maneuvering managed to get close to a huge floating tree which was sweeping along with the swift movement of the waters. She saw a haven in the big branches of this tree, and raised her two year old daughter to place her in the branches. As she did so an enormous wave of water suddenly appeared logged with thundering wreckage and the little one was torn from her arm and carried away to what she expected was its death.
The awfulness of the apparent blow stunned but did not render her helseness. She retained her hold to the other two children aged four and six years, and was whirled along among the dead and dying, of the floods fury, hoping to effect a landing somewhere. Two hours in the water brought the desired end. ch She was thrown ashore with wreckage and a sea of corpses, and stumbling to a footing lifted her children to a level with her head. She noticed with horror the children were dead, and that also they were not her own but her sisters.
The poor mother remembered nothing untill five days later when she was put ashore in Schlesdertown. She had a slight recollection of watching men and soldiers at work in getting rid of the dead, clearing away debris, trying to put out burning fires in the wreckage and house tops and obey the command of soldiers. Her brain however did not execute in its functions untill a day before her husband arrived, and the evening of that day through some mysterious unknown reason her children were found twenty miles from the very scene of the flood alive, and brought to her.

George Flanders experience indeed was a sad one.) He was thrown into the rushing waters and while being carried with the most frightful velo i velocity down into the second one rushing into the river he saw the dead faces of his wife and two children wedged firmly between branches of a large tree? Tree.
Jennie Kleer"s like was a saved but at the expense of her husbands. The woman was in her Aberdeener street home when the suddeness of the flood demolished the structure in the twinkling of an eye. Her husband seized her from the floating wreckage and guided her to a tall hotel a short distance away. He returned to search for his little daughter who had been in the wreckage also, and was killed by a house that fell on him.
Hendre Francis Prone went to Schlesdertown and the two other places by the Mayor of Angelinia Agathia, the day after the flood had receded to investigate the conditions of everything there especially the Calverinia State quarantine reported to the Mayor on November 21th and they therefore said among other things in his report.

"The sanitary conditions of the city of Joan itself is exceedingly bad. Large quantities of lime have been ordered to the place but I doubt if any one will ever be found to unload it from the freight trai trains if they do arive and attend to its distribution .The stench of burning a bodies among fire swept wreckage is almost unbearable the weather still worse. The stench itself rises from the immense piles and mountains of debris containing the carcasses of human beings and anil animals which through some unknown cause is all one big smudge of smoke and fire.

These carcasses are re being burned no doubt by many thousands and if the fires continue there will be only very little of the wreckage left with which to rebuild ruins ruined houses with.
There is no water protection and with this fire breaking out, I believe if it was not for the houses half incased thickly with ice the destruction of these three devastated cities would be complete.When searching parties do come across a number of bodies they are taken to the wagons to be hauled away and those of the bodies that have been already cremated by the fires are therefore left to burn. Indeed I must say again the oder of so many burning bodies isshorrible beyond imagination..
The many chairmen of the relief committees at Joan city, wanted me to make the announcement that the city desires beyond all means all the skilled mechanics, and also contractors with their tools that can be brought to Joan city, but how can this be done done when the enemy guard every approach to these ruined places and even prevent trains from coming here.Yet just now it is too cold for any kind of repair work to be started, and even when the cold wave does spent itself there will be an almost impossibility to find enough men who will be able to work at that kind of business.

Those now in Joan city are all either engaged in the relief and other work none of them are mechanics and therefore they are not to be obtained. He and are they seemed that if possible all mechanics will be paid more than the usual wages and will be given employment by private parties who desire to get their wrecked homes into a habitable condition as rapidly as possible. There are many strong houses which are only wrecked in the lower portions by the waters and it is desired that the necessary repairs be made quickly or the survivors willhave to leave the city altoe altogether and seek other quarters.
However with the help of the many soldiers from general Vivians army the relief work is already very well organized. Nothing else had been accomplished except the distribution of food and po provisions among the many needy. About three quarters of the city is totally wrecked or one half entirely washed away and many people are living in houses that are badly wrecked striving desperately to keep warm during these awful cold days. The most destitute are m being removed from the city and sent to the Christian lines as rapidly as possible so they can find shelter shelter there.
I'm afraid however it will take two or more weeks,, yet, before all who want to go have been removed from the burning city...no animal of any kind survived the flood,, and everything is gone.
I am absolutely satisfied after spending three days in Joan city that the estimate of five hundred thousand dead is too conservative. It will exceed that number. No one can ever estimate or ever will known within one thousand of how many lives were lost, and I believe more died from exposure to the awful cold than by drowning. In the city even now the dead bodies are still being gotten rid of in whatever manner possible. They are striving like desperation to burythe dead found at every point of the flood outside the cities, and they have to blast the ice to get the bodies out. At Big Girl Knool about 22,250 were found frozen in the ice with stiffened ice covered re wreckage and buried in two days...
There must must be scores of thousands of dead bodies back on the ice covered prairies that have not yet been found but the weather is so severe and there is no men now so much ones that it is impossible to make a search. Bodies have been found by scores of thousands as far back as seventy miles south of Big Girl Knool. It would take several big armies to search that territory so far south.
The waters of the half frozen Arenburg's gun River are still full of dead bodies, and they are being constantly cast back upon the land. On my trip to and from Schlesdertown Schlesdertown I passed an immense procession of bodies in the river going seaward. I am sure I counted fourteen thousand of them on my trip in from that city which is entirely vacated by the inhabatants on account of the fee, and I believe this procession is kept up day and night. The captian of some river steamer who had just reached Dorothy gale city from the sea informed me that he begun to meet floating bodies as thick as log jams fifty miles from the rivers mouth.

As an illustration of how high the water of the flood got when it rushed into the river, a vessel which was in the river tried to get into the middle of the river when the flood came on. It got out some distance but the force of the flood with the sudden rise of the river to an enormous depth forced the ship toard the shore. It was dark and all the land marks had been completely obliterated by the inundation. Therefore the course of this steamer could not be determined but she was being furiously driven in toard the city. Therefore before her course could be established she had actually run over the top of the wharf and the next morning with the approach of day light the captian and the crew actually found the ship in the flooded streets of the city going down or up as if the street was a canal or river. As the vessel draws more than thirty feet of water some idea therefore then can be gained as to the height of the water in the city...
Prima Probably one of the most thrilling experiences or at least a so called personal experience with the fearful flood that might have ever been written so far was that of a young girl the daughter of one of the parons of Angelinia Agathia who was spending her November vacation with friends at Sperryville..she wrote an account of her adventure to her parents however Mr and Mrs Floria Sallen;

"Dear papa and mamma;
I hope before I wrote this letter you have recieved my telegram and know for sure that I am safe. This has been a terrible experience, and what I have seen and gone through I'll never forgive the enemy for, and will hate the sight of a Glandelinian all my life. I hope God and His blessed mother will spare me from another such exper e experience. I am nothing but a nervious wreck, and I am shaking all over. And when I close my eyes I cannot even seem see anything else but windrows of naked dead, burning wreckage and houses, snow covered ruins, and wild eyed men and women and screaming weeping children. I suppose I ought to have begun at the start bi but I am so nervious and feverish that I am not sure I am able to write with any sense.
The day of the Thirteenth of this morning early, in the morning it was snowing, such beautiful flakes and it was quite cold and the wind rose a little. I remarked to my friends that I believed we were in for a November blizzard. Suddenly she said to me;

" Hell is that not thunder?"
"What thunder? " I asked. " Surely there is no thunder in winter."
Yet I listened and far away I could hear a strange booming. I am in Dean city. George Aller and two young ladies with their own children and husbands did Not come home yet and the blizzardwas gaining in intensisty. A ter dinner we sat by the window watching the storm for I love better than anything else to see one of these great blis blizzards when it snows so beautiful and hard. All at once one of the children in the room with me said;
" Say lady look at the water in the street; it must be something wrong with the river."
"I looked and was apprehensive for the water had come too sudden for me to have noticed it at first, for surely even less than a moment ago the street was white with two inces inches of snow.As U I continued to look the water rose with unusual speed, and the lady ofthe house being notified of it was afraid and warned us all to go to the second story, and many of the men began to come here. The wind and snow rose to a fierce storm but as the water rose higher and higher while we watched it, we surely did not know what to make of it or why it happened for surely the blizzard had nothing to do with it. We all crowded into the hall of the house--a big three story one--and when we looked at of the hall window we saw the water suddenly come in a perfect wave and sudden and so sudden was its rush the house rocked like a cradle. About six oclock in the afternoon the flood had got into the lower story of the house and the water had risen with the level of the first floor.
Then as matters grew worse the men in the house told us we would have to leave and go to another house, a bigger one across the street at the end of two blocks, a structure of brick and stone. The owner of the house a middle aged woman was wild about her husband and children who had not been home, and the telephone and other wires were down and the flood was becoming a terrific torrent. The men warned us that we must strip untill we had only our underwear on, and that we should take only a few things in a bundle. I took my watch and ticket, and what little money I had and pinned them in my corset, took off everything from my waist down but an undershirt and linin skirt, no shoes and stockings.
I put what clothes I could find in mybtrunk and locked it. Tell mama the last thing I put in was her beautiful c dress, for I feared it might be injured? It took two strong men to each of us women to get her across the street, and down to the end of the two blocks.Trees thick as brushwood were whirled down the street, and wreckage of all sorts swept past, and the rising waters looked like a whirlpool. A little girl and I went across on the fifth trip. The wind and snow of the blizzard cut like a knife and the water was icy cold. It seemed like going down into the grave. It was very dark by this time and the men put their arms around us and down into the water we we went. T"e little girl was crying about her mother that she had to leave behind untill the next trip, and I was beggingthe the men not to let me go?
The little girls mother came last. The water was so deep the me men had to swim with her. One man brought a small bundle of clothing such as he could find for us to reclothe out ourselves with wrapped up in his mackinthes. He too had to swim over. I spe spent the night such a horrible one wet from my shoulder to waist and from my knees down and cold and barefooted. No one who were rescued had any shoes on. The little girl did not have hardly a thing on and was shivering from the cold and one of the men wrapped her in a thick blanket. most of the men only had a light pair of trousers and a light shi t and also was barefooted. h The house was terribly packed with people just like us. Fortunately the house had a deep basement and was of stone.
The house shook so from the force of the torrent that the windows were shattered out the building rocking from top to bottom and the water during the other days of the flood rose and rose untill we were were driven to the fourth the top floor. Of course during these awful five days and nightsno one hardly dared to even sleep but about six oclock in the morning of the sixth day of the inundation in which during the flood a fierce cold wave had kept us seeking warm stoves and fuel we could dare use from wreckage the flood slowly began to go down and as we stood at the windows watching it fall we saw many dead bodies floating away.
Then several men came on a raft and one of them was calling for his mother.His mother and many others had spent the five days and nights crowded into a small brick house with ten men and other women in total darkness at night, sitting on boxes, with their feet off up off the floor. They had then been taken on a raft by some venturing men and brought to an immense brick building five stories high. They were on the fourth floor for the water came up a little above the third story and lapped the sills of the fourth floor windows.
As soon as the flood had frozen over solid solid we started toard home. But where was the home. Every section of that part of the city was gone. The water had swept everythin everything away our house and thousands of others were gone and where they stood 2 as a sheet of frozen water intermingled with wreckage and dead bodies. I had no outfi sufficient cothing to put on my trunk was gone with mothers beautiful skirt and everything where the house stood was desolation. We had nothing to eat since the flood started and we were forced to live on whisky. Indeed every time the men would see us they would poke a bottle of brandyat us and make us drink a little. All we hadthe day after the floodfrozen froze over was a small box of crackers, and cheese and brandy. We were all so terribly weak we knew we could not get any more, so Miss turned and I went down to tryand find something in a notie store.But the sights we witnessed was awful. Dead animals lay everywhere, house tops were burning, long windrows of wreckage were afire, the lower parts of houses were incased in the thickest ice, and the streets filled with fallen telegraph poles and brick houses leveled to the ground. It was bitterly cold and the skies had the appearance of another blizzard coming. Many hundreds of women and children despite the cold were sitting on ice covered wreckage or steps, crying for lost ones, and all of them injured in some degree and suffering from the cold. Many of the children looked so petious at me I felt faint. Wild eyed ghastly men ghastly looking men hurried by and told of many whole families killed. I could not stand any more and made them bring me home, and I fell on the bed with wild hysterics. They poured whiskey down me but the only effect it had was to make my hu head ache worse and make me feel more coldef.

I had about got straightened out when several children such a little girl and an old t a tearee tearful woman came to the house almost in rage relatives of the woman whose house had been swept away--who had lo st her daughter, husband and grand children and all they had. The poor old lady had hysterics and everybody cried, and I too had another spell. All day wagon after wagen passed by filled with dead0---most of them without a thing on them---and men with stretchers with dead bodies with just a sheet thrown over them, many of them little children. We waited every minute expecting to have the bodies of our friends brought to the house we were staying and it too was a wreck. But the bodies have not been found up to now and all is lost.
There are about thirteen children in the house one half of them girls that spent the first night of the flood in the water clinging to the floating wreckage, and their father and mothers and all relatives are drowned. These children are all moine qlens having been made orphans. Last night some men took us to another house to find for us dry beds and a place to keep warm. We were therefore compelled to sleep on old fashioned folding beds with nothing under us but a rug and sheet, and I had to borrow something dry to sleep in. Three women andc men who had lost their parents and their all even children had just come from big girl Knool to try and find them. Some of the men walked and swam part of the way cold as it way was. The men are nearly wild, and the women are just screaming. If this disaster caused by the enemy does not cause an increase in the ranks of the christian armies I don't know what will. I cannot write any more. Am coming back home aasoon as I can.
NELL."

The Bengue family, consisting of father and mother and ten children was in its home when the building collasped before the sudden onset of the flood upon Perryvi lle. After being in the wreckage for several hous hours they found refuge on a floating roof of a large house. They were on this for two hours when this parted, and the father and five children were swept in one direction, while the mother and the other children drifted in another. Some of the children were washedcoff, but the day after all were reunited and were washed ashore near Chamberlane.
Mrs Allegrando becomes a raving maniac as the result of her sen experience. With her husband and two children and her motyer and father she was drifting on a long roof when all but herself were swept away by a wave and drowned. The unofr unfortunate girl mistakes all the attendants and refugees in the best hop hospital in general Vivians lines for her lost relatives and clutches wildly for them.
Frankie Geeler an engineer of a factory, and his own wife and children sought safty in six successive houses each of which were demolished almost as fat as they thought they were safe in them. Thr They eventually climbed upon floating wreckage except the father and he went off on a floating door but all were saved.Mrs Alter with a hundred other women and men and children finding the house they were in about to fall before the force of the flood made their way to a large tower and climbing to the top managed to keep from being washed away but they were dreadfully exposed to the cold and were am almost frozen before they were rescued;
Mrs Jennie Orner wife ofa railway engineer and a number of other women floating in the deep icy waters all night and day the first stage of the flood by catching wreckage but died from the effects of the cold. A man saved himself by floating in a large wooden box and was driven into the river, and he was rescued on the further shore down near Gloriannia.He was fearfully bruised and all his relatives were drowned, or frozen to d-ath.
A most pathetic incident in the search for the dead in Joan city occured during the first week after the flood. A large squad of men discovered in the lower portions of a wrecked ice covered building many bodies. The upper part of the structure was was burning. Among these bodies was one which a member of the burial burial party recognised as his own father. The bodies were frozen stiff and were removed to the river; and the son assisted with spartian like firmness and stood by and saw the bodies with weights on them sunk into the icy waters of the river..

Six or eight days after the flood several of the scouting soldiers returning toard the camp found in the frozen flood many thousands of bodies of which he reo reported to his commanding officer. He said it would take till next summer before the bodies could all be disposed of.

The entire property loss in the city of Schloeder town caused by the firee wreckage by the concussion of the explosion, and finally by the inundation was not hardly less than $ 30,000,000, in Sperryville about $ 23,000,000 and town city about $ 49,678,889. out side of these cities in Chamberlaine, Big Girl Knool and all other points in that part of Southern Calverinia together with the agricultural and stock and farm raising districts, the property damage was nearly half thatamount of one of these cities alone, though it might have been claimed to be about 19,000,000 dollars. Probably sixty five small villiages or large towns were devastated by the flood and in most of these places there was severe loss of life, but including this there were seventy five villages and towns which were completely swept away or entirely buried under and thereby wiped out by the waters. It may also have been reliably estimated from reports received at Catherine town the capital city of thatpart of Calverinia from these places thatthe losses in life exclusive of the death list of town Sperryville and Schloeder Town would aggregate nearly one dillion people the greatest loss of life probably that any flood could ever cause or ever will bring.In many towns even not devastated totally by the flood but only partly inundated the percentage of killed or drowned or those frozen to death exceeded that i singly of any of the three cities. About more than seventy towns and villiages had been swept completely out of existance.

The scene of desolation in the devastated districts of Calverinia was terrible to witness, for probably the biggest flood known. The flood at its worse had covered a space of nearly two hundred miles in length and thirty to fifty in width and extended as far as Glorianna city, a distance of over one hndred miles from Schloedertown...
All farming crop in every section of the flood that is the late fall crop was completely ruined all farm buildings were swept away and all farm s animals drowned. The same was true of the Rice and other crop and indeed the distress was keenly felt by al, all plante planters and small or rich farmersthroughout the whole region so badly swept by the floodd.
In Big Girlknool the damage to property d of basements was figured at over $ 500,000 at Chamberlane$ 1,000,000, and its neighboring town Place only a few miles wa was virtually destroyed with a property loss of $ 6,678,000 and 166,000 people in that section deprived not only of shelter, and protection from the awful cold and blizzard weather and food for the time being, but all prospects of crops for the year to come...
On the last week of November 1913 the Mayor of Big Girl Knool who went out to take a view of what the flood had done sent out the following statement and appeal from that city after a complete investigation of the situation in and around Place:

" I arived in the Place from Schloedertown and indeed was astonished and utterly bewildered by the sight of such awful devastation on every side. Ninty five per cent of all the best houses in this town are in total ruins, leaving over a hundred thousand people without shelter and destitute of all the necessities of life, and with no means whatever to procure them and they are exposed to the fury of the winter weather and many were brought to our city where they could seek shelter from the fearful cold...Every thing inthe way of fall crop already harvested is destroyed, and unless there is speedy relief there will be exceedingly great suffering.. The survivors need and must have assistance if armies have to destroy the enemy to send it. They need money to rebuild their homes and buy stocks and implements and clothing and provisions. They need flour food, bacon corn and materials for fuel. They must have seeds for their gardens and farms so as to be able to do something for themselves very soon. For everybody clothing is badly needed. Thousands of women and children are without clothing and many have builded fires in the streets to prevent themselves from freezing to death and yet are already suffering beyond description. The bestvidea may be had of the awful distress when it is known that thousands of surviving box cars and other things are being used as houses and hay and wet clothing for bedding.Out of fiftsen hundred thousand houses in place only fourteen houses are standing, and they too are badly damaged"
The damage at Chamberlane was not less than one hndred thousand dollars all in basement property but nevertheless the news from there is disheartening not from their own people but from those who had flocked there for shelter from the ve devastated regions. A bulliten from a reliable source dated November the 23th, said:!!!

The country districts now a immense pond of ice is strewn with thousands upon thousan thousands of corpses fo frozen into the ice intermingled with all various kinds of wreckage and household goods. The prairies around Rosa and Chamberlane is also a frozen sea and the ice is dotted thickly with the bodies of the dead frozen into it. All of these are unburied asthe bodies are too firmly frozen into the ice to be removed without the expa expense of ornormous blasting and the ice istoo deep or thick for much blasting and even now the ground itself not frozen over with petrified water is too hard for burial. And if all these bodies are left till summer before they are disposed of or buried they will in the coming warm and hot weather start to di decompose and therefore a pestilence will be threatening. The stench from bodies buring in windrows of wreckage is awful and great supplies of disinfecting materials is greatly needed.

The damage to railroads outside of the tre three main cities and outside of Big Girlknool was about $50,000,000. The damage to telegraph and telephone wires outside of the cities was about $ 4,000,000.
Dumage to all kinds of crop estimated on an average crop of all counties and the three states of Calverinia affected about $ 33,245,678.

In many other counties of Calverinia especially Turmerannia County of that section of Calverinia there was not one farm or plantation or any other country building even left to mark the site. All the strongest fences were all gone, trees and brush were swept away and the devastation was complete.. Many large and most expensive sugar and other refineries werewrecked. All the cabins belonging to farmers for their houses, horses, cow barn, chicen houses and the like were swept away and all the animals and fowl drowned. On one big farm which during the height of the flood had a hundred feet of water on it a short distance from the ill fitted fated town of Dicken Dickson Dickson the entire family of a farmer was killed the farmer being away at Big Girl Knool at the time on business. The villages of Heidi Turner and Falter in Angeline county were completely destroyed over twenty hundred persons were drowned but none of these bodies have been recovered.
Every house in that part of the country was entirely swept away and there was great suffering among the few homeless homeless survivors. There was much destitution among the people of the town of Caldwell in the same county. Caldwell was me of the one of the most prosperous towns in that part of T Calverinia. It wasvholly wiped out and the homeless ones who ar survived are without shelter and without means to shield them from the dreadful cold. Their food supplies were provided by their f more fortunate neighbors intill the other necessary assistance could be had. The State authorities also h heard from the location of Surpo Junction and from all the many plantations around there where several hundred farmers and their hired help were employed.. Every building on these farms had been car carried away by the flood and the loss of property is about eight hundred and ninty thousand dollars. All of these farmers and working men were swept away with the flood and drowned. In addition to the loss of buildings the entire harvest crop was destroyed and swept away with cows chickens, horses pigs and all other live stock on this as well as other farms and plantations in that section. Seven, people were killed in the town of Homestead which was almost completely wiped out. In the neighborhood of Homestead fifty five more persons were drowned and sixty more frozen to death but it is said their bodies are not yet recovered. The loss of life in that immediate section far e exceeded the estimates given in the earlier reports .The search for victims of the inundation at Broadbrook resulted in five hundred bodies discovered frozen in the ice of the remainder of the petrified flood. Broadbrook was a favorite summer resort with many people from every part of the nation and even in the coming of winter its hotels were always filled with guests. Many were out on winter pleasure jaunts when the flood suddenly came on and non not one person was left alive and the biggest hotels and all the houses were either wrecked or completely swept away.

The casualties at Beldon City were one hundred and five. Property loss. $1,0... Property loss believe to be one billion. Anglesia situated also on the banks of the Aronburgs ran asked for help from Big Girl Knool. Over three quarters of the town was destroyed and eleven hundred perpole lost their lives. And reports from all the adjacent territory showed that many farmers and their families were killed frozen to death or drowned. One hundred and eleven farm aids employed on a large grain plantation in Wintro county situated in the brunt of the flood were all drowned, and fifty others were killed by the collaspe of a big building in which they had sought refuge from the seething torrent.

The town of Wrigley situated fifty miles west of the river was als in the brunt of the deluge and no thing was heard from there since.. Several hundred people were drowned in the towns of Anden, Caneytow, Aldro, and Pedro in the same county. The new buildings on the Allenby farm owned and operated however by the state were washed away entirely and every one lost their lives. The harvest crops, and all the live stock were swept away, including a beautiful orchard, and a woods.

Over one thousand one hundred and fifty farm hands and farmers and their familes were killed in Murinia county, twenty being killed and fourty drowned, near the town of little Adelheid. Adelhied junction suffered a loss of nearly all of its buildings and out of a population of 100,000 only fifty thousand survived. There are about fifty thousand homeless people in that city, and in Big Grove town every one was drowned and every house in the town laid low. The destitute people were forced to live outdoors in improvised tents in the bitter cold before huge bonfires, or camping on the frozen deeply snow covered ground, and their suffering is terrible....

Outside of the cities of Big Girl Knool, and Ophelia the greatest suffering was between Big Girl Knool and Jennie Turner city, and along the river coast as far up as Meldonburg. There was no damage at Olorlannia or in that immediate section of the country even though the people for three days did go about the streets of the city in boats or by wading waste deep...

People in immediate need of relief were those of the points between Joan city, and many other places. The planters in that section though they survived the flood had all their November Harvests swept away leaving all the tenants in a state bordering on starvation. That year an enormous acreage was planted in all kinds of crop that during the harvest had been thrashed, and was all ready to be prepared and sent for shipment when the furious floods caused by the enemy laid everything low. At Aberleen, Knowland, Quinto, Gladland, prairieview and many other smaller places not a house was left to mark the site. Many of the farm hands had been brought into that section to assist at the harvest toil and other farming. The people were huddled in small houses and barns when the first signs of the flood began to advance. But few escaped with their lives. And for the few survivors their clothing and everything was gone , and only immediate rescue by those more fortunate saves these from dying of exposure. Even every survivor seemed absolutely devoid of even the necessities with which to sustain life..

And to begin all over again the surviving farmers and owners of big plantations would have to build new houses, purchase all kinds of new farm machinery, and new draft and ot other animals. The loss of horses, mules, and all other animals in the stricken stricken districts was one of the most severe blows. Live stock interests were also totally harmed. And in the opinion of Calverinian railway men a good number of year years may have to pass before the farming districts can be resp restored to their farming or former conditions. The advanced prices of building materials on account of the war was a hard blow to the smaller farmers who in most instances were owners of small farms that had been completely washed away or laid under a sea of water.

A indeed immense appeals for relief were recieved from everywhere because of the inundation. And the season had given good promish of producing the best harvest in spite of the war in the previous fourty years, and this flood swept everything out of existance.

Five people who lived in the city of Big Girlknool were drowned at Turpo Point. Mrs Francis Turner and her two children, her husband and a six year old niece. Her husband was rescued alive exhausted, half frozen frozen and in a state of terrible nervousness. Mr Turner said the flood came suddenly like a roaring tidal wave carrying all before it at once when it struck the town every building giveing wave before it and around hid home the rushing waters rose up so rapidly that he and his family and neice sought safty upon the snow covered roof. He had his little son Haller Turner in his arms and the other children were strapped together. A wave of the flood hurled a blizzard of timbers upward and a large piece of iron flung by the water from somewhere struck Haller in the back tearing that part of his body open and instantly killing him. Mr Turner then took up his little daughter the neice, and while he had her in his arms he was three times washed off the roof now becoming ice covered and in this way the little girl was drowned. Mrs M Mrs Turners oldest child was next killed when a wave hurled a shattering shower of timbers about them and the younger one was drowned by being struck off the roof by a long board, thus leaving Mr and Mrs Turner the only occupants of the badly ice covered and slippery roof. Finally a sudden rush of waters rising suddenly higher swirled an enormous drift of wreckage against the floating house with such force that the roof broke and slide off the structure, and as it fell into the water in was broken in two places, Mrs Mrs Turner remaining on one half and her husband on the other.

Soon the portion of the roof to which Mrs Turner clung was turned over by the violence of the wreckage hurled against it, and this was the last seen of her. Mr Turner held to his side of the roof so distraced in mind as to care little where or how it drifted. He finally landed after being adrift twenty four hours on the shore of the flood and was rescued by those in the crowds which so thickly thronged the shore looking for those whom they may save.

At Glendon a winter resort opposite Hendro Junction there were one hundred and sixty six persons in a hotel. The water was about it nearly up to the fifth floor the pressure almost moving it from its strong foundation but the main danger was from the heavy jams of wreckage floating against it. The men folk in the hotel took long poles and wedges and kept strickly strictly at work keeping the debris away from the almost submerged hotel and therefore no one was lost here. At Belledonia ville every house in the place had been totally damaged even submerged, and sixty were swept away entirely including two wooden churches. Ten persons were killed there, three of them children. Not a house was left at Aldewild. Dead children out of a wrecked orphan asylum the destruction of all houses except one which was on high ground, and the destituo destitution of hundreds of families was the record of the flood at Angelbright. From sixty other towns came reports that buildings were swept away or wrecked. Most of them. Most of them reported scores dead and many injured and half frozen.

Ransonia Fradice a commercial war agent of the Mic-Hollester and Pandora railway Company made a trip over the line of his road from Schloedertown to Big Girl Knool on foot cold as it was on november the 25th and gave a graphic account of his toilesome journey which was made under many difficulties and in the face of cold weather and one blizzard storm of unusual intensity.

"Two hundred miles of tracks, and many hundreds of bridges are gone north of Schloeder Town" said he. I walked over snow covered ground, across the frozen flood, in the face of cold weather and fearful storms from Schloedertown to Big Girl Knool and nothing could be seen in all of that country but death and most fearful destruction.

The praries are covered with frozen water and I am positively sure I do not even exaggerate in the least when I say that not less than one hundred thousand horses and an extra ammount of cattle and many other farm animals making a total of two million are to be seen frozen into the ice, and along the line of ice covered railway tracks south and north of the devastated city.

The little towns along the railway have all been swept away, and indeed never before in my life have I ever witnessed a more terrible sight..When I reached a point three miles north of Schloedertown I saw countless numbers of human bodies also frozen tight tight into the ice and from that point until Big Girl Knool was reached dead bodies could be seen from the railroad trucks, frozen into the ice, or in the log jam like frozen wreckage.

At the town of Brockville nothing is left. About six hundred cars of loaded , merchandise that reached Brockville on this railroad line on the night before the day of the flood I saw scattered widly all over the prairie and their contents will no doubt prove a total loss.

On the 23th of November from early morning until far into the even g general Givlan and his officers were in conference with relief committees from various points that suffered from the effect of the inundation. Among the first of the committees to arive was from Schloedertown and Joan City. These men consulted at length with the Abbieannian emperor and as a result of this conference it was decided that by the order of the military authorities general Alton should be left in command of the ruined cities which was to be considered under strict military rule, and that he was to have the exclusive control not only of the patrolling of the city but of the sanitary forces engaged in cleaning the city of joan and other places.

It was decided also that instead of looking for the laboring people of the city of joan for work in the emergency an importation of as many glandelinian prisoners as possible should be made to conduct the sanitary work while the surviving people of joan city were given an opportunity of looking after their own losses, and rebuilding their own property without giving any time to the city at large.

It was believed that with the forced work of these millions of glandelinian soldiers under guard it might require about four weeks to clean the city of debris and in the meantime the citizens would be working on their own property and repairing the damage there. Another relief committee from Big Girl Knool reported that about thirty thousand refugees in destitute circumstances, without food clothing or home had been refuged there. All around Big Girl Knool city, crops of all kinds had been totally destroyed, all farming implements were washed away, and the surviving people had nothing whatever at hand with which to work the fields.. The text of the message of sympathy recieved by Emperor Hanson Vivian Himself from the Emperor of Mormonula was as follows;;;;;;;;;;;;

" Mormonula city.
November the 27th 1913 .
Emperor of Abbieannia----------
I sincerely wish to convey to your Gracious Majesty the expression of my deept felt sympathy at hearing of the dreadful misfortune, that has befallen that part of the Calverinia state and of the fi cities and towns devastated therein, and that which has befallen the three cities of Schlooderville, Joan and Sperryville and many other towns and villages of the flood swept area, and ; and the whole nation mourn with you and the war stricken people of fair Abbieandia over the terrible and record breaking lose of lives in the world and of the immeasureable destruction of propertycaused by the explosion and flood but I have heard that the awful magnitude of the disaster is also equaled by the indomitable spirit of the citizens of that holy nation who in their long and continued struggle with the adverse forces of nature let loose by a wicked and most Ruthless enemy have proved themselves victorious.
I sincerely hope that these cities and towns will rise again to new prosperity.

Emperor of Mormonula."

The Emperor of Abbieannia replied;

" M Main Palace at Angelinia Agathia.
November the 30 th. 1913
His Imperial and Royal Majesty Elomlinia of Mormonula;
Your Majesty's message of condolence and sympathy is recieved with grateful thanks by the people of Abbieannia and by its government, and therefore in their name as well as behalf as on th behalf of the many millions who have suffered the bes of friends and relatives and property and other irreparable lo loss in this flood disaster, I thank you most earnestly;
Emperor of Abbieannia. "

CHAPTER FIVE.

M

RELIEF SENT FROM ALL PARTS OF THE WOILD AS SOON AS THE TRUE SITUATION OF AFFAIRS WAS MADE KNOWN HUNDREDS OF MILLIONS OF DOLLARS SUBSCRIBED AND HUNDREDS OF THOUSANDS OF CARLOADS OF SUPPLIES FORWARDED TO THE DESOLATED REGION
ONLY TO BE CONFISTICATED BY RADING CLANDESTINANS.

THE MAYOR OF Angelinia Agathia on the 20th of November issued his appeal to the whole Abbieannian country for all the help specially needed and surprising as it may seem the responsis response s response was sudden and more liberal than was even expected. Indeed the Mayor of the city of Angelinia Agathia was not afraid the people of the war torn country of Abbieannia and the whole world itself would call him such a thing as an sensationalist, for no me in that city was better qualified to judge of the awful situation than he was. Hearing of the disaster.he had come to the scene in person at any risk and coming to joan city as soon as transporations couldvbring could bring him there he septn spent almost every hour in working for the good of the ruined city and within a few days had accomplished wonders. He begged the christian generals who had them to sent all the Mandelinian prisoners to the flood stricken region which they could spare, and finally when the first one hundred thousand these arived he organized them at the respective work signed out for them, induced even citizens more unwilling than he to give money for the sake of the needy, even asked m any one by writing and printing to open their hearts and pocket books and in fact it was said he did not take any rest for days after the awful disaster.
As he had been around the city svelera times since he came there from Angelinia An Agathia even before the appeal was issued, he knew the conditions of things as you would yout A.B.C's and therefore the general public throughout Abbieannia had confic confidence in what he said;
" The same day the general Relief Committee.of joan city issued the following;

" Joan city,
November the 25th 1913.
to the public of Abbieannia;
A full conservative estimate of the loss of life inthe region swept by the flood as far as counted by the bodies picked an up and disposed of " o far is that it will reach 1,200,000, but many more bodies are still unaccounted for, and at least over 10,000,000 are without shelter, are suffering from the cold and exposure to all kinds of weather and are wholly destitute. The entire remainder of the population is suffering inthe worse way you can imagine, In the many villiages outside the cities not a single house survives and in joan city hardly a building is fit for any one to use not even the strongest building is left intact, Not a single building escaped totaly damage and nearly three quarters of the number were entirely swept away. There is immediate need of food clothing and house hold goods of all kinds wh ch must be got through the territory of the enemy somehow. If near by cities not in possession of the foe will also open anylums for women and c and children the situation will be greatly relieved. All Calverinian and other state cities throughout the nation should send us immense amount of fuel as well as provisions and water, including all kinds of oils, candles and other lighting materials.
TheeAbbieannian Committee at joan City."

The head Baron of the Abbieannia Captiol recieved a join telegram from many high men at joan city which described the desctruction of the flood fire and explosion as such;
" The explosion itself killed i six thou a thousand before the flood came and the crash of the blast was heard for nearly two hundred miles, and clouds rose into the air as if a volcano had broken into violent eruption. T en came th flood and now millions are homeless and freezing from the effects of the Cold. We have placed under sh shelter five thousand in one part of the country, and most of the inhabatants had to seek shelter within the christian lines as eve y building in joan city is absolutely in uninhabitbalbe. The army had to even sent for nearly 10,000,000 more tents and sixty million rations for so many refugees and for the use of the army as well. The Citizens Relief Committee are trying to do all in their power, but the small stock of undamaged provisions which have been found are exhausted and most provisions trains that have been sent have been seized by the enemy.
With all the people housed in tents in the christian lines, the army need sixty thousand more doctors to aid those sick and overcome by exposure. Immediate relief t is therefore urgently requested and more troops needed also to watch all trains that many have to go through the enemy's lines."
Emperor Vivians Sec etary sent many armoured trains to carry sull supplies to the armies and to the stricken places. And the day the appeal was made the main Secretary of War at Angelinia Agathia whose name was Farmer Cornman.is authorized the chartering of special armoured trains from Big Girl Knool to carry an immense amount of army quartermasters and commissionary supplies supplies to the relief of the destitute at all points needed. Orders were also issued issued by the Abbiaannian war department for the immediate shipment to the cities refugeeing the people and also to Joan city and general Vivians army 10,885,100 tents and 50,000,000rations. These stores and supplies were divided between Big Girl Knool and Angelinia Agathia and were sent with armoured coaches and large force of well armed troops, and cars loaded with b batteries of cars ready of artillery readey for immediate action. On the "1 21th of November after the frightful disaster had began to recede the Stat State Governer of Calverinia issued the following statement;

" Big Gig . Girl Knool.
Calverinia State.
November the 21th.1913.

The conditions at Joan city and all points swept by the flood are far worse than at first reported. Everything remaining of the flood is frozen tight, and even now all communication has not been even half reestablished between Angelinia Agathia and Gloriannia, and therefore all transeportations of goods and provisions will be so difficult that all trains being sent will habe to go as military armies all armed and properly prepared to resist any attempts of the foe to frustrate the coming of the supplies.

The work of clearing the city of Joan and Schloedertown is progressing fairly well there being 100,000 Glandelinian prisoners sent and general Hertrude under direction of the Mayor of Joan city is patrolling the big city for the purpose of preventing further depredations by any rebel ghouls that may still be at large. The most conservative estimate as to the number of deaths in Joan city places tha them as 215,000. THE contributions from citizens of Abbiaannia and her sister states are coming in as rapidly as they can and therefore we can say that it is confidently expected that within the next three weeks the work of restoration by the people with the forced help of the Glandelinian prisoners will have therefore begun in good earnest and with energy and success.

Of course as we have observed the destruction of property has been much more greater than at first reported, and will surely run far beyond a $.100,000,000 but nevertheless it is hoped and believed that even this great loss will be overcome through the full energy and self reliance of the righteous Abbiaannian people."

Allen Turner Barmorino.
Governer of Calverinia.

On the same day the Joan City Relief Committee sent out this statement of the sure conditions of affairs;

"We are recieving countless numbers of telegrams and thevlike of condolences and assistance. Every near by city not in possession of the troops of the Rebellion are sending supplies and will send all the supplies that can be gathered, and everythinh everything that is needed for the people. Cities too far away like at Glomlinia, and Abbiaannia state and Pomdobia or Abyssinikle can serve us best by sending money. We have about twenty five million people to clothe and feet for many a week and to furnish with great supplies of house hold goods. Every one of them are homeless and it will take lots of money to repair wrecked homes. From this the very Abbiaannian nation and all other nations of the world itself may understand how much money and assistance we need. This committee willfrom time to time report report our needs with greater particularity. We refer to dispatch of this date of ar Mayor which the Committe fullt fully endorses. And all communicantas will please accept this answer to lieu in lieu of direct response and be assured of the heart felt thanks of the entire popus population thus rendered homeless."

The Committee.."

The assistant quarter master general Colonel Handro Kimbraria stationed in general Vivians army was informed by many army contractors on the day these appeals were sent out that the Empress of Abbiaa Abbiaannia, Mrs Anna Vivian or Empress Jane Vivian Emperor Hansons wife had purchassed nearly fifty million rations for all the survivi- surviving sufferers of the great flood. The rations were started from the Mic-Hollester and Pandora railroad station in Dorothy Gale city at 2. P.M. the same day. The two Wifes or Wives of the two rulers of each big state went directly to the army contractors at the mobolization camps at Dorothy Gale city who supply the vast operating armies with provisions and ordered rations identical with those furnished for soldiers, consisting of immense stores of bacon, canned meats and vegetables and fruits, hard bread, beans and coffee, and other foods. The city of Angelinia Agathia sent $225,000 to the governer of Calverinia,, Baron Hodro gave $100,000 in cash,, even Abbiaannian from Foreign countires cabled to their friends in Pandora City to send 1 $ 1,000,000 at once, which was done, Sacremento Abbiaannia, sent $ 1,6000, $ 1,600,000 immediately; Dorothy Gale city wired the Governer, nearly $ 5,000,000 without delay nearly five million without delay, all big mills, steel companies, every Company in the cities gave hundreds of thousands of dollars, and the railroads millions, the city of Big Girl Knool started one trainload after another of supplies northeastward, as also did cities and towns in the State of Angelinia, the railroads hauling the armoured and well guarded trains free of charge, all news paper concerns in every city gave money or started relief trains with many doctors, nurses, and medical supplies, with orders to beat the best record time to the region of horror, Abrahambra began with 60,000 dollars and subscribed that amount daily for many days, Francis Italnta Francis Atlanta telegraphed 25,500 dollars and then made it 150,000 dollars, sixty thousand rations, and nine hundred Abbb Abbiaannian army tents were sent from other places from the offices of the Abbiaannia quartermaster, the Mayor of the State of Angelinia was told by the citizens to send $2,000,000 at once, and he did so. all the show houses, churches, schools and other publich places gave immense benefits, the State of Abyssinkile, sent 45 $ 500,000, the people of the state of Angeline sent $ 15,000,000 to the Calverinian governer, Big Girl Knool raised $ 20,000,000 in cash, the governers of nearly all the Abbiaannian states issued proclamnation, calling upon their people to subscribe to the relief funds, the mayors of every city doing the same--the consequen ce being that the governer of Abbiaannia had about $ 345,000,0000 in hand in cash as soon as it all arived under strong guard, with many millions more in sight and within call.

By the sixth day after the flood he had nearly nine hundred thousand dollars more on hand in addition to which were several hundred thousand cars loaded with with supplies of all sorts, provisions, medicines, disinfectants, fruits clothing liquors for the sick and injured, tents , bandages, stoves, fuel of all sorts. everything that possible could be used, and which enemy raiders had vainly tried to prevent from reaching their destination in which there were thousands of smart and bloody little fres.

It had been estimated thatfully $ 65,789,000 dollars had been necessary to carry the sufferers through the late fall and winter and into the following spring, for because of their exposure to the cold and water hundreds of thousandsof them were severely ill and unable to provide in any way for themselves and fourty thou-and had death colds and were dying by scores. There were fully five million people, men women and children in the christian armies, who were dependen dependent upon h chairity.

A week after the disaster the Calverinian governer decided upon two important plans of action. The first that he must allow all food and clothing shipped from all points of Calverinia to be properly consented into emperor Vivians army itself for the use of the million of refugees confined there , and that he would also grant the three ruined cities the forced use of $0,000,000 Glandelinian prisoners untill all the wreckage is cleared up, and these prisoners to be bu guarded by as many soldiers as it is possible to obtain that are not needed in the fields of battle.In addition thereto all requests for money and supplies from the Joan City Committees were to be granted.

His second and main decision was that he personally would look after the needs of the 300,000 destitute who have fled to other towns and cities, provide them with whatever they need and keep them goingbuntill they g can get on their feet again.Every important person obtained was to keep track of the flood situation while the Governer looked out for the outpost points.

Also local committees from Joan city were sent to Angelinia Agathia and other places to take charge of the recieving and distrubition of supplies that arived there for the surviving people of Joan city Joan city. A serious matter however was confronting the aurthorities not only at the river poin s but in the cities and towns near the bigger ruined cities was the rapid gathering of secretly disguised Glandelinian vandal spies, which after the flood were shot down in scores every day. Others were still drifting into the ruined sections and even took the nerve to enter the very christian camps and on to the near by towns by hundreds in the hope of finding something important for the Glandelinian cause, and pickpocketing and the like among the crowds of rugu refugees.

All this gathering of so many disorderly characters made the peace officers rather uneasy as to the future. The pop police and troops of these regions and the special off officers on the mainland of the river were constantly on the alert to keep down trouble and to prevent all possible thieving and raping yet it seemed to be impossible to get the upper hand because the more they shot down the more arived. These fellows would either steal or set fire to the provisions and supplies sent by the generous people from the outside, and whenerver they were caught they were shot without delay or mercy..

The following was sent out from Joan city on November the 27th which showed how serious the situation still was.....

JOAN CITY.
CALVERINIA,
NOVEMBER THE " 27TH 1913.
ALLEN TURNER SANVORINO GOVERNER.

The fullest and possible of all the investigations have been made and we feel perfectly justified in saying to you and all others and through you to the Abbieannian people that no such disaster had ever yet overtaken any community or section in the history of our country. We have had flood done by nature only but they never no matter what stage they have reached have caused any loss of life whatever though p property loss have been large. This disaster done by the enemy is a record breaker since the a war began and shows that when the Glandelinians cano cannot lick our armies in battles they have to try their luck by letting nature loss loose upon our fair towns and cities. The loss of life is fairly most appalling and cannot ever be accurately estimated. Yet some say it is from one million to two million people who not only were drowned but froze to death in their exposure to the cold and storms and the like, a complication of disasters most horrible indeed.

There is not a home in any of the three big cities that has not been totally damaged or destroyed, while nearly all the rest are swept entirely away as well as th the many towns in the path of the flood. The property loss presents accumulations of sixty to seventy years, and more millions than can be saftly estated.
Under these conditions with tens of millions people homeless and destitute with the entire population under a stress and strain difficult, nay almost impossible to even realize we appeal directly in hour our hour of our greatest emergency to the sympathy of the aid of mankind. In all other towns and villages outside of these three cities it is believed that nearly a hundred thousand or more perished, and even most of the best conservative men and all army officers declare the same, and therefore when h they signed a statement a saying that probably more than two million persons may have lost their lives their signatures surely carry weight with it.

And the news of this great disaster which has jus just devastated so much of the state of Calverinia has deeply moved the Rulers of every chi christian natio. The sentiments of traditional friendship which unites every christian nation with ours can leave no doubt in your mind concerning the very sincere share that the Presedents and kings, the government of these nations, and all the nations take in the calamity that has proved such a cruel and merciless ordeal for so many families in the Calverinian state of Abbieannia. It is therefore natural that all these nation s should participate in the sadness, and every city hastens to express in the name of he l millions who have suffered by the flood disaster, as well as in behalf of all the Abbieanian people heart felt sorrow and sympathy and send to all the families of the hundreds of thousands of victims the expression of their afflicted sympathies.

THE GOVERNER OF CALVERINIA....!""

Throughout every part of the Abbieannian nation all the school children helped the sufferers with their pennies, even making every sacrifice necessary or doing everything possible to obtain the money for such purposes. Every parent suggested that the children give some of their penies pennies to the victims of the great flood. The idea was therefore carried out and many hundreds of thousands of dollars was raised in this way in every city and town in the country that is house st in the war stricken area. The plan was also adopted in far away Abbieannia by so many children that nearly a hundred million pennies were gathered. When this suggestion was first made the Abbieannian Military Quartermaster inspector said to his men as follows;

" When I was born I was reared in Joan city lived there from my infancy untill appointed to this government servie nineteen years ago, and my mother and brother left there six years ago to live in Angelinia Agathia and therefore Thank God and His Blessed Mother they are safe... During During the early part of the war when the city of Tullaway was besieged the people of Joan city sent a generous subscri tion subscription to pull it through to an end, and with it was one made up by the children of many schools. The teachers gave them a holiday for the purpose, and the children organized themselves into a large members of soliciting committees. I had my son on the committee and they succeeded in collecting over $ 25 dollars. In all four their sixteen days work they got together over $ 600 which was turned into the general fund raised by the Citizens Committee. In the year or so that has followed since then that unfortunate city has pulled itself out of the ashes of seige and battle and no now is raising to a high place among our best cities. Despite the war many forces have bes been brought to bear to accomplish this great end, but possibly the most potent one was h the helping hand of our neighbors when so much help then wa c was needed. Among these who helped with their little mite may the school children of the stricken cities now ma, be remembered. I most heartily second Empress Viviane suggestion and also that of the Vivian Girl Princesses and others that the school children of every city in Abbieania to be given an opportunity to aid their little brother and sisters who were the destitu e destitute of this flood all of are nearly naked and orphaned by the terrible disaster that has c so suddenly come to them.

Hanson De Lapretia.
Quarter Mater Master Inspector."

In consequence of calamity and fear of the spread of sickness numerous people began to even leave Joan City. All rail communication as being cut off further by the enemy at other points and no reliable ship was available.

CHAPTER ...SIX.....

THE ABBIEANNIAN ARMIES UNDER EMPEROR VIVIAN TAKE POSSESSION OF THR THREE RUINED CITIES ABOUT A WEEK OR SO AFTER TH E AWFUL DISASTER..... HOW THE THREE CITIES LOOKED TEN DAYS AFTER THE FLOOD.. TWELVE DAYS AFTER. A HOPE FOR GREAT CHANGES, SYSTEMATIC EFFORTS THROUGHOUT THE REGION OF THE FLOOD TO OBTAIN THE NAMES OF THE MANY DEAD... PROBABLY NOTHING LIKE IT IN THE HIS OBHISTORY OF ABBIEANNIA. THE GREAT MAGNITUDE OF THE RELIEF THAT IS NECESSARY. SCORES OF MILLIONS TO BE CLOTHED AND FED..... SYSTEM OF RELIEF ORGANIZATIONS. HOW THE FLOODC AFFECTED COUNTRY TRADE. SOME APPEALS THAT BROUGHT VERY MUCH MONEY..

BY THE TIME,- Practically a little over a week after the flood, say on the 22th of November although the waters did not subside nor go down untill the 18th--had arived, many of the troops of Emperor Vivians army had also taken possession of Schloederville and Sperryville and the enemy beyond which was found to be under general Pickrell losing courage recoiled some distance south west, and the soldiers began themselves to use the surviving houses of the city for what shelter it could be although all of the streets were still chocked with ice covered debris, and practicably impassable. With the army most of the refugees returned to the homes picking their way over great masses of slippery wreckage. Norman Street was by that time opened from the country to the centre of the city by the soldiers, and Heidi Street, the Riverview and Algra e r streets were being rapidly cle cleared by the many Glandelinian prisoners who were sette work under strong guard. However the stench from the burning bodies still in smouldering ruins and wreckage and still in the ruins of scores and thousands of ice covered buildings was almost unbearable...

" These cities mut must be rebuilded again and future floods made almost impossible." said Emperor Vivian as he also had inspected the ruins with the Vivian Girls accompanying him.
There was a meeting of christian generals attended by Citizens of the three cities on the afternoon of the 22th for the purpose of bringing order out of chaos, and the only sentiment that was expressed" was that through what the flood had done itself on account of the enemy breaking the levees of the lake, " Abbieannia had recieved an awful blow. The loss of life and proper y is appalling beyond comprehension--so great that it will require several months to form anything like a c correct estimate. . Though they were ha ing sad and aching hearts the survivors however had very resolute faces and therefore the sentiment of the meeting was that out of the awful chaos of wrecked houses and wrecked bus business the cities must be repap repaired again.

And the sentiment was not only that of burying the dead and giving up the ship as supposed, but rather, get rid of the dead as quickly as it is possible, succor the needy, appeal for aid from a Christian World, and then start most resolutely to work to mend the broken chains though it was possible that in many cases the work of building new buildings must be begun all over, even though the destruction was total!
The sentiment was, these cities, will, the three cities must survive in spite of the havoc of war and the hindering efforts of the ruthless enemy, and fullfil the glorious destiny that is expected of them.. The Prostrated cities, Joan, Schloederville, and Sperryville must rise up again.

Of course everyone had lost nearly everything, but the survivors have life and the future, and it is toward the future that everyone knew they must devote the energies of their lives. No one who survived can forget ever forget what they have suffered, what had caused the awful disaster, they cannon forget the hundreds of thousands of their friends and relatives and loved ones who found in the angry billows of the flood that destroyed them a final resting place..But just now they knew that tears and grief must not make them forget their present duties, that the blight and ruin of the cities and other places are not b beyond repair, that they must not for a single moment think that the cities are to be totally abandoned because of one great disaster, however horrible and sudden that disaster has been. They also knew it was a time for courage of the highest example. It was a time when men and even womenshould show the stuff that should should be and is in them and they should make no other statement of the material sympathy which the whole Christian World was extending tward them than to answer back that after they have buried all the dead, relieve the suffering of the sick and destitute they then will not only bravely undertake the vast work of restoration and recuperation which lies before them in a manner which shall convice convince every christian nation that we have the spirit and fortitude to overcome misfortune and rebuild their homes; but will lend every aid that is possible to the armies and navy to carry on the fight against the Glandelinian army if they have to exhauste every man and every cent there is in existance.....

In this way we shall prove themselves perfectly worthy of the boundless tenderness which is being showered upon the whole nation inbehalf of those in the hour of complete desolation and sorrow. ....This sentiment voiced the people or feeling of the people of the three prostrate cities pretty accurately, for now they had begun to look around them and with the aid of the military forcing the working of rebel prisoners make plans for rebuilding, although it may be many weeks after that before the streets were to be totally cleaned and the ice was gone enough to allow them to begin the proper work.

One of the war news paper correspondents who had most unusual facilities for getting atthe true state of affairs summed up the situation on November the 23th just a week and several days after he awful visitation as follows:||

" The first week of the suffering of the survivors of the three cities have passed away, and the full extent of the disaster which explosion and fire and flood brought to Loam, Sperryville, and Schloedertown seem greater than it did even when the blow had been first struck. I cannot con comprehend how the Glandelinians could be so mean as to cause such a disaster, and certainly for it the Glandelinian soldiery and even their own loved ones should recieve no quarter if I had my say about it.That out of Sperryville that five hundred thousand or more of the nine hundred and fifty thousand men women and children who made up the pu population of the city eight or nine days ago are dead is almost certain. And the full money value of the damage to the prope property of the citizens is so great that no one can attempt to estimate one third of it accurately.

And for one thing the effects of the flood are irreparable. The Fro Frozen .. waters still cover 5914889[illegible]81 555,555,666 square feet of ground, and also what was formley formerly a part of the city as much as 10,000,000 feet of water covers where houses once had stood, which now can never be even reclaimed from the river itself. Even a strip of land six miles long, and from five hundred to one thousand feet wide along the west side of the city of Loam by the big river, where the wh rves and wharves and finest residences stood is now covered by the waters of the very river itself. The beautiful beautiful six story beach hotel now has its foundations in the river, although before the great flood it had a fine fine sixty foot beach in front of it. Maybe even this lad is gone forever. Though stunned and dazed the survivers of the immense flood have worked and struggled to bury their dead, and to make it possible for the remaining women and children to reach christian camps safely but even now it may be doubted whether any oneeven yet realises to the fullest extent what they have suffere suffered or what they have lost, or even guess the suffering that is in store for them when their moments of leisure leisure come and they begin to miss their friends and loved ones who are dead.

Yet it is certain now that no matter how much the three cities has suffered, they will for the sake of the Country's good have to be rebuilded as soon as it is possible, and be the scene of as great a business as they were before the flood. But few of the men of the cities are allowed to pay any attention yet to the work that is necessary for this restoration, for they are still busy with the rou host work of forcing prisoners to help clean the city, of clearing away the frozen debris, of sinking the bodies into the river which still are being discovered under the ruins eachday, and of providigg providing for their most greatest and simplest necessities..

Even we can see that women who the days before the flood were the owners of splendid mansions with every want provided for, and having everything that should make a person feel free and contented, have now been seen half clad in rags and blankets despite the cold making their way through the streets in search of what little food can be gotten, and esteeming themselves fortunate if the family is still intact to gath gather in the wreckage of the former home..And the men who a few days before the flood werethe were the owners of great business concerns and the master of many servants can be seen to day working in the trying tasks of removing the ice and fro en wreckage and aiding in the work of hauling away to burial the frozen and unrecognizable bodies of the dead, or supretending the work of Glandelinian prisoners, who toil under the stern watch of armed soldiers and deputy sheriffs and police, who are there te see that the work of even this kind is not slighted.

Groundall workers, and Glandelinian prisoners is ruin ice and snow and frozen floodd. The broken and shattered houses, ice cevered, the scat a scattered articles of furniture also covered with ice, above all the burning windrows of wreckage in which many of the bodies of the dead are being consumed, make the three cities three places of horor horror even th to the worse of Glandelinians who have been brought there and who have seen the many terrors of war so far as they had served in the army...
The peril from explosion flood and fire was followed for those who survived by a peril of hunger, and a peril from exposure to the cold weather of the late November month and also of disease produced by exposure to cold and storms.There also was still a peril to life ad property from the great great hordes of Glandelinian vandal robbers and inhuman disguised soldier outlaws, who were attracted by the helpless conditions of the three wrecked cities to seek the pray they desired for the sake of their wicked cause..
Yet the splendid response of not only the Country at the Christian world to the appeal for help will soon remove all danger of further suffering from hunger and exposure to the cold, and the prompt action of the Governer of Calverinia, and the christian armies, and of the mayors of the three cht cities, and the citizen relief committees have so far restablished some order, and soon hope for the coming of the time to make the horrible scenes of the stripping of corpses, and the assaults onpersons and the ever increasing of the fires no longer possible.....

The cities will rein remain under martial law for a month or two at leastand it will remain so at least untill normal conditions otherwise have been restored. The danger of a winter pestilence from the exposure of many to the intense cold is still great however, and the fear that many other thousands may scores of thousands f will fall victims to a scourage of winter disa diseases had been gaining strength and before the christian armies had moved forward closer, had caused an exodus of all the old men women and children who crowded the country roads in the bibb bitterest weather to get away to the camps of the refuging christian army...

Added to the danger from the thousands of Glandelinian ghouls, was the danger of the many big fires raging amidst the wreckage not covered from top to bottom with ice or snow. Untill yesterday it was utterly impossible to put out the flames in any part of the city on account of the lack of water, and although the cent condition is now much better, there is much of the fires burning still.. Winter fevers produced by the exposure of many and other such dangerous diseases, like fatal colds, and Nemonuia which have been commenced under these conditions have been increasing within the ten days just past. Many of the physicians who have come issued statements to day that calculated to calm most of the citizens and to slack their apprenehsions in this matter.

One of them says there is no gr at danger of contagion but the prisoners who are at work clearing away so much of even the smouldering debris of the city had been carried on with a fair degree of vigor; and when more Glandelinians are brought in the work it is hoped for will be pushed much faster as the Glandelinians not allowing the child slaves any rest during the day for themselves, and as their comrades are fully responsible for the disaster will recieve no ho rs off except what it nedessary for their meals, and sleep or night rest untill all debris is gone. The one million prisoners now brought in will be able to take up the task, and as these rebels will be in squads from ten to twenties and will be under heavy guard the citizens of the cities will need not to worry about the safty of the fragments of their property which they may have to leave unprotected. The wreckage is to be cleared away, but all which is still good and not sp spoiled by the flood will be saved with the purpose to use for the rebuilding of houses. houses.
The most important need however is money to gain supplies. And we must have the three cities cleared up at any costs and with the greatest speed possible, for it if it is not dne done with all haste, and at the same time done well there may be also a greater fire, and if it breaks out here it will not be this part of the country alone that will suffer. Such things spread, and not far from Schloedertown the country is very thickly forested, and it is only for the sake of these forests, and also for the main Sie-Hollester and Marie Osborne Roods that I urge that above all things we must do everything possible to prevent a terrible conflagration resulting from the fires among our ruins and windrows of wreckage.....

The whole nation i self iyeld itself had been more than kind and generous in its response to the appeal of the stricken survivers of the manytowns and villiages that have been swept away bi by the flood, especially that of the thr ee big cities, and ther therefore from what I hear food, fuel, and disinfectants sufficient for at least tem porery ourposes purposes at least are hoped for to be on the way . The w ole Whole country does not understand, it cannot and may never understand untless unless the people from every city and town pays a visit to the ruined cities and the flood the awful sorrow and destitution prevailing here. Of all the poor people here who have been victims of the flood nnone has anything, and all of them cannot even furnish a single room in which to commence house keeping even if they had the mon y to rebuild the room.....

All of the hundreds of thousands of refugees whether rich or poor have absolutely nothing whatever except what has or is being given to them by the relief committee and every one is in a condition of absolute want, they lack everything, and save for the splendid generiousity of the Abbieannian nation they would be utterly without hope. The hundreds of thousands of Glandelinian prisoners in the c streets of the three ruined cities working among the wreckage under heavy guard are still finding every now and then(get your hen) badly burned or frozen bodies. o "o many of these bodies picked ot of smouldering wreckages are so bay badly burned or cremated and also frozen that very few of them can be recognized, and many of them are naked and even wtihu without anything about them which would lead to any kind of identification....

They are disposed of as quickly as it is possibly but with the weather so cold the work is very tedious and the Glandelinian prisoners enr engaged in it not being used to our own severe Calverinian climate cannot endure it steadily for any great length of time.Pull them out of the burning wreckage as soon as seen and throw them into the river as soon as taken from the debris' is the order and it is really being carried out.

The best work however in his direction especially in Joan city is being done done along the river front Soh the southwest side of the city. During the days following many bodies either frozen or cremated were found at very fre ufrequent intervals and just at sunset to day seven hundred were found in the ruins of one house, though no many that many got there is a mysteryhto me mystery to me. It is expected that more will be discovered to morrow as the work gangs of Glandelinian prisoners that to day found seven hundred bodies will clear up the debris as far as the cold weather andthe frozen conditions of the wreckage will permit. The soldiers from Emperor Sylvians army who have been here providing for order, and helping in guardp guarding the prisoners who are cleaning up the cities have become exhausted from the nature of the severe weather, and it has therefore been absolutely necessary to relieve them. The Abbieannian Norman Light Infantry of general Algrotoe arrived to day to take up the work.The exodus to Big Girl Knool and other neighboring cities cities are still going on. The long wagon trains brought in to take them are crowded to their fullest capacity, and they are making as many round trips as they canm can and not charging a cent for it either.....":

" So far as I can ascertain to my own estimation, especially as long as this war is concerned, there is no calamity in the history of the whole world that can ever approach the horrors of this flood, especially in its effects and the suffering it has caused."

Such the was the declaration of Brander Johann Albertia of the Abbieal Abbieannian Weather Establishment after filing a secret report to the Abbieannian government in which he outlined the damage sustained bythe government itself and made full and confidential suggestions consi concering the advisability of continueing the expenditures elsewhere that have beenn made near Joan city annually.

" it is of no use to send any more Red Cross Nurses or Physicians" he continued as there are too many here already. " Yet those we wish to rush to the aid of the stricken inhabatants should send loads of privilcon, fuel, u quick lime, chloride of lime, and every other kind of disfecectant and for the good of the refugees and the cause stay away themselves. Even to day nearly every portion of the stretches of debris eft insta intact by the flood are immense funeral pyres.From the long windrows of burning wreckage and spor prtions of many ruined houses aseens ascend enormous pillars of flame and smoke and the air is filled with the sickening oder of burning human flesh which prevails the air despite the frigidy of the weather. But above all making one forget even the presence of the uncouth dead, is the appearance of frozen vegetable prd products that le among the thick fields of ice left by the frozen flood..

powerful chemicials are required to prevent what this will surely produce with the coming of summer, a fearful plague. Yet in the face of all these awful conditions the Glandelinian prisoners without a moments rest during the day are working hard at getting rid of the dead, attempting to put out the fires burning in the wreckage, while the soldiers are attempting to restore order, and to bring about a resumption of business in Joan city itself,,,,,,,, Yet no matter where you see refugees, back in the ruined cities or within the refugee camps of the christian postions no words of complaints are heard, which seems unusual indeed.The woe which has come upon the coutry of Calverinia is yet so great for for tears and the afflictions of individuals in the o loss of dear ones, is entirely forgotten in the heroic fight that is being made for self preservation for the community. Omen of wealth steal through the frozen streets and facing the bitter zero winds without hardly any clothing, save for a bit of torn and grimy cloth wrapped about them. Men of means are in the same sorry plight and yet go about their gruesome task of forcing Glandelinian prisoners to clean up the wreckage in so stolid a manner, that it is ob vious that the survivors have not yet awakened to the full horror of the awful situation....There ha not hardly been even any time to think.Yet it is unusually strange to not even hear the worn and haggard men refer to the loss of their families and their all, and yet when they do so it seems with al ed little concern that it would indeed indeed attract wonder and astonishment were not the senses of the visitor numbed by the terror of the awful situation. As to say it is the full reaction that is feared most by those who are so working and leading the effort to make at least the city of Joan habitable. Therefore when this work is completed and there is tim to consider about th situation a heartrending a wail of woe will go up from the millions of mourning survivors and gloomy desperation is surely expected to succeed the energy that is now so strangely manifested.Ye from what I have observed many of these men old or young who I have lost families and their all have applied for inlistments in the army and therefore I believe that the disaster caused by the enemy instead of discouraging the nation, is steel swelling the christian armies to such an enormous proportions that I do not see how it will be possible for the enmy to even think of winning the war in the future t ough many tell me Abbieannia will never win.

Yet the spirit of the people is aply illustrated by Colonel John Lansytoe one of the officers in charge of the soldiers guarding the Glandelinian toiling prisoners. This officer is sixty five years of age, and had enlistered the war the year before first as a private but rapidly rising in rank. Yet he lost his entire family wife son, and three little babies cut little cute little things too. The bodies of the son and little daughters were recovered, but a trace of his wife has been found. whether her body was taken out to sea by the swollen river or buried may never to known be known. Terrible as was the blow Lansytoe was at his post the day following the disaster, with his soldiers.

In his report to the main Government in Sacremento City Abbieannia the head of the Weather Bouare placed the loss of life at Joan city as 666,500 to 800,000 and scouted the idea that any person could estimate the property loss at the eti critical time. He predicted that it would be impossible to estimate with even $ 20,000,000 of the correct figures for Joan city alone. His estimate also was based uponwhat he said was better information than that of any other surviving citizenof Joan city or any where else as he had made a throughout inspection of the city on horseback, visiting every locality where it was possible to travel, instructions from the Government department beingto thoroughly investigate in every detail, and not leave out anything whatever nor e exaggerate., No one else had made any such canvas.

The vice presidents of three railroads after looking over the situation left by the flood within the city of Joan Leone alone said the railroad losses would about be near sixty million dollars al ne alone. As said before at Joan city the curves wharves belonging to these railroads, wharehouses, deports, tracks, and many long trains of cars were ruined.The Mio-Glleaster and Flunders and Swedish Railroad had an enormous line of track, an extending for the distance of two hundred miles washed out with many cars swept away on sidings hundreds n hundreds of them, while while the E Evangeline St clare suffered more heavily. All tracks of six lines between Big Girl Knool and Schleesbertown wity with all of the bridges were washed away with all the cars of the various sidings of every little town and villiages, scores of thousands of the frieght cars, and many train men were lost.

Naturally the question of heavy or light insurance carried on the lives and property of the people of the many ruinedcities and villiages was one most discussed hotly, after the first feeling of terror occasioned by the inm nse disad sin disaster had worn away, and the fact was developedthat all insurances whether life or pe property in any way had been very heaven heavy on everything all insurance companies were badly hit--even though in lesense degree despite the fact that even the heavy death list was taken into consideration-- and everywhere in the cities and towns heavy property and other insurance was carried by the business monand property owners of the desolated cities and towns. Although the loss of lives was absolutely inaccurate, not to be probably ever estimated, it was said the largest proportion of the victims were composed of women and children, which unusual as it seems also carried some heavy insurance in a way, and again the majority of the men drowned, frozen or killed and crushed were residents of all districts of the town. These victims whether wealthy or poor were caught in their houses, together with their families, and husbands, wives and children died together.

Even to say the men who worked for a living or who were in the arm, and even in the various branches of employment where skilled labor was not demanded for carried life and other insurance and therefore one of the most prominent insurance managers in the Abbieannian Country said three weeks after the catastrophe:::::::::::::::::::::

" Life o insurance companies will feel the blow of the storm as badly as any one else for no matter how much life insurance was carried by the victims of the flood and though very great, we have nothing now whatever to give unless it is taken up in general collections by generious people throughout the nation for many insurance companies having the richest business in the world is wiped out also by the flood.

The large proportion of the women and children among the dead however will probably lighten the burden, even though though they too carried heavy insurance, because of the large numbers quickly buried in the river, in bogs, in trenches, and otherwise without identification of those whose bodies will never be recovered.Unless the rigor of this rule is relaxed by the insurers litigationwill be boundless. Practically all the insurance companies in these three cities and elsewhere in the path of the inu inundation was wiped out, and practically no one will be able to claim insurance therefore . Even the Angelinia Aguthia, Dorothy Gale, and Big Giri Knool representatives of the largest middle Calverinia insurance companies when interviewed concurred in the opinion that the insurance polices against flood losses, as carried by people in these cities, would not go beyond beyond $ 234,567,777. Now there can be no such demand for such insurances by the survivors of the flood for no insurance exists. The head of one of the leading I insurance firms in Joan city whose building was probably washed into nothing whatever as no trace of its foundation even can be located, (thought it was a five story structure five blocks long,and six stories high,) which represented many large eastern, western, and northern big companies as well as southern said;

We carried heavy storm, flood, a war, and fire and life insurance at Joan Joan city, and many other places, and while my information on that point is limited, I feel sure the flood insurance now to be claimed is very small as few people survivied and we are wiped out so far as we can say. We held $ 5,000,000 insurance on two big lumber mills on the outskirts of Big Giri Knool and our loss is total on these t o structur s whose wreckage and lumber jams were found inside of the lower streets of Glorianna fourteen miles away. We held $ 25,000,000 insurance at Schlesedertown of flood clo only and about a million at Heidi. All this is wiped out, we are wiped out, as far as insurance is concerned the insurance of the whole nation seems wiped out, and I crossmy heart and hope to die if this is not the truth. We'll have to begin all over agi again or be beggars. Thou Throughout the flood districts of the cities more than four million houses, have been entirely swept away, five million were laid low into piles and windrows of smoking wreckage, scores and scores of millions of dollars worth of property in dry goods, grocery and other big business houses,---wholesale and retail--was totally wiped out, there was not a single surviving house in any of the villiages not entirely swept away that did not suffer severe damage, the railway insurance is wiped out, the proper ty losses in total aggregating about 345 567 $ 345,678,000 and heavy insurance nearly over that amnoynt was carried. How it can be comprehended that the enemy I has the heart just for the sake of the war to cause such a red record breaking disaster which complicates a hundred other disasters into one with it is astonis astonishing beyond means of believing."

About three weeks after the disaster the three cities presented a far different appearance than the first few days after the flood had receded. In Joan City itself some street cars were again in operation in the business part of the city, and the electric line and water service had been partly resumed. The progress made under the unusual circumstances was little short of remarkable showing therefore the courage and nature of the Abbleamnians. Yet it must not be understood by any means thatthe remaining portion of the city had been put in anything at all likes its former condition, but just the same so great a change had been brought, so much order and system prevailed by theforced help of Glandelinian prisoners where formely chaose reined reigned, that Joan City and the people who had been given giving her so noble an assistance had good reason indeed to be satified satisfied with what had been so quickly accomplished in the face of such fearful odds.. And according to statements made by gene general Vivian, the Mayor of the city, and by the Calverinian governer and by Violet, and her sisters themselves and many others, there surely was every good reas reason to b l believe that the progress of the work from that timeon would be even more satisfactorily. On that morning many began a systematic effort to start a identicl identification of the names of the dead as far as it was possible to do so, so that the information could be used for legal and other purposes.An agent was stationed at the headquarters of the Central Relief committee to recieve such names andcto and to send them to the State government to be verified. Persons who had left the city or men refugees who had joined the army by many thousands but who were inpossession of the im information concerning the dead were also notified to send sworn statements to the Commitee. Yet even then the steady stream of refugees were kept up most of these having been from Sperryville and Schlesedertown which were practically wiped out and out. There was not a wagon train which was not packed with these refugees, and refugees continued to leave for many t days thereafter for fear of the approach of the enemy whose army hovered dangerously close all the while..

And neither could any sadder sight be imagined than the picture pre presented by the long wagon load of refugees, when the long lin es of wagons started off, and moved away from the desolated city. There was not a single face that was not turned toard the ruin. There was not an eye that was not moistened by tears. And no great had rush to leave behind the scene of the flood, or to escape the eye of the hovering Glandelinian army that you could have counted scores of these long wagon trains in a day. Yet the partings was pitiful. Husbands came to the wagon trains and kissed their weeping wives or children good bye turning back to the hard work of reconstruction which confronted them with breaking of hearts, and a swelling of fury toard the enemy who had d done this. Scores of women overcome atthe last moment were then cared for by strange hands, who while those who loved them bound to the cities by necessities, could do no more than watch from afar and pray. Instead of really waiting untill the wrecked cities were reached to begin general work, step were taken to care for the armies of refugees that came to Big Giri Knool and other places, and therefore scores of thousands of refugees were fed, while the large numbers of the the sick and injured were cared for.

There was plenty of work on hand for ten times the number of Glandelinian prisoners forcibly employed under guard. The area which had not yet been touched embraced many miles. But yet now there seemed to be enough prisn r provisions on hand to feed everybody who stayed in the ruined city for weeks. But there seemed to be a great deal of trouble in properly distributing u supplies the rush at the many depotsbeing as great as at any time since they were rebuilded.Yet it seemed the weather itself was utterly merciless since the flood. There was quite a number of severe blizzards and the suffering had been terrible beyond believing, for there was not a whole roof in any of the ruined cities of the houses t at did survive. There were about two hundred thousand soldiers doing guard and police duty. The camp of what remained of the Wharve of Joan City between the Mis-pellester and the Aronberge Run Lumber company at the f ot of German street had been put into some shape, and the soldiers comfortably housed against the rigors of the severe winter weather now setting in.

There were five large commands----The Abbleamnian High Riders, under General Alting with sixty thousand men, the Consentinian Light Guards, under general Lamar with 10,000 men the Abyssinhillian Rifleshooters under general Adolfo With fifty hundred men, Battery L of Big Giri Knool with fifteen hundred men and Troop B of the Consen tinian cavarly consisting of the remainder of the forcescommanded by the chief staff general himself. The fact that not a sufficient number of pro prisoners was ava available to aid the men who were engaged in cleaning up the streets which was a great hin hindersent to preparing the way not for only rebuilding the cities but in the efforts to prevent the severe spread of the fires in the wreckage which no effort could place under control. General Vivian himself made thefollowing statement on November the 30th;

" I have not the sufficient number of prisoners within my camps just now to aid the men who are working in the streets all day long. I am not able to transfer prisoners from other ar as for they are too far distant. I have not the means just now to send any elsewhere. I hope and believe that even the country itself will understand the awful situation. Yet we must have these cities cleaned up at any cost, and with the greatest speed possible, and if the fires in the wreckage are at put under control with all haste and at the same time done well, there may bea conflagration and if it breaks out in any one of these three cities and burns southeastward, it will not be Calverinia alone that will suffer from a record breaking forest fire. A forest fire spreads usually with a speed that nothing usually can stop, and it is not only for the sake of the State of Calverinia, or for these three cities but for other states and their towns outside that I urge that above all things other cities should send all fire departments that can be brought to help to put out the fire.The Nation has been most kind in its response to the appeals from the refugees. From what I hear more food and fuel and other provisions sufficient for only temporary purposes at least are on the way. Yet the Country does not understand. Everything is beyond what any man can comprehend.

Emperor Vivian."

As to theprobability of a great congi conflagration general Hansonia commanding the military interment camps at Dorothy Gale said;

" I am in personal favor in having fire departments from other cities come to our aid to put out the fires in as much rubbish as it is possible, and as quickly as it can be done. I do not pre predict such a conflagration as is feared, but I think the things are comingto that point where such a nation wide fire may be possible unless prompt measures are taken, and there is nothing so dreaded as flood, and fire. Put out every mass of burning material and put it out at once."

All the churches in the three cities either being totally wrecked or ruined, the devind services had to be in most cases suspended or were given outside in the streets and elsewhere by the priests. Mass was usually celebrated at any place or in the more safer ruins of some large structure. One of the priests Father John preached a most eloquent sermon a feeling one at that, in which he spoke of the awful calamity brought on by the ruthless foe that had befallen the people. After expressing heart felt sympathy with the afflicted and distressed, he advised all men who had no families surviving to either go to work in burying the dead or better still to get back at the enemy and join the army. The bishops in the main christian

Army who have been very native in their efforts to ease the suffering at the cities and one of them received a telegram from the Archbishop of Angelinia Agathia, a stating that the diocese of that city and others would see that all Catholic orphan children sent to his care were to be kindly provided for, and also that there were many people more than willing to adop the unfortunates.

Angelinia Agathia and Big Girl Knool were the two centers of relief distribution and also the key o to joan city.. They were practically the only way in or outfor many weeks. Thousands of upon thousands of ref ugees passed through or stopped there to every day. Angelinia Agathia as far as she was filled with them, do was Big Girl Knool but large numbers fearing more such terrible scenes if they remained went right through to points further north or southifree transporation was furnished to any point as far as Pandora Abi Abbieannia a distance of three thousand miles northwest, providing they had relatives or friends who would take care of them. Many thousands of the refugees arived at Angelinia Agathia scantily clothed and in a most pitiful condition.

" Indeed vast as the work is now all the people are being provided for" said the Chairman of the Transportation Division of the Relief Committee. " We have not let a single soul go through uncared for, and provided for."

There was no curiousity in this disaster, yet people who had urgent business had a hard time to get permits to go there. There were many foriegners in the country who on account of their language but being understood could not get there and they were sure beyond any doubt they had lost friends and relatives, and in their own language languages swore at the Glandelinians roundly. One foriegner who was an Englishmenst saw a captive Glandelinian flag on a wagon being taken to some place. He seized it and torn it in pieces before any one could stop him. There were no camra f. fiends in this case, and even news paper men who came to the city first to take vies views of the Ruins, wrote back to the news paper condemns these few lines;

" The scenes here are too shocking to take vides off. As Helping to force Glande Lilian prisonrs to go to work under guard gathering up frozen corpses. I'D like to take a picture of some of these Glandelinians by camra camera getting a good lashing like they do to the child slaves."

Both Big girl Knool and Angelinia Agathia was in a similar state. guards surrounded the depot of the Great Mis-pollester Pandora Railroad one of the many roads running south, but the only one we, now, and kept back the crowds that had gathered to see the refugees t come in as many believing relatives were among them were frantic and screamed with grief and frenzy. In every city in this country every person hung black crept cloths all flags were at half mast and a proclamamation was issued by the mayor of every city copies of which printed on large red cards were posted conspicuously all over the citi cities denouncing the en enemy for fighting the war against Non combatants more than they do against the armies, and denouncing the Glandelinian Armies as the biggest cowards of all who slain and massacre little children to suit the ear from by.

The catastrophe all but paralized all river & ipping and railroad shipping business in the flood visited section..As Had the flood struck a few weeks later the loss would have been greatly increased, as the harvest crops would then have been placed upon all the river ports. Heavy financial losers were the Gemini Spy and Scout societies. One branch k known as the United Gemini with the main headquarters at Sacramento Abbieannia lost one thousand out of a series of lodges of six thousand. Their policies ranged from one million to ten million dollars and this too was swept away.

Six hundred and fifty five million odd dollars in Abbieannian money represented the valuable or value of the life i insurance policies alone carried by the old line companies of the State of Cal ornia at the time of the flood which was also totally wiped out. It was estimated that $ 44,000,000 represented the life risks carried in Joan and Schlossertown by the regular companies, and that over $22,000,000 was carried by assessment and even other organizations. The insurance men declared it was probable that of the persons killed in the recent disaster ninty thousand five hundred were men, and that therefore according to statistics all of them had life policies of an average value of from $ 2,000 to $ 10,000,. The women had much more. On this basis the insurance was at a great loss for all the old life companies and a great many assessment and even Catholic Fraternal Companies losses for every reputable organization was totally crippled thereby.

All the accurate figures of the losses could not yet be made but be above figures rep represented the calculations hastily made by the head superintendant of the domestic agencies of the Mati Mutual Life Insurance Company of Angelinia Agathia. in regard to this he said Name withheld for good purposes,

" The most striking feature of the insurance situation at the cit, of Joan The most striking feature at the city of Joan and other places is the difficulty that is to rise when the adjustment of all claims are to be taken up. It will not be said this way because so many scores of thousands of bodies have been hastil, buried without identification, or thousands more taken out into the sea, river or cremated in the fires of burning wreckage or swept beyond reach of recovery by the flood but because so many insurance companies too have been totaly wiped out. Whole families have been destroyed in unaccountable instances and insurance papers have suffered in the general total destruction of property. Insurance of all kinds is obliterated. This state of affairs will make it almost impossible for even any one to establish their claims for even if they can and have the papers the organizations are crushed, destroyed, wiped out with their own members dead and therefore are unable to pay even a red cent and have to begin over again or go out begging. Even our agency property near Scholedertown was destroyed, and we have to accurate report of our Sherryville losses and o southern Calverinia losses so it is surely impossible to give other than general estimate s of what they may be. The class of people insuring in all the regular companies are in general surrounded by conditions that should have rendered them better risks in the event of such an unusual record reaking disaster as this but if my information is correct, the best of the people even suffe suffered most and as may hear of further crushing losses.

I think concerning Sherryville we carried between one hundred and two hundred I think concerning Sherryville and other places about over two hundred million dollar insurance especially in Schlossertown and all that had been wiped out.

For flood we had about twenty million dollar risk in joan city and all that too is among the lost. Our reportsfrom other parts of Calverinia are not in, and I think that even any of our surviving companies will be absolutely fo fortunate if it gets off with a loss of less than even $ 10,000I believe however every concern has severe unaccountable losses because that the fact is that in such a disaster as this the loss of personal property including insurance companies and the loss of life is greater at every section. The accident inn insurance companies suffered equally as bad as the others." The situation on the night about the day of November the 30th just a few weeks or so after the awful disaster was to be tyus described by a singular person who was said to have arived in the city of Schlossertown itself the day after the flood had receded or frozen over.

" It might in some way be possible by this time at least to giv give the h whole world some idea of the immense relief tht is necessary here..There were about one million people in the city before this d id disaster occured, and now only a little over six hundred and fifti five thousand are said to have survived. And to make it more sure this later statement has been made after the most careful investigation from the best sources of information. About three hundred thousand of the survivors most of them women and children have left the city to go to better places or seek safty within the christian lines, either temporarily or probably for good.

Of these remaining all of these have to be helped and only Heaven knows how long. The question of taking care of so many refugees is indeed a difficult one, and even the men who know mst of the dreadful situation, and who have laboured day and night since the recession of the flood in better cold and under hardships beyond explaining will not answer no one when questioned.Mr Turner the executive head of the relief work said it might be possible that there are ever three hundred thousand pr persons who may have left the city, and yet there was not one person found anywhere who did not need any assistance whatever. And the head man of the Schlossertown news who is a most careful and conversative man said he was fully in the opinion that all of the survivors lost everything, no matter how rich or poor they were and were dependent to day and will be for many weeks to come..

Others familiar with the situation were also asked their opinions and they estimated variously the numbers that needed the help the most. The conclusion is forced that there are to day in all parts of the country in many cities people who had fled from the flood scenes, about three to four millions in all who must be clad and clothed. All of those who were in fair circumstances and least all is absolutely astonishing. Even reli f cannot be limited to those who forced the poor class before the flod floods. flood.

One of the most iltelligent of men left Joan city also to day, taking his children to his relatives to Angelinia Agathia his wife having been drowned. He said " Before the flood I had a very good home, and a business which paid me between four hundred and five hundred thousand dollars a year. To day I have only my two children. My home and business house was swept away, and even my insurance is gone and my wife is drowned. I see no way of re-establishing it here in the near future so i'm going to Angelinia Agathia with my children where I believe we will be safe from such a ruthless foe as the Glandelinian soldiers."

This unfortunate man had a Catholic Good and book company. At the military headquarters one of the principal officials doing temporary service and watching that the Glandelinians prisoners did their share said;

" Before the Glandelinians et started this flood I had a good home and a good income which I saved out of my twenty twenty five years of hard work. I felt content rich and happy..Of course if only mu my house and business was the things just swept away I would not complain, but even my wife and family, mother and father are dead. Why the fact is sir I don't even own these clothes I stand before you in. I borrowed them from a refugee more fortunate fortunate..just for this I'm going to get my papers of the Draft board and stay in the army. And if any of these prisoners stop working one hour I'll run my bayonet into him.I'll show them what they recieve in pay for causing such an inhuman disaster as this."

Now these surely are not what a ny one would call exceptional cases..The, are absolutely common casEven men wo who worked be for big or small salaries, who rented or owned good homes, and considered themselves fairly well provided for, so far as the world goes, are to day every single one,not only without a red cent, but without food, without clothes, and ocen many thousandswithout families or wives r children or relatives.

There are exactly 10,000,000 who must be fed and lothed clothed untill they can work out their own salvation. And then as they did all they could to help our cause when they were well off something must be done to help the worthy get on their feet and ma make a fresh start. But many o people may leave these cities for good or at least untill the war shifts to another portion of the country. It is very plain however that more than the number expected will go especially from gperryville and Jo ,oan if the enemy not so far away makes a move to advance. These three cities it is hoped however will still be a home to the great majority. They were three cities of fine local pride, and they were three of the most beautiful of Calverinian cities, and with their beautiful river front they were pleasant places to live in either summer or winter.Those who do not fear the approach of the enemy and who can stay at these places and live there in spite of the ruin I believe will surely do so.

If the country responds to the needs in anything like the measure given to the crushed christian armies at Delight's Junction, and other stricken places, these three cities as a community will not only be restored by the aid of thenation but with the turning point of this war will enter upon a greater future, than was expected before the enemy let loose such a flood. Yet this does seem to be a most unusual and extraordinary thing for me or even others to say. And however it had been the experience, wherefore it is surely expected here and at any point where another such a disaster will occur, and there is not the slightest doubt for the restoration of these three cities and for the farms and other places so suddenly laid low by the calamity. And if in the future any of these places celebrates a big flood anniversary the day upon which the courage of the people of these cities was rebourn will and ought to be remembered.....

From a full organization throughout the Calverinian country the relief work is said to have been divided y many sections. E . Even in the cities a depot and a subcommittee were established ineach ward of these three cities and other places visited by the flood. o one is found idle and there are thousands of orphans, there are childless and wifeless men and windows also who must have care and help. ut the able bodied are working as many glandelinian prisoners as it is possible under the direction of bosses. The glandelinian prisoners are only pai paid in food and clothing. In this way the relief committee is within the first week meeting the full needs of the many survivors and at the same time gradually clearing the streets, and cutting out the fires still burning i the ruins and windrows of wreckage. Prisoners who try to shirk in the work will recieve no proper clothing or no food. Prisoners who will not work shall not eat is the principal adopted when the organization was perfected and it is certainly being carried in to strict effect.

A single report made by one of the a ard ward committees to Mr turner will serve to really show onwhat scale this plan is being carried out. In my ward " in my ward" said this committee man I have six hundred Glandelinian soldiers dressed in prison gurd at work under the point of the bayonet, and I am feeding three thousand six hundred persons, mostly women and children....."

The system of the relief organization throughout the whole flood region is more than unusually admirable and, absolutely wonderful and astonishing. Perhaps ndv never before was enconomy practiced so rigidly in the distribution of the Nations largess. " Our Am Mr turner said" is to give not a single cent to the Glandelinian prisoners for they are even not being treated here as prisoners of war for what glandelinian soldiers do in this war, does not make them as moodlers soldiers but as wild beasts, and therefore they are given no limited time in the labor of clearing the wreck strewn streets of the cities and the burial burial of the cremated or frozen dead among the wreckage, and we push the work just as rigidly as the glandelinians do the work of their child slaves and we'll continue to do so untill we have removed to that extent the ravages of the flood caused by the equally wicked members of their comrades. It is said those who had bursted the dam of that lake are prisoners at the Internment camp at Big girl knool and they will be facing the firing squad as soon as the evidence is against them. We force all glandelinian soldiers brought in under guard who can work to work as fast and as hard as it in is in their power no matter even how bitter cold or stormy the weather is as the work has to be done, and we give them proper food and good clothing as remuneration which is more than they ever think of giving to a poor littl little child slave.. We also scrutinize most carefully all applications for charity and grant none if the applicant is able to render service. We adopted this plan in the beginning beginning, and we are going to continue it come what may.. ost of our men folk take a charge of the prisoners and pushes them at the work. ome of Glandelinland complain but the answer they recieve is;

" If you don't like to work, then don't do it. but then neither will you eat, and neither will you have any sufficient clothing to meet the demands required by the cold weather that is coming on."

Indeed to those who are unwilling to work we have applied the aurthority of severe martial law.All the Glandelinian prisoners brought in at emperor Vivians orders are hoe hard at work storm or shine, cold of moderate and the contributions which we are recieving from the sympathizing nation and others are going to pay for all the repairing of the ruins that is necessary, and help us gain more prisoners for this most urgent work which the Glandelinians have imposed upon themselves by making this dreadful flood. All the days following till now have indeed wrought the most surprising changes in conditions at these three cities, and at other places visited by the flood, and each day has been a chapter in itself. The few days after the flood were days of paralysis. On the week after came the beginning of realization. The first week might have been called the crisis period. And the crisis was passed safely, and what has been accomplished since the turning point a little after a week since the flood is more than unusual.It is amazing indeed, indeed again it is an almost as incredible as some of the effects of this visitation are without precedent.

On the first seven days after the flood had receded the surviing surviving people did nothing else but go about dazed and bewildered, gathering a few hundred of the bodies which were in their way or making very feeble attempts to put on the fires then raging withinthe relaming tops of the ruins. On the eighth day the born leaders who are usually not discovered in a community untill some great emergency arises began to forge in front. And they surely were not men from one rank in gint point of wealth or even of l intellengence. They came from every class that is possible. For example there was Hendro Kornmaner the Carpenter. Frozen bodies which lay exposed to the rigid winter weather lay exposed in the streets and which were necessary to remove somewhere lest they be stepped on were carried to any kind of a temporary morgue .ntill thousands pon thousands thousands lay in rows on the floor.

Then a big problem in mortaility such as no other nation yet had ever faced was presented.Winter pestilences caused by the survivors facing all kinds of exposures to the fierce weather seemed about to take possession of what the dreadful flood had left. And immediate disposition of all these bodies were also necessary to a save the living with the coming summer. Then it was that general Vivians and others who by common impulse had come together to deal with the problem found Hendro Kenrhander. This fellow took up the most gressome task ever seen away from any of our bloodiest battlefields of the past year. He had to have many helpers. Though the surviving men citizens volunteers they were not enough, landelinian prisoners were brought in and pressed at the se servive at the point of the bayonet. Yet though they did not derserve deserve it whiskey was carried by the bucketful to these men and they were drenched with it. The stimulant was kept at hand and applied gints continuously. Only in this way was it possible for the glandelinian prisoner withthe stoutest heart to work in such surroundings and in such severe November weather. Under the direction of Hendro kornmander these scores of thousands of bodies already collected and others brought from the many sections of the cityi citie cities, those which were quickest found--were loaded onto barges and rafts, and boats relaunched into the river and taken far off into the middle of the stream to be cast into the wat waters....."

The following trade statement issued from Angelinia Agathia on november 29th, showed the effect of the great flood on all farming commercial circles, which ran as follows;;;;;;;

" The great un inundation that devastated nearly three hundred miles of southern Calverinian lands, almost wiping out three huge cities, and doing immense damage in other parts of the country caused total reduction in the volume of farming business at the south, cut off all communications with the other Abbieannian States by wire and railroad, which have not yet shown even any amount of their losses of earnings as yet, but even after such a disaster a recuperative power is as alwa,s shown. From many quarters of that section of Calverinia there can be no distribution of merchandise, and all november crip is all wiped out, and therefore all such crops have cause immense rises in prices hoisted especially by the sharp rise in Pumpkins, grain and the like. The very pumpkins, chickens and cows and mills c. closed on November 30th at the ghe highest price in twenty years, and a large short interest was awaiting reaction. Instead there came news of the disaster in all parts of southern Calverinia and sensational reports that 11,000,000 bushels of pumpkins, and tons o upon tons of grain and barley that have been totally destroyed, all cows wiped out, chickens as well and all farming implements and machines and animals wiped out washed away. At the Great Angelinia Agathia exchange trading was far in excess of all previous records, and prices rose by leaps and bounds. All farming markets failed to respond in many cities and therefore all crops rose from eleven to twenty cents higher than previously. The rise in all these materials caused sharp advances in milk, and eggs, and meats.. In one week eggs rose from sixteen cents a dozen to a dollar half dozen, milk from ten cents a quart to a dollar a quart, chickens, even it was lucky if a rich person could buy it, and clothing rose to fabiou fabilous prices. Buyers who had been delaying for weeks were anxious to secure liberal supplies, both instant and distant.

One general appeal which brought in much money and supplies was the following; the one being from the Red Cross Relief corps, war Department of joan city,,,,,, " Red Cross Relief Corps.

War Department, joan city,

" The appal ing calamity that ha has befallen southern Calverinia because of the enemy and along both sides of the big Aronburgs Run River has smitten many thousands of our comrades in the three cities, and villiages, towns and thousands of farms. In may instances countless numbers of whole families are lost, the insurance concerns are wiped out, houses are totally wrecked or entirely swept away, and immeasureable ammount of live stocks and fall crops swept away.

Emperor vivian had drawn up his army in the vinicity of the three cities so hard hit by the flood and his big army is doing all it can but despite the numbers of soldiers there are in his army all his efforts are absolutely inadequate. Systematic organization and assistance alone can avert distress, and we therefore appeal to all the members of this department in behalf of these comrades. They had made their last stand and effort to secure for themselves and families homes in the flooded districts of war torn Calverinia.
Their all is involved. Far along in the evening of their life they even cannot recuperate. If there was time to make another crop they have nothing with which to make it. Unle s we help them they must abano abandon their homes, their all. If the principa l of our order------catholic societies, charity, and loyalty------ are of any avail it is surely is time to shoW it. Catholic Fraternity means organization----charity means everything, and is always known as the greatest of all. Loyalty means standing by our comrades as well as the flag in this war. They are just the same to us as our brotyers in arms against the wkef wicked enemy, they are our kindred in adversity..
We confidently expect every post every member of oevery Red Cross Corps to contribute money and send supplies. Remittance and supplies from the R. D. should be made to general Richard pindernine."

Department commander."

The second was by the Superior of a gisiters Convent addressed to the o members of every nun and sister and lay brother and other Religious concerns throughout the Abbiesnnian Country;

" Whereas, A great Calamity has befallen three cities and many towns and villiag villieges, hundreds of thousands are dead, many more are dying, and wounded and suffering from exposure to the cold and are to be cared for at many points. Numbers of traveling men are also seriously wounded and we deem it necessary for the sake of our Blessed Lord to deem it necessary to call on every body in the country to con tribute as much as it is in their power to help aid and assist all the stricken of th the flood. Therefore we appeal to you in the name of hairtity iscaring for all orphans of the unfortunate vi victims of the man made flood. I trust that this appea appeal to the nation will m be met by a very quick response.

CHAPTER SEVEN..

THE RESULTS OF THE AWFUL DISASTER, AND THE SUFFERING, CAUSES THOUSANDS OF THE SURVIVORS TO BECOME INSANE. SAID TO BE ABOUT 56,789 OF THE DEMENTED ONES.½-------APPARENT INDIFFERENCE TO THE LOSS OF RELATIVES. FLOOD REFUGEES START A PANIC IN A LARGE HOTEL.. WASHED UP ON A NARROW LOG, ONE WHO WAS SAVED AS BY A MIRACLE..... SERIOUS DANGER FROM FIRE STILL CONTINUES. A GREAT SCARCITY OF TRAINS AND BOATS TO CARRY PEOPLE TO OTHER CITIES----MORE GLANDELINIAN PRISONERS IMPORTANTED INTO THE REGION OF THE INUDATION----UNTOLD SUFFERING OTHER PLACES OUTSIDE THE THREE CITIES HIT BY THE BIG FLOOD. EXPERIENCE OF A MAN WHO CAME FROM ANFELINIA AGATHIA. MOST TERRIBLE FIVE DAYS OF HIS LIFE.

As a result of the loss of relatives and friends and from their awful experiences during the big flood thousands upon thousands of people became insane during the first two weeks succeeding the flood. Indeed they had bravely borne the loss of relatives endured the hunger fatigue and exposure to the cold and blizzard storms and other hardships had been apparently unmindful of the horrors resulting from the disaster and had as a rule given no mental indications while the disaster was on, but when the danger was passed, and relief from the great strain came, the minds of many gave way at once. The Abbiesnnian officers who were in charge of the military guards which took care of the refugees, and some of which were connected with the relief work also told of many hundreds of cases which came under their observation.
The first week following the disaster the 19th and 20th one of them said in recounting his experiences;

" There are at least over fifty thousand persons among the refugees whose minds minds have become unblan unbalanced, and many of these have lost every vestige of their reasons, there being so many raving maniacs among them that it is beyond comprehension many of which came u under my own personal observation. One of these whom I saw personally the first day was a brick layer, this man occupying a room in the barracks of the christian camp and he kept raving and pacing the floor and kept calling on God to strike him and all y the world to death, continually invoking the vengeance of the Diety for something which the glandelinians have done themselves, and even declaring that he was the cause of the war and its results. He has lost his family and home, and by a greay great miracle saved himself.

As soon as he was out of personal danger on those awful last nights of peril and horror he commenced rescueing woken and children and saved many people according to some soldiers and citizens who knew the circumstances.
He then lost his mind. He finally created so much excitement at the barracks that a squad of soldiers were detailed to arrest him. He heard them approaching and thinking they were Glandelinians coming to attack him he first resisted for hours, holding soon a whole company of armed soldiers at bay, and then leaped out of a four story barracks to an adjoining building below. His fall was said by soldiers to have been some what broken but his body struck a baywindow of the roof of that strig structure and yet as badly injured as he was, he continued his mad flight fighting his way to freedom though he did not succeed in injuring any one except himself. As he went he holloored as loudly as he could;

" I defy you dirty Glandelinian skunks and the whole world itself to destroy me. What are you Glandelinians? nothing but stinking pole cats."

He even then baffled all of his persuers and finally escaped. This occured at about twelve oclock in the noon time, and yet this is aly one of the incidents that prevail among the refugees that are still within the christian l lines or elsewhere.
Also a man whose wife and children were drowned in the flood had been searching in vain among the wreckage in Scholdertown for several days, and yesterday in a driving blizzard located their bodies in the frozen sheet of ice near Fourty Second street, and they took it in charge that is the soldiers for they too had seen it. He protested violently and rushed and fought desporately to take possession of the bodies. The soldiers however were stern and had to discharge their duty, and the husband and father frantically demented, was bound while the bodies were hurled upon a wagon cart to be taken to the river . The man made the most frantic efforts to get away from the soldiers but could not succeed, and even told them that he owned the world and that they had no right to treat their supreme ruler that one way.
In the course of my many rounds I saw many families all of them half naked in that biting cold, and whether they were or not they appeared crazy nevertheless and would look into the face of every stranger with a peculiar vacant sa stare that was most pitia le pitiable in the extreme. Many of these were hurrying tward the places where provisions and fuel and ot er supplies were being distributed. They had lost their homes and did not even own the clothing they had on their backs.

There were many thousands in a similar condition indeed. Frank Hurner a young man who had been very active for four days and nights in saving the lives of many during the flood also became insane not only, because of the loss of his family which he was nt able to rescue, but because of the awful scenes he witnessed. Hurners friendsindeed first noticed his condition when he told them that one of the persons he rescued was Emperor Vivian himself, and that the Vivian girls had persisheen perished most miserably in the flood, and that he had seen Christ walking in the sky leading a Glandelinian army on to victory against the christians.

Hurner then was r brought to his room on the third floor of the hotel apparenrly apparently sane. Soon afterward he became violent, and acted like a man suffering from Hydrophobia. The Nurse engaged to watch him was killed, and when the friends of the insane man returned they found the dead nurse lying on the floor and that Hurner had wrecked wrenched the window out, and had leaped ot pon an adjoining roof and ten ce thence to the street. He was seen running tward the river defying Heaven to drown him and in all probability did throw himself into the water and was drowned.

Another case was that of an old woman who was caught by the flood and with two other women and many women and children found refuge on the top of a string of floating box cars. As the flood gradually subsided the old woman started for her home perfectly sure her daughters and husband was safe. She found a sea of frozen waters with bodies in the ice over the site of her home. Then among the first victims carried into the temporary morgue were the poor old ladys husband, and three grand children, brother, and two daughters. These were quickly followed by her brothers wife, her two sisters, and one grand son. She is now always seen laughing every time any one meets and her and when they always ask her whether her relatives survived she only makes a great joke of the whole affair, and says that she would kiss every Glandelinian soldier she saw. The evident fact isthat the shock has overthrown the poor old ladys reason for those who see her say her eyes have an awful stare and the expression of her face is very peculiar. Shehas recently been brought into our camps a nervious wreck, without a relative in the world, and the doctors say she will not live long. These sighs have made me have a very joylous feeling myself. The feeling i is this, ! If I had my say about it I'd shoot every Glandelinian prisoner on sight. Foes wo who cause this do not re deserve any quarter and I do not see why they get it."

The Albertorie Hotel proved (in Joan City) a havenof refuge of nearly six thousand homeless and flood driven refugees most of them men women and children. No one no matter who they were were refuse admittance to the sheltering building. Every one was taken in ithout question and the building indeed was thrown open to all who song sought its protecting wings.

In the midst of the highest fury of the flood probably of its fifth day duration the hundreds upon hundreds of little children terrified by the force of the flood which shook the big building like an earthquake, screamed and yelled as if a hurricane had been let loose in the building untill the nerves of the other refugees were shattered, and a panic seemed about to start. It was then that the owner of the hot-tel byhaving some bands start playing caused a hush in the wold pandemonium. Therefore when quiet had been restored, the hired men of the hotel addressed the terrified children and told them that it was no time and scenes for such acting, that if they were so frightened as that they should pray, and pray with all their hearts, and the Creator of all things would hear their offerings and petitions above the roar of the flood, whichraged with increased fury, asthey spoke to the awe awe stricken children.

The poor children listened attentively indeed. The caused of the children fright was of the reason that the south wall of that section of the building in which the children had sought protection fell because of the force of the rushing waters. Therefr e order and silent prayer were soon brought about by the presence of mind and rh the determined of the hotel men. Many families that had been supos seperated by this war made flood were just the same united by the waters of this flood tossing them into this very haven of refuge.

Many heart moving scenes were presented indeed by these unions as the half dead, mangled and bruised unfortunates were rescued and dragged from the si swirling waters, by the more fortunate members of their families. All the hird hands of the hotel were on hand to administer cheer and mercy to the sufferers, many of whom were more dead than alive when brought into the shelter. Within this very hotel six babies came into the world during the time of the flood. The owner of the hotel in speaking of the incidents of these dreadful days an nights within the walls of the hostel hotel said that he believed it as was the first time in the history of the country that babies had ever been born in his hotel. "Wever ewever they were xhristened for no one expected to see the light of another day," and it was voted that these babies should not leave the world they had just entered without being baptized, and therefore the little ones were baptized.

Mrs Jennie Turner Kornman was one of the mothers and whose nw born babe was christ ened after its mother, it being a girl.....and indeed as to said it the experience of this poor ,other mother was horrible indeed(you are in need) However a short description was learned from a war correspondent who worked for the Angelinia Agathia Daily Times as told by the owner of the hos hotel himself. This poor woman was thrown on the mercies of the disasterous flood when her home went down and was washed away. The family had been forced to seperate when they were forced to abandon their home to the fury of the sudden flood. When Mrs Kornman was carried away on the roof of the wrecked house, she lost all traces of the other mmb members of the family but never lost faith and courage. Finallybborne on Finally borne on with great speed by the force of the current the roof was hurled swiftly against some obstruction and the next instant Mrs Kornman was hurled from her improvised raft, and managed to secure hold of a long thin pole of wood floating in the water and which was so rocked by the waves as to look like a long straight serpent swimming in the water.

Almost in the same position as a man riding the rail but never daring to let go the poor woman sufveri suffering agonies, was protected to a limited extent and yet it was exposed to the cold of the water and of the cold winds above. On went the long log tossed high on the flood bumping and rushing into driftwood, untilll untill the crude bark was hurled against the hotel we walls, and was pulled into the building. The little baby was born a few hours later, and while the good women among the other refugees and some others in the building were atrending to the mother and child another chapter in this familys history was being enacted just witho without the walls of the hotelll hotel..

In a telegraph pole in the conve hotel yard a young man a brother of Mrs Kornman battled with the zero winds and the rushing waters who while clinging fast to the cross tree of the pole which swayed and shook from side to side from the force of the rushing waters. He knew not where he was and he could in the darkness of night merely discern the outlines of the hotel . While not knowing his chance of life or death he heard thexplaintive cry of a child not far away. Reaching out with one hand he caught the dress of a seven year of old girl and pulled her out. The child had run the mill race buoyed by the force of the flood and had not even had time to realise her peril. The young man in the tr telegraph pole was Mrs Kornmans daughters or brother and the child which had come to him on the waves of the flood was Mrs Kornmans little girl. A few minutes afterwards a rescuing party was sent out from the hotel in response to loud and frantic cries for help and found the young man and his niece and brought him to the sheltering structure. The reunion of at least a part of the family followed about five minutes later.. ....

Destitute save for a p few personal effects carried in a small round bundle and with nerves shattered by more than a week of unspeakble horror Mr and Mrs Turpo Turpo with their three little daughters, six to ten years old reached Angelinia Agathia on an evening from the flood swept districts of Calverinia.

"Yes indeed we were fortunate" said Mrs Turpo as she leaned wearily back in a large rocking chair and tenderly contemplated her three little children at her side." It seems to me just like some other dream, and when I think ofthe thousands and thousands of childrenwho were killed or drowned and frozen to death before our very eyes very eyes, I feel as though I always ought to be satisfied no matter what comes."

Mr Turpo said;

" The reports from all the stricke[illegible] are not so third as appaling as the situation really is. We left the ill fated city of Sperryville Wednesday afternoon going by train to Big Girl Kneel City and then again by rail to Dorothy Gale. The condition of Sperryville at that ti e time while showing an improvement was awful and nevershall I or my children or my poor wife forget the horrible scenes that met our eyes as the train on which we left steamed out of the region. There were bodies frozen into the solid flood on all sides of us. In some places they were frozen tight into snow covered windrows of wreckage, and the stench from burning bodies in fire swept piles of wreckage was horrible.

I resided with my family at 1166 fourty Third street. This is fourteen blocks away from the great Arob Aronburgs Run river yet my house with thousands of others were entirely swept away at about the very first day of the flood, and with it went everything we had in the world. Fifteen minutes or so before the flood struck us I took my wife and children to a six story brick structure of solid walls two w feet thick and we were saved along with a great number of others who sought refuge there. When we went through the streets the water was up to our arms and we carried the children on our heads. Ten minutes later the water had reached a epth of four y fourty feet here. I assisted for several days in the work of rescue. In one pile of ice covered and frozen debris we found several women who seemed to have escaped the fury of the waters but was froxen to death. The streets of what survived of this good city presented a most grewsome appearance. Every availablewagon and vehicle in the city is being used frequently to th transport the dead, and it is no uncommon thing to find hundreds of bodies cremated in the rows of burning wr wreckage or in ruined house tops. The stench in the city from burning bodies and other things is very nauseating. Since the flood the only water that could be used for drinking purpose was that of melted snow and ice and yet this is little better than no water at all. ince this city was placed under martial law conditions have been much better and there has not been much lawlessness since for the soldiers have shown no 2 qva quarter and have orders to shoot on sight, and this has a wonderful effect upon the disguised „landelinians who have daren to flock into the ruined city.

Many of the „landelinians brought within the city at the orders of „mperor vivian is made to work at the point of the bayonet and the punishment for a refusal a is a o about the same as hat given out to the „landelinian ghouls and vandals and the like,..I saw fourteen Glandelinian prisoners shot in one day because they refused to do as ordered. There were hidden in an old box car sixteen other „landelinians who were found by the Abhi-annian soldiers hiding there rather than work in the ruined city and these rebels probably hab have been publicly executed before this time.

In the work of recu rescue we have come across whole familes tied together with long ropes and in many instances mothers had their babes clasped in their arms. All these bodies were so badly froen that they were as hard as the ice itself.Hundreds of unfortunates st·gg,le into Big „irl Knool every day and indeed I must say their condition is very pitable indeed you are in need. A hundred have lost their reason, and the citizens of gig Girl Knool are doing all in their power to meet the demands of the sufferers and every available buisding building in this city has been converted into some kind of a hospital.. When we arived in gig Girl Knool we had scarcely enough clothing to cover us to shelter us from the terrible cold, and what we had on did not belong to us, and the citizens fitted us out and started us free of charge southeast on the Arenburg Limited. The fear of the results of so many facing such exposure drove us from the region. Already many news paper men and war correspondents are flocking into the city, not trying to get details of the scene as usually they do, but these too have lost friends and relatives in the great flood. In many instances whole familes had been wiped out of existance, and the sorros of this seems to be great.. "

One of the real serious dangers which the big cities so hard hit by the floodd faced for many days was fire. puring the two weeks succeeding the great inundation snow had fallen often but most ofthe of wreckage which had fioed upon the surface of the flood waters had been so far above as not to recieve any weting whatever, and even the upper parts of the remaining wrecked houses were so much like tinder, all piled mountian high in every direction and most of this was continually seeting infernos inside and smoking so thickly as to cover the sky by day with immense rolling clouds, and by night with a red glow seen for a score of miles. In nearly all parts of the wrecked cities the many fire hydrants were buried sixty feet in ice and wreckage, in some places a hndred feet deep in wreckahe wreckage and even then the water supply at best was only of the most meagner kind. And the fere fire department of these cities that survived was small indeed and badly crippled and was utterly powerless to stay these smouldering flames. There was no aid nearer than Big Girl Knool and that was fifty miles away.

In view of all the then exix existingconditions it was no wonder that he cry arose among the soldiers on guard when the fires seemed to grow worse; " Get all the women and children to the main christian lines,,------anywhere but of out of these cities and towns" nor was it a wonder at all that with many trains carrying three hundred passengers and making three trips half per day people fairl fairly fought to be taken on board.
All during the day of November the 30th fears were entertained by the aurthorities that even this service was liable to be cut off by the enemy armies, and the people of these tree three cities left without anymeans of getting to the christian camps owing to the menac menacing attitutede of the „landelinian army so close by.
The sint sanitary conditions did not improve to any great extent whatever.
The chairman of the committee in charge of caring for the sick and injured and those suffering from the effects of exposure was proceeding with immediate dispatch, for he said more and more doctors were being needed, and he requested that about one hundred outside physicians come to the three cities or to the christian lines and wor work for at least two months. and if needed , longer.
As said before the eletric light service of the three cities were completely destroyed, and the eletricians of the city declared it would be nearly three or four months before even the business portion of any one of the cities could even be lighted.
Yet this was the cry of the surviving citizens of Schloedertown;;;
" more glorious Schloedertown will be rebuilt in place of the old one even though it does seem to be a task beyond human power to ever remove even what is left of the wreckage of the ruins even with the o coming of next summer. The total number of people fed in many places throughout the flood districts was newely one million and no accurate statement of the amount of supplies could be obtained;;; as they were ordered to be put in the general stock as soon as they had arived..... Even the inhabatants of these three cities recieved a second big scare on the nit

night november the 30th when it became rumored that a big forest fire was heafing heading tward gig Girl Knool where all the relief trains were said to be side tracked and was all burning with its precious supplies, of fuel, food, and clothing and other prov provisions. The scare grew out of a good sized forest fire all right which destroyed a portion of the woods near Arenburg Run city andwas sweeping tward the town routing the people ou out of it. The fire broke out at noon through a mysterious cause but was not observable untill nightfall, when the go glow in the sky could be seen at Schloedertown. put emperor Vivian himself was reassured by telegraph that a second such awful Calverinian calamity was out of the question that no forest fire was within ten miles of gig Girl Knool, that the rel relief relief supplies were safe and that the big fire that was burning was being fought by thousands of men and being rapidly brought under control by the aid of snow and dirt. one feature of the eforts efforts to relieve the people of these three cities was the delay caused by the inter·en interference of the enemy in getting the supplies to emperor Vivians army. On long train load after another was in Big Girl Knool which would have assisted materially in the work of relief, but on account of the furt further frustration of the transportation facilities brought on by Glandelinian soldiery they could not be hurried there, and hundred of small conflict have ensued. There was but one track and that was of th v the Arenburge Run Limited and the enemy usually watched this road. The only road open did not have rails running in that direction and that was the Mic-Hollester and Pandora. even if the supplies also were at Chamberlane and Rosa cities they could not move fast as there were not enough cars to be brought to use quick enough. If only the Mic-Hollester and Pamr Pandora Railroad could be used from Big Girl Knool but it was impossible to form tracks for that purpose.

The general Committee of public safty at the three cities decided on the 30th of november to have more Glandelinian prisoners under strick guard brought to help at the work. This action was taken however with the full consent of the local unions at the work. This action was taken however with the full consent of the local unionsEven Glandelinians who were skilled mechanics were also needed, but the Glandelinian prisoners who knew no trade at all were to be employed at burying the the remaining dead without pay, but if necessary if many of themdid their work willingly they might be relieved within a few days and be replaced by other rebel prisoners freshly brought in.
According to Dr Angelenie Melerie of Angelinia Ah Agathia she had investigated the health situation,there was no dangerous colds among too many people since the flood.
" But the water supply has been very much cut off" he said- and what water can be had is not liable to any amount of contamination on accou account of the colder weat weather than prevailing. but there are thousands upon thousands suffering from nervious prostration, hysterial andmild or severe dementia mostly seen among the wealthy class,, due to shock, exhaustion and grief, and also exposure. among the poorer class the use of spoiled food during the earlier part of the week after the flood had led to hundreds of thousands of cases of intestinal troubles. Hundreds of prostrations or deaths during the cold spell have occured among the Glandelinian prisoners because of the intense cold of which they are not so used to as we. And the danger from the windrows of burning wreckage is mostly to those who try to overcome the flames....."
Major general Hendro Cornier arived at Schloedertown,,, on November the 29th;, with $4,567,888 in cash from Governer Turner of Angelinia State to be expanded in hasten ing the disposal of the debris and the burial of the many remaining bodies still to be found in the burning wreckage and elsewhere.This major general arived some- what too late to bank any of the money and for six days and nights it rested in the safe ofthe Turner hotel guarded guarded by two hundred soldiers armed to the teeth..Therefore these three cities passed the first two weeks and several days following the big disaster burying the dead, fighting the flames among the wreck ge wreckage, removing ice from the sides of ruined buildings, and clearing away debris..General Vivians orders that all Glandelinian soldiers brought inwho are able to work should labor to the limit of their strength wa was carried out to the letter.
" We are thankful" said the Mayor of Joan city on the gunday following when told of the arival of the many other coming relief trains from Angelinia Agathia to Big Girl Knool" There is no one whatever who can make the statement too wtrong to the people of Angelinia Agathia, and elsewhere. We are thankful and will say we are thankful to even God and His Blessed Mother, and we thank Him and thank Him again and again and still again.Yet the people of Angelinia Agathia and Big Girl Knool are amongthe staunchest friends in the world in times like these..Yes despite how the war rages and shifts back and forth, we'll defy the enemy to the last and Joan city and all the other places swept by the flood will be builded up again,, and like collyer and Stanck we'll make them better cities than they ever was. We shall never forget the kindness of the people of all the cities which came to ar relief and espeically Angelinia Agathia who came so generiously to ar relief, and therefore we all thank them from the bottom of our heart, and say that it is only by courage like this that we'll shall win the war against the Glandelinian states in the long run.#"

Arrangements were absolutely completed by the Grand Mic-Hollester and Pandora road November the 28th whereby it established a branch line to Gerryville, and the two other cities from Big Girl Knool, and this new line being guarded by seperate christian lines and batteries all the way from Big Girl Knool to this these places this helped somewhat in getting relief supplies in to them from Angelinia Agathia.

Having the chance, Violet, and her sirters, the seven Princesses of Abbiesannia, who are also the best of all the christian scouts and spies, and who also are at head of the Red Cross Leagues in Abbiesannia, arrived in Joan city on the 30th of Novemmer. to direct for a time the Red Cross Nurses sent there. Colonel Allen returned from a trip along the right of way of the ruined Evangeline St Clare railroad tracks and reported he saw a great many bodies that the scene almost was like after the battle of Cedernine. He said the various scouting soldiers had taken from the frozen flood 11,198 bodies and buried them at different point along the Mic-Hollester and Pandora right of way.

After suffering untold privations for more than two weeks in the little town of Alto the Priests of St Anne Catholic Church and five young nuns reached Big Girl Knool on the 28th of November famished, penniless and nearly naked, half frozen and ill from exposure, but overcome with amazement and joy at their strange and miraculous delivery from what seemed to them sure death. The flood waters swept away their church and all its contents without giving them time to save every even anything and also wrecked the Convent and Priest house close by, annihilating their neighbors and destroying every particle of food and provisions and sweeping away every building of the town, yet they passed through the ten terrible days and nights raising their voices above the shriek of the blizzard winds in singing hymns saying the Masses as best as they could and in prayer. And through it all every one but these priests and six young nuns alone escaped without even the slightest scratch though every one else in the town was swept away to their deaths with their homes and everything.

When the flood struck the Rt Rev. Pendrow house at the edge of the river the water did not come like a rise but in a perfect wave thirty to fourty feet high and the waters swirled around the house so fast that it was breaking portions of the house to pieces and already pouring into the upper windows before the priests and the nuns realized their danger. Securing floating debris as rafts, the priests placed the nuns on them, leaped on themselves and allowed it to drift on just as the house they had just left gave way into swirling wreckage. Before they had gotten out of reach of the structure another swarm of refugees were seen inside of a large floating wooden house they screaming frantically for assistance, but the house struck a floating tree and broke apart both pieces turning over upside down and all were drowned before the eyes of the priests and nuns. With difficulty the priests and nuns were saved from drowning as their raft often struck obstructions and finally they too were thrown into the water. The priest however having carried plenty of clothes lines with them lashed the nuns into a big floating tree. The youngest nun the head priest secured withthe chain of the raft, and lifting the biggest one into another tree he and the other priests climbed beside her.

" while the hurricane and blizzard of snow raged above with below zero winds and a sea of wildly dashing waters rushing past at express train speed below the nun nearest to one of the priest clung desperately to a six year old child she managed to rescue with an arm, while with the other she held fast to her precarious haven of refuge, the clothes of these refugees being frozen frozen tight to their bodies in no time. The priest too closest to her had rescued a baby of eighteen or nineteen months of age and held him in the same manner, and while the little one cried from the cold he sheilded it from the wind as much as he could and prayed. In other trees floating by he saw whole families having a very precarious footing.

When the night had passed the trees drifted to the shore of the flood which looked like a big sea, and as they secured a footing and got ashre they looked back for a moment almost dead with the cold and saw seas of ice covered wreckage and the corpe corpses of the parishioners floating past. There was nothing to eat, and nearly dead with exhaustion and cold, the priests and nuns with the two screaming children set out on foot in the cold to seek assistance. They were soon soon overcome by the cold and therefore became too weak to continue - far and sank down on the deeply snow covered plain, while the eldest and strongest of the priest priests pushed on alone. Only half a dle away a farm house was found overl coking the flood, and securing a team and big sleight the priest returned for his half frozen and half dead party.

For three days they remained at the house of the kindly farmer untill they were sure the exposure of the cold would not result into any thing serious, and then they left the two children they had rec rescued with the farmer and again set out on foot to find a little town or make their way over the snow covered fields to Chamber-Chamberlane. In the face of the fearful 20 below zero winds they plodded on through the deep snow, subsisting pon a steer which theykilled and devoured raw untill finally they came upon an overturned sailboat high on the land about half a mile from the Aronburgs Run river. With a united effort they managed to all carry it to the river and succeeded in launching the boat and withimprovised distress signals displayed managed to reach Joan City. There because the city was almost wiped out they were unable to secure clothing, although in the army at which they ten then went they were able to secure uniforms and food, and transportation to Big Girl Knool City. Clad in old pair of trousers, a tattered shirt and torn shoes, with their companion priests and nuns in even worse plight, facing the rigors of the early winter they finally came into the city, dirty, half frozen again, weak and half starved. Here they were all sent to a hospital and cared for. Then they were sent to Little Girl Knool where they had some relatives who aided them untill the Catholic Church came to their relief.

At Alto Junction which missed the full force of the flood, reports came that up to the end of November 16,220 bodies had been found and buried and many were still frozen hard into the stretches of the frozen flood. Assistance everywhere was needed. It was a fact generally commented upon and merely emphasized by the experience of these por priests and nunes nuns that while succor was being rushed to the stricken area despite the attempted hinderness by the enemy other sufferers because they were so many and utterly unknown were being neglected. The relief train relief trains though scarce when they were enroute from Big Girl Knool to The region of horror traversed a wide flood swept section where famishing and nearly nakde survivors st on the wrecks of their homes and hungrily watched tons of provisions whirling past them but they were cut off, while there was little prospects of aid reaching them, because the enemy cut off all communications.

Jack Prospecto of Angelinia Agathia, who returned from Schloedertown two weeks after the disaster reached the Great Hotel Schloedertown the first evening before the terrible flood began..He said it had been the most terrible week or so ever in his own experience,, the most awful seven days and nights a man could imagine and even of the three days succeeding the inundation.....

" One man would ask another how his family had come out " said Prospecto And the answerwould be indidf indifferent and hard--indeed absolutely offish" " Oh everything is gone." " Everything is wiped out" was the words heard on all sides.."

" The night before the sudden disaster, when I reached the big hotel a cold wave and blizzard was starting, it was blowing rather hard from the northeast to north east, and the clerk said we were in for a snowstorm, and I asked him if he liked to see a whole lot of snow fall, and he said" well it won't be quite as bad as all that but three feet of snow would suit me fine."

The next day the flood came and by night there was seventeen feet of water in the rotunda, and the upper portions of the place was crowded with refugees, the servants unisx had fallen in by the vibrations of the building. The following nightsthere was little sleep, and yet no one really realized the extent of the disaster.

On the afternoon of the day the flood gradually subsided one could walk even on the lower streets so quickly had the remaining waters frozen so hard. As cold as it was I took a walk along the river front and wherever you went everywhere there was a litter of smashed and overturned houses, debris of all kinds frozen hard and covered with snow or smoking with fierce fires within, and many corpses could be seen. I met onewoman who burst into tears at sight of a small cradle; her property frozen hard into a stretch of ice. She had lost all her family in the flood.

Pep People were for the most part bereft of their senses from the horror, and indeed a single funeral would have seemed more terrible---more solumn solemn--than bodies that were being cremated in the long high windrows of fiercely burning wreckahe and wreckage and house tops. Th The tales of so much looting by the Glandelinian vandals are only much too true, and as I passed northward on a train on the Mic-Hollester and Pandora I often heard shots ring out as if on the firing range which told of some number of Glandelinian ghouls frequently paying the penalty.

The three cities will rise again on their old sites and without as much difficulty as is at first anticipated. Most of the people however will try and lived at other protecting cities untill the menance of the Glandelinian army so close by is gone. . a At least twelve hundred thousand dead bodies are believed to have been found. so far."

Nearly one quarter of the numbers of people, even children who applied for relief were mentally dull but the doctors and Red Cross Nurses made statements that with the proper care most or all of them might be cured..

A little girl about ten years old was brought into the christian army and headed before the military Relief station on Friday night. The soldiers of the military relief corps found her huddled up in an empty wooden box half frozen and yet laughing and singing to amuse herself. When questioned she could not answer, but looked at her questioners most vacantly but the two doctors an who examined her said food and care were all she would need to restore her to reason.

It was over two weeks after the big flood before all those from the outside really began to find out what the awful calamity was to the people of the isl isolated cities and towns, and there was the greatest indignation throughout the nation and it was purposed to carry on the war to a crushing result.

The first shocks were now wearing of, the long lists of dead and missing were getting to be an old story by this time, and the thousands of sick and suffering werre still to be found crawling into places of refuge. Some of them had perished of the cold in the open prairies, and men were picked up with broken arms, many of them crawling out of their wrecked homes and lying down on the snow covered ground in bitt bitter zero weather to freeze to death. Relief parties found such as these by the hundreds every day, and those who had not died yet were brought into the hospitals as fast as possible. One relief party from found five thousand people in the vinicity of Big Girl Knool who had been unable to stand the fierce exposure in their headlong flight to the city for protection, and hundreds of them had died while the rest were homeless, helpless, half frozen, tearless, and hopeless. It surely was a sight to cause a stone statue to weak, and enough to arouse the fierce rage of the populations of all other cities throughout the nation. Every fresh news from the paper increased the anxiety and indignation and fury of the people and also greatly enlarged the number of men ap applying for the admittance into the army to fight such a ruthless foe.

On the 30th of November a young girl with long flowing hair rode up to a military hospital near Big Girl Knool and told the doctors she had just been sent from a little town on the Big Girl Knool Road.

" Said she" The folks there are starving, and suffering from the cold. There is not a pound of flour or fuel left, and even the children are crying for milk. There are so many sick people there that we don't know what to do. The town was not hit by the flood, but more refugees came there than the town can shelter. Can you please send help right away!"

The Physician who was in charge of the hospital said he would go at once with a party of men nurses and a train of provisions. The young girl on horseback leaned over the saddle and tried again to speak. Something in her face frightened me. I called for two other doctors who ran out and caught the poor girl. She was ina dead faint probably on account of her long ride in the cold and wind. When we had brought her to-she laughed sheepishly and said;

" I do not know what is the matter with me" she said. " I have never been taken this way before."

The doctors and others looked at each other gravely and the eyes of the nurses were full of t tears. The young woman had not tasted food food for fourty six hours, and she had ridden over sixty five miles in the fearful zero weather and the wonder that she was not frozen to death was exceedingly indeed.

The refugees of that town got prprompt aid.

CHAPTER EIGHT . .

SEVERAL PERSONS TELL OF THEIR EXPERIENCES IN SPARRYVILLE CITY . ONE OF THEM ARIVED, AFTER THE WAR FLOOD DISASTER--- WHILE THE OTHER WENT THROUGH THE FLOOD FROM BEGINNING TO THE VERY END. HUMAN BODIES BURNING IN IMMENSE LONG FIRE HEAPS. FULLY TWO MILLION ARE DEAD. TWENTY MILLION PEOPLE FED EVERY DAY AT AN IMMENSE COST A COST OF FOURTTHOUSAND DOLLARS PER TWENTY THOUSAND, ---INCIDENTS AT MANY RELIEF STATIONS. GREAT MORTALITYAMONG THE CHILD REN. THE EDGE OF THE DISASTEIOUS FLOOD. HOW VIOLET, AND HER SISTERS VIEWED THE SITUATION. SEVERAL GENERALS OF HANSON VIVIANS ARMY WHO HEAD THEIR OWN OBIT-UARIES. TERRIBLE AND MOST HEART RENDING SCENES WITNESSED AT BIG GIRL KNOOL .

A war Correspondent ----who was a foriegner to the Abbiesannian nation, but well liked by every one, and the first of the foriengers from the very outside to gain admittance to the sealed city of Sperryville----wrote to the aurthorities of Anglinia Agathia a des cription of what she saw and also observed there.She arived in Sperryville on a Friday, and although this English woman was on a relief train carrying do doctors, nurses medicial supplies and fuel, she indeed had most difficult work to get past the files of soldiers at the outer limits of the smoking burnin city but she at last succeeded.

She wrote,,

" The eing e engineer who brought our train down by from Big Girl Knool city passed large groups of pel po people men women and even children grouping around in the wrecks in the large fields of fro e frozen waters looking for dead relatives and friends. The man who sat in front of me on the car, had floated for two days and two nights with his wife and children on a part of the roof of his little home home. He told me that he had kissed his pret pretty wife good bye at at midnight on the second day of the flood and told her because of the cold and ice covering of the roof he could not hold on any longer, but he did managed to hold on dazed and half conscious with clothing frozen hard to his body and he remained until untill day broke and he was washed ashre and then he found he was alone on his piece of driftwood. He did not even know when the woman and his three children whom he loved so dearly had perished in the waters and cold.

Every man on the train which was the Aronburg Limited, a train of eighteen long Orange Red coaches----there were no women or children there-- had lost nearly every one whom they loved in the terrible disaster, and were on their way to t any of the three cities to try and find if some one of their family were not yet alive. I have experienced and read of some great wars in other countries throughout the big world but nothing like this, where an enemy even makes nature aid him in the most horrible ways imaginable. I thank god if I never have to meet with a Glandelinian soldier. I hate the sight of them brutes. As the train neared Normman Parle city nearest Sperryville, the former also frightfully devasted by the flood with its whole population wiped out, we could see in the darkness a great red light in the sky in three different directions at once as if molten lave lava from three great volcanoes were stretching across the surface of the earth miles long, and immense black clouds spread over the sky along the horp horizon.

" What a terrible fire" I said feeling quite scared. " Some of the forests must be burning" knowing the enemy have created big forest fires as well."

A man who was just then passing down the isle of the big coah coach stopped behind my chair for he had heard me. He looked me squ-rely in the face, but his face was like that of a spectre, but he laughed.

" forest fires" he said. " No it is not. The three cities are burning, all the windrows of wreckage are afire, having been afire for days since the flood. And doyou know what is burning over among the fires. It is the wives and children of us men--such littld children who de served a better a fate. My children called my nam name the other day and now they are surely burning over there--they and the dear mother who bore them. My wife was such a little tender thing, a delecate woman, alway always so easily frightened, and now surely she is out there all alone in the burning wreckage, and they are cremated."

The man laughed again and began walked up and down in the middle of the coach untill I wasscared he was demented over his loss.

" That's right" said the conductor on the coach taking off hisxhat and letting the moonlight shine on his trong face. " That's right. We cannot stop the flames, there is no means to do so, the fired fire no doubt by now might have burned tents of thousands of people, and to morrow if it continues will soon start a conflagration that will be a serious menance to the country. The survivors have by now stopped burying bodies in the ground, they are burying them any place and the guards had to give the Mandelinian prisoners whiskey to give themcourage to do the work. What I'd like to give them I'll not say before a woman. They are forced to carry out hundreds of bodies at a time, men women and children, all piled up as high as the barge will stand it, but the prisoners I believe did at go far enough out into the half frozen river, and the bodies have begun drifting back again."

"Look" suddenly cried the man who was pacing up and down in the cr car touching my shoulder with a shaking hand." Look there Miss."

" Before I had even time to even think I had tolook, and saw frozen in the remainin remaining flood, bodies of men women and children and animals of all sorts, mingled with groups of all kinds of fro driftwood frozen into the ice. We looked c,l closer and found it to be a mass of stone slabs with names and dates cut upon them and on top of many of them were marble thomb stones. Even the graveyard which had held the dead citizens of the three cities for many many years were giving up their dead. We pulled up at a small surburban station in the hush of the starlight there were no light lights anywhere in the city we now were reaching except q few scattere scattered lamps shining from a few desolate half destroyed houses, or from the numerous big fires burning in the immense windrows of wreckage and upper portions of houses. What we thought would be a flood city was a dantes inferno.

We picked our way cautiously up a froze water frozen street and were amazed at the sight of the sides of remaining houses covered thickly with ice, and wreckage o not burned were also ice and snow covered. The ground was thick with the frozen waters of the receded f oc flood.

We climbed even over wreckage that was smoking and blazing fiercely at some places, and picked our way through heaps of snow and i ce covered ru rubbish. The terrible sickening oder of burning flesh almost overcame us, and it was all I could do to shut my teeth, and get through the frozen wreckage logged streets somehow. The soldiers a portion of Emperor Vivians army were camping on the out kirts o outskirts of the city. Some of them inside the city challenged us but the Vivian girls who met us took us through under their protection. What pretty little heriones these princesses are, who having a beautiful home in Abbleannia, go with their fathers army and suffer with him and see all we even see. At every street corner there were a few guards, and besides having a rifle every guard wore fourty fives strapped around his waist.

I went tward the heart of the burning city. I do not remember what the names of the streets were, or where I was going but the flames from the wreckage lighted our way and at times afforded some warmth as the weather was bitterly cold. I simply picked my way through masses of snow and rubbish which scar the beautiful wide streets of the once beautiful city of Sperryville. They won't bear looking at these burning pil s piles of rubbish and wreckage for there are many things that grip the heart to see-- some little baby's shoe for instance, a little white shoe, with a jaunty tasseled lace--- a bit of a womans dress, and letters, or the half visible body of some little boy or girl protruding from piles of smoking debris.

The stench from these burning windrows of rubbish isalmost overpoer overpowering. Even in the very heart of the city most of the bodies have been alrea y already removed by Mandelinian prisoners working under guard, but it will not do to walk too far out. To day I came upon a group of people in a by street and two women one a man. The man was big and strong looking, one of the women was old and the other young. They were dipping in a heap of smouldering rubbish, and when they heard my footsteps the man turned a strange glowering face upon me and the young woman ran away screaming at the top of her lungs. Maniacs these, who have lost their reason because of their loss. A moment later there was great noise and excitement in the little narrow street and I looked back and saw a Mandelinian ghoul running with a crowd of soldiers at his heels. The soldiers caught him, tied his hands took him through the streets, with a whooping rabble at his very heels. It goes hard with any Mandelinian soldier looting the wreckage and dead bodies these days. A young man well known in the city was said to have shot and killed a number of ghouls caught robbing the dead bodi s and left them lay in the the streets like dead dogs. Desolation reigns on every side, and the few houses that survive are dismantled, their roofs caved in, windows out, and the high water mark showing where it had reached to the upper floors especially the ice proved that. The little houses are all gone either completely gone as if they were grains of sand or they are lying in great heaps of burning kindling wood covering no oneknows what what dreadful horrors beneath.

the most pitiful and harrowing sights we observed in the main streets. Here and there at long distn distances some big big building would be left standing. South Avenue looked to me like some carpenters saw, with some of the teeth missing. Those who survived of the merchants are taking what was left of th ir little stores of goods and are spreading them out on the snow in the sunshine trying to make some little husbanding of their small capitol. The water rushed through these stores as it did through the houses in an irrestib,e avalanche that carried all before it, and therefore the wonder is not t at so little of Sperryville is left standing, but that there is any of it at all.....

No matter where you go you'll find on every surviving street corner signs of m misery, and human agony bravely endured. The eye witnesses of hundreds o hundreds of deaths have spoken to me and told me their heart rending stories, and even not one of them has told of a cowardly death..Even the most timid of women and children met their fate the same way as did the men, bravely and for the most part with astonish ing calmness. An old woman told me that she and her husband went into the kitchen and climbed upon the kitchen table to get away from the rushing waters that broke thrbugh the windows, and that she knelt there and prayed.

As she prayed the flood came in and carried the hole whole house away and her hush husband with it, and yesterday she went out to the very place where her husband had been, and there was nothing there but a l lake of frozen waters and debris.

Her husbands body was found amid twisted wreckage two miles from the place wher where she last saw saw him. She told me she recognized him by a pair of scapulars he had around his neck--- and a locket which she gave him to the day they were married. It had her picture, and a lock of her childs hair in it. The woman told me this without even a trace of a tear or emotion. No one cried here. They can't for they are toobeqrtbroken. The tears won't flow. The heart is petrified with grief. Whybthey will stand and tell me the most hedious heart rending stories, stories that would turn the blood in the veins of a human being cold with horror, without the quiver of an eye lid.

A certain man sat in the milirat military telegraph office in general Viviane camp a and told me how he had lost a herd of good cattle, a farm chicken house full of fowl and went into minute particulars, telling me how many laborers laborees laborers worked to built his barns and farm house, how big a price it cost, and how it was strengthened and made firm against all kinds of weather. He told me how the sudden flood had come and swept it all away, and how he had climbed over a mass of wabbling roofs and moving windrows of debris, and found a friend lying on top of a big floating raft inthe fiercest part of the flood, and how they both had grasped each other and bid each other good byE bye. He told me him cows about a hundred of them were worth fourty dollars a piece, he had a thousand chickens valuabled at more than a dollar a piece, and how fond he was of them and how hard he had tried with the help of his hired farm hands and cowboys to save them. But when he finally finished Inesid;

"But you are your family was saved, so you ought not to complain."

The telegraph operator stared at me with blank unseeing eyes.

"Why I could not save them" he said sheepishly." They were all drowned before my very eyes. I thought you knew that. I do not speak very much about it."

The hedious horror of the whole effects of the disaster had benumbed every one who had gone through it.....""""""

Miss Jennie Heidi of Pandora Calverinia(porth) arived safely o at her home on the 24th of November, from Sperryville where he had the most trying ti e of her life during the flood, and she managed to tell her story in a most str strange and graphic way:

" I had been in Sperryville since the early part of july, visiting my mother and father , who lives on Thirty Third street between Scaremento Avenue and Alicine Street. I had heard and seen a little of the war, and heard great details of disasters and big battles, esc especially Cadernine but never believed that the enemy had the meaness to cause such a calamity as what I witnessed. The full fu ury of the flood was almost sudden from the start, but it was not untill about two oclock in the afternoon that we were really frightened. Buildings by the hundreds per minute had gone down as mere egg shells before the death dealing force of the cold torrent. At two thirty lookc k oc o clock I told my father and mother that we must make our way by means of a strong raft to another building only a block away. The water had risen about thirty feet in two minutes, and as I hurried to the fourth floor window the wind during the snowstorm that same day tore down my hair and I was blinded for a time and terribly cold. I turned my eyes to the west and as far asthe blinding shroud of the snow would allow the vision to penetrate there was not a single building standing, everything had been swept away and we were surrounded by a sea of rushing waters, and houses by the score floated past us like big boats running away. How we we ever reached the six story house a hundred yards or more away I do not know. The wind several times threatened to hurl u o us off from the raft we made, and every few minutes we were we were carried off our feet and hurled flat on the raft which every now and then was dashed so violently again t the floating debris that we feared it would be shattered. but we managed nevertheless ..... The big building we were trying to reach was a factory, and its strong foundation kept out the rushing waters. When we were pulled in by those in the upper floors we hurried to a large comfortable room and stayed there for a day and night, watching as much as we dared the fearful flood, and the ice covered wreckage and house tops floating by.....On the third day when the first cold wave was at its hei h height a fierce gale sprung up from the northwest lashing the flood into an angry sea of waves, and soon these wind swept waves covered the side of our house with three inches of ice and also soon found their way into the windows of our room and we had a mad run to escape the rushing swirling waters.

We reached the fifth floor and I shrank into a corner expecting every second that the building big as it was would be swept to pieces by the flood and that we would be v carried to our deaths. How it happened i am never able to tell but this was the only building in that part of the city left for miles around.As it was fourty people in the fourth floor were caught suddenly by the waters that broke through the windows and they were either killed or drowned. After a time while the flood raged at its worse I felt faint from hunger, and while too weak and too frightened to seek food just then; I told my mother and father I desired to go to the top floor and see how things were up there...I staggered up the steps, and to the room above and then almost sprawled along the floor, until I reached a window, and fell half fainting through it. As I leaned there in the icy winds enough to freeze any on one to death I was compelled to witness sights that I pray god will never make me see again, or ever cause another to see.

Whirling by me, bodies more than I could count in a week, all crushed and mangled between a jumble of snow and ice covered timbers and debris, and some of that debris even while floating was smoked on top and was afire. Oh the horror of it all. Men women and children went by in immense processions,sirking floating, ice covered, dashing on I knew not where. I tried desperately to close my eyes but I could not. I screamed and cried aloud and made an attempt to go back to my parents, but I was cold and exhausted, and all I could do was to watch the most terrible scenes ever known in the world before for flood disasters.

" babies; oh such pretty little ones, too were carried on and on goened in the most dainty clothing, their little eyes open staring in mute terror above. Thank God they were in heaven now. I was partly blinded by tears, but I could see still everything through the mist. I imagined I saw little arms stretch tward me asking assistance, but I was unable to lend assistance or aid because I could not reach them. How it ended I knew not. I must have fainted for when I awakened I found myself in bed in a stranger place with my parents standing by my bed, and a nun kneeling on the other side in prayer saying her Beads. When I recovered from the shock and found we could get back home I declared I would go at all costs. I thought of home and my husband and own children thank god who are safe, and I wanted to telegraph, just like many thousands of others that I was safe. It was days because of the danger from the Glandelinian armies near by before we could get away however, and then it was in most terrible confusion.

Eighteen hundred persons crowded on a ice-Leicester and Pandora express train and started for Big Girl Knool.The day we left"it was bitterly cold and everywhere the train went and at every point we passed we couldsee the Abbisannia militia were out in full force and many soldiers armed to the teeth accompanied the train. Far awaysomewhere I could not tell the distance, I could occasionaly hear the sharp report of rifles, and one soldier told me it was some Glandelinian ghouls paying dearly for his thieving operations. It was horrible to do this but those Glandelinians in disguise were robbing the dead, and therefore the soldiers hadto shoot those terrible beasts for they groveled in christian blood it seemed. As we made our way within sight of Schicedertown I saw immense clouds ofblack and white smoke rising high in the air looking so much like immense clouds rising from some big volcano that is in titanic eruption. I heard from the soldiers that the wikdrows of wreckage in the cities were burning and that countlessthousands of bodies were being reduced to ashes bythe flames without a possibility of any one ever getting to them.

I think it was best however but nevertheless the oder that arose from so many dead bodies was awful. Still it made my heart ache with a sorrow never to be equaled as one realized that little children were pinioned in the midst of the blazing flames. Do you wonder that I cry, and that so many of the survivors are almost raving mad. ? Before me no matter which way I turned, I could see the stretches of the now frozen portions of the flood, and many dead bodies frozen into the ice the cold eyes of the nearest gazing at me with staring intentness. I closed my eyes hoping the train would soon pass such scenes and hoping I might escape for a moment the sight of so many dead frozen bodies but no, the moment I would be compelled to open them again,right close to the tracks I would see passing my view the forms of some poor man woman or child.

Coming to Pandora on the Aronburg Limited train, which I took at Dorothy Gale going northeast, I read the Angelinis Agathia Times. The news paper men are mistaken far wrong. They only say eight hundred thousand are dead. It will be more than two million. I know positively I am right, every one in the flooded territory that survived talks of one million two hundred thousand dead, one million five hundred thousand dead, and three million dead, but it will be about two million at the very least.I believed the or worse sight I ever witnessed was the two thousand nine hundred bodies being carried out to the river and buried in the middle. Two barges were tied at the wharves and loaded with the unknown dead, and as an fast as one barge was filled, it would then make its way out from shore, and weighing the bodies the Glandelinian prisoners thus engaged in the work under strong guard cast them into the water..

" Oh those eyes those eyes" she cried" that I might put them from my tortured mind.I still can see those little innocent children, thousands of them of all ages, even mere babies go floating by my place of refuge, dead dead, or still living and I not able to rescue them. God and His blessed mother alone knows the suffering and torment I was compelled to go through. Hundreds of thousands yes hundreds of thousands of poor souls were carried over the brink of death in the twinkling of an eye, and I saw it all. if I don't even now hate those rascally Glandelinians who are responsible for this then something is wrong. They say it is a sin to hate anyone; that we should forgive all wrongs in order to be forgiven ourselves, but who in the dorld can forgive these wicked Glandelinians, who massacre children, cause great disasters and every dreadful thing that never even was known in a war before this..."!!!!

There were said to be about twenty men women and children fed and cared for daily for 5 or the distance of sixty miles all flood refugees daily, even as far as Angelinis Agathia for many days with the supplies which finally poured in from all parts of the country and which got through now despite all attempts of the enemy to frustrate it. The estimate cost of the aid extended after the first week of so much suffering was fourty thousand dollars a day for a amount of twenty thousand people at every different point. The great bulkof the aid went to those who had lost all, but the Glandelinian prisoners who were at work cleaning up the wreckage digging for bodies and putting at fires and cleaning the streets were also forced to deliver the supplies. No abled bodied Glandelinian prisoner was allowed to escape the work under any conditions, whether he liked to work or not, though most of them threatened riots frequently.

The business men who had anything left to them were helped to attend to their stores and their clerical forces were not interfered with. On the 28th of November the debris fire fighters and street cleaning men not being prisoners were put upon a cash basis, the wages being two dollars and sixty cents a day. Time also had been kept from the beginning though the records were not complete, but all were paid for the full time they worked, or guarded Glandelinian prisoners. Thesupplies to those also who forced Glandelinians to work at the point of the bayonet as well as those who volunteered their services. This aid was also given in the form of orders for tools for mechanics, lumber for those those who had homes remaining and which they desired to repair and so on. Heretofore every practical man and every abled bodied man had been selected to help soldiers guarding working gangs of Glandelinian prisoners, and unless he guarded prisoners he got no supplies. The first few days wages consisted entirely of rations which were given according to the number and needs of the family of the working man regardless of the amount of prisoners he guarded.

Since other supplies commenced arriving under guard they had had been added. The work of full distribution was conducted systemically. There were for every place a large central committee of which the highest man of the city was selected as chairman. Then there was a committee for each one of the wards in every portion of the cities. As fast as goods or provisions arrived from other points they were placed in the christian camps first from which the different ward chairmen recieved them and they were taki taken to supply deports in the different wards. All day long as cold or stormy as the weather might be there was a motely crowd around every one of these depots and every applicant passing in review before the ward chairman recieved everything that they could prove they needed.

" I want provisions for my two childrenwho are suffering from the cold and who have no shelter from the storm." said a poor old woman who could hardly walk

" You surely look hard up my poor woman and we 'll do what is possible" replied the chair man. go out with this woman and find out where her children are and bring them to the christian lines where they'll be sheltered" he then ordered to a committee man. In this way everything was being done to prevent other people from freezing to death.

At the Aberdeen Avenue distributing station clothing was given away the eve evening of the 25th.A old man who had just recieved a reply went outside and in his anger and grief pointed out every one of the refugees in line.

" This is what we all suffer for allowing the dirty Glandelinians to get the best of us" he shrieked." I lost my children and therefore do not want to have anythi anything to do with the Glandelinians at all."

" What's the trouble with the poor man.?"asked a foriegn bystander in broken Abbieannian of a soldier standing near by. The soldier replied;

" He has lost all and hates the Glandelinians worse than a rattlesnake hates its victim."

To even things up even the womenwho were able did their own share of the work cleaning up what was left of the houses.

" Our foodstuff and fuel is fair so far" said the head chair man of joan city" but just how we are still a little short of clothing. We surely have no idea of the contents of the cars on the road to us us. Frequently we did not know anything anything was coming untill the trains reached Big Girl Knool. But with all the money which we have been reioveing we have been augmenting our supplies by per purchasing of local merchants in lines where there was some shortage. What do we need most, money? If we have the proper amount of money we can order and recieve just what we need most and probably get better value than the people who are buying it. Many of the people of the nation have made the mistake of sending the money of ig to Big Girl Knool and Angelinia Agathia and asking committee there to buy for us. They do not know just what we need, and if we had the money we could do better for ourselves. The money should be sent direct to us and better still provisions which goes further than money.."

One of the most remarkable things attending this big flood disaster was the fortitude of the surviving people. Their loss in relatives friends and property and insurance had been so overwhelming that it seemed too much to be expressed with any outward signs of grief. Two men who had not seen each other since the great flood disaster met in the open street.

" How many did you happen to lose?" they happened to ask each other simultaneously by common impulse.

" I lost all my property but my children and my wife including myself came through all right though we rode a floating house for four days and night and almost nigh froze to death."

" I was not soforth fortunate at all. My parents, wife and children and two relativesare all drowned."

Then there was an expression of sympathy from the other but nothing approaching a tear from either, not even the slightest indication of a sob.

" The Glandelinian prisoners are making good progress cleaning up" remarked the one whose losses were the heaviest, with apparently a pleasant smile.The other one made a light answer and they passed slowly on. The surviving people of all the places so hard hit by the flood had seen so much death that they were as it seemed utterly hardened and indifferent to it, just as if they did not care what they lost. It seemed as if the announcement of the loss of another friend meant little to a man who had seen the many dead bodies of his neighbors and towns people floating by at the height of the flood or hauled to the river sharve by the wagon and boatload and sunk in the middle of the ice cragged river. No services were even attempted for the dead even when three weeks had passed since the disaster. Neither were there any memorial services.

The Rev. R.L.D Moll priest in charge of St Gertrudes Catholic Catheral which was swept entirely away with all its contents said;

"It is utterly impossible. Even priest and lay men had to join in the work of cleaning the city of dead bodies and stopping the fires in the big windrows of wreckage by every means possible. I therefore don't expect there will be memorial services for months to come."

Father Molls big Church was swept away entirely and where it once stood now is the frozen flood itself. He set the value of the Catholic property destroyed in the the city at over six million dollars. Included in this loss was the St Anne Convent and also academy which though not entirely swept away was badly damaged with the loss of every one who occupied these building in seeking shelter from the flood. It covered six blocks and was the finest Catholic Convent and school in oscuthern Calverinia and was worth two million five hundred dollars in the building alone not counting what was inside.

The city of joan itself was rapidly improving in its sanitary conditions, but the smell from the burned bodies was stronger ten days after the work had gone under way than that which came from the burning debris heaps containing undiscovered bodies in thecother two ruined cities. While these heaps were still burning and the sou sou wind carried the dense smoke far over the country the oder was similiar to that which afflicts Chicago at night when refuse is being burned at the stockyards, maybe even worse. Soon even the oder of burning word had increased which showed that all the efforts at fighting the fire was of no avail and Big Girl Knool was finally telegraphed for aid. Every dumpcart in the city of joan was still at work.

Every business man in joan city talked confidently of the future of the city, though many of the clerks announced their atrention of going away from the scene as such as they had money enough to do so.

" I'm not afraid of the enemy or of another flood" said one of the clerks in one of the principal stores. " But I'm sick and tired of seeing Glandelinians in our streets whose comrades are responsible for the horror that had occured."

The Telegraph and Telephone Companies in each city which also had suffered badly began slowly to rebuild its system there.

" Even if the enemy don't hinder it it will take us four months, and in the meantime we will give no service save long distance." said the head man superintending the superintending the construction. " We will of course install a cert ra central emergency at system the same as that in Angelinia Agathia, and put all wires hereaf nereafter underground untill war ceases its swing in this location. We will employ five thousand Glandelinian prisoners under guard if necessary to do the work under the point of the bayonet for two months if necessary. The Companys losses in southeastern Calverinia are about sixteen million dollars---two million here, three million at Schleeder and the rest at gerryville leading all the way to Big Girl Knool And the rest at other points.point"

Residents were greatly pleased at this announcement as it showed the confidence of a foriegn company in the future of these three ruined cities.

Phillimason Dorner another Abbieannian warm war correspondent returned to Angelinia Agathia from the flood stricken district on a Monday, and when questione when he was questioned he said;

" I left Chamberlains town the night before last, and things even itn in that neighborhood were in a most dreadful state. Schleedertown is about fourty six miles distance from there, and yet the refugees were pouring into Big Girl Knool sixty miles away in the greatest numbers. Many were well to do people who had lost all they had. Theothy George Calnerbury an Abbieannian Catholic Cardenal's brother said the Cardenal and his entire followers were killed, and it was reported to me that ten orphan asylums in the city of perryville were washed away with every child in them every little tot being lost as well as their attendants and nuns who had charge of them. At Big Girl Knool relief committee have been organised.

The Rev Calnerabury was well known in Angelinia Agathia having preached many times from the pulpit of the St Johns Catholic Church on Alto and Crobble streets. The Angelinia Agathia Daily times recieved a letter from general Vivian saying that a hundred thousand children from orphan homes alone lost their lives lives in the big flood, and that fully six hundred thousand others having now lost their parents are homeless and facing all kinds of suffering.

Jack Hallen brother of John B Hallen living at 1980 South Sacramento Street Angelinia Agathia was cooped up in a large wooden house that collasped after being carried along by a deluge of water and with his wife and three children, and two grandchildren met death in the flood during the terrible inundation at Schleedertown which was hardest hit.

Miltonis sonof Jack Hallen the eldest son was in the building with the family at the time and was the only one of the many occupants including fifteen women and twelve other children known to have escaped;John B Hallen who was a superintendent for a Printing company in Angelinia Agathia at 2345 River view Avenue Angelinia Agathia was doubfounded and grief stricken when he recieved the first information of the disaster for he had no idea his brother was even in any part of Calverinia,. Jack Hallen was a retired book keeper for John Callen Follen company at Dorothy Andeh city and he had taken his family on a trip through Abyssinnia to go to southern Angelinia state despite the hazards of the war.....

On November the 26th, Mr John Hallen recieved the following letter from Dorothy vale city which just ran as follows;

" November the 23th 1918.
Angelinia Agathia. Angelinia State.
Dear John.
We have just recieved a letter from Miltonis. Father and mother and their other children and several grand children went to Scholdertotown from Mineral springs Abyssinnia, where they had been previously stopping . They were extremely delighted with the beauties of the city of Schleeder town on arriving there that they had sold their return tickets and decided to remain throughout the winter. before going south..... They were at first in a house near the Aronburge un Run river but were compelled to move further away to a much large one when the water suddenly came down upin them...but the water came down in a perfect tidal wave bring jammed houses and debris with it. They started imediately to build a raft but before it could be got to gether the house started to float off and a part of it fell in and then had gone a short distance when it went to pieces. Miltonis was struck by something and knocked into the water but when he came up chilled by the temperature he caught a timber and then climbed to a roof of another floating t roof and thus managed to make his escape and was rescued too hours afterwards when the floating house top reached the opposite shore of the flood and the waiting and watching crowds on the shore pulled him ashore and saved him from freezing by building a big bon fire for hi, him. He declared he had seen no one escaped from the building as it collasped.....We do not believe the bodies have yet been recovered .from the frozen flood.. We have wired for m better news regarding the bodies, but have heard nothing more.

Uncle Edward Hallen.

The eldest of the children of the Hallen family who were drowned was only ten years old, the others ranged from five to seven,. The grand children we were the son and daughter of George Walsh.

On November the 13th a great flood was central near the Aberdeenhia county. The v flood started november the thirteenth and was rising in increased height, and the wind of a previous blizzard storm at which the snow fell so hard you could see nothing for fifty feet at times drove the flood forward in heavy cyclone rollers which swept the waters upon small towns and villages, regardless that a strong northeast wind was blowing.

All the telegraph poles were swept away, and on the following morni ng morning the 14th the flood continued high but had increased somewhat inthe selfishness of its current. During the night however it commenced rising higher, believed to have been 29 feet and thirty five inches. At seven oclock the next morning the 15th the flood was still rising and had spread so far that it appeared as an inlak inland sea. By noon of the 16th it had reached its height though at some points it was reported to have continued to increase dr during the afternoon and at four oclock the water was rushing past us at a rate of more than sixty miles an a hour according the speed which we estimated by the floating wreckage as it swirled by. The strong cold wave winds were pushing heavy seas upon the shore shore of the flood but as the wind veered to the south the flood began to fall till it went down to about 29 feet and thirty two inches and then it still continued to fall and now what is left of it has frozen of over solid untill it is one vast field of thick ice.

We wrote many witnesses of the flood who had thronged the shores to look out for those whom they may rescue. A war correspondent who had also witnessed the passing of the flood at this sec section on this fearful November of 1912 telegraphed as follows the same day!!!!!!!!!

" From all quarters of the flood region in the location of the beautiful Aronburgs Run river come reports of wholesale devastation wrought by the gale and flood of November the 13th 1912 which lasted at its worse for five days and a half and took a week almost to recede and freeze over all the outcome of the flood spreading over the land as it swept southeastward. So far in the location of the town of Gloriania one hundred and fifty six river schooners are reported to be in farm land within sight of that city, and one big river craft is aground on the Yellow brick road leading to Big Girl Knool, and over one thousand other craft have said to been swept away or badly damaged with the loss of lives of all crews on board. One hundred and fourty six lives have been reported lost so far. But this small list of fatalities is due to the fact that most of the crews of every vessel ha had been taking recreation in Gloriannia and Big Girl Knool cities recently and therefore escaped the disastrous flood so suddenly caused by the fow. Many other river craft are missing so far, and it is feared the death roll may be shlarged, beyond comprehending. The town of Gloria though not broken up entirely had severed severely with so many basements flooded and all fishing craft in the river there having been driven right into the streets of the citywhich fact added to the bad fishing season caused by the noise of the war makes the condition of the river fishing folk pi tiable in the extreme.

In the town of Belle Tilie the whole of the river fishing premises also have been destroyed though the town itself suffering no harm whatever though its very highest f streets were covered by more than two feet of water. On the west warves over two hundred and fifty vessels had been battered and swept into the city, thirty being a total loss. The big river steamer St Francis carrying over three hundred passengers had been wrecked at Chamberlane. The big river barge Mary Jane anthracite lande laden from Angelinia Agathia is dismantled and delelict off St Mary's river cape. In the region of the little town of Marie Kornman the flood reached its highest on the fourth day. Two hundred and fourty four men from the Abbieannia Province Finishingschooner Abbieann were landed at Big Girl Knool wharves on the morningafter the flood had started to abate their ship having foundered in the flooded river. The men had drifted about on the sinking hulk without food, water, or shelter and only by incessant pumping k pt her afloat. The dashing walls of water for every rise of the flood were driven forward by the gales of the severe cold wave and were constantly sweeping the decks and the entire crew were lashed about the rigging or bulkwarks which were thickly ice covered. They are ultimately rescued by the fishing schooner Bartonia which landed them half frozen and ill from exposure. Ten men perished from the exposure. The surviving crew say the flood mu must have done awful damage somewhere as it was full of floating houses bodies of dead people and wreckage. It seems certain that many towns could not escape the disaster, when the flood was so jammed with wreckage and houses floating by.

One of the Vivian Girl Princesses who with her sisters went to view the results of the flood wrote of the situation at Schloedertown on November the 29th and had it signed by her sisters;

" It would be almost impossible for any one living to even try to exaggerate the awful scene that meets the visitors andsightseers and the like everywhere. The s situation could not be exaggerated. Probably the loss of life will exceed any estimate that has already been made. Yet we have observed that in parts of the city where the destruction was the worst there still must be countless hundreds of bodies under the still smouldering windrows of debris. At the northwest end of the city in the river side first struck by the flood and which was swept clean of every vestige of the splendid houses that covered it, the ruin that remaines is enclosed by a towering wall of fiercely burning debris afire its full length and and smoking most fiercely because of the snow and ice on top, and under which we believe so we believe many bodies are still buried and also are burning.

The removal of this has scarcely been begun as as most of the work is to put the fire out. And that is almost impossible without sufficient water supply. is fear that the story that will be told when the fire is out and when this mountain of charred ruin is removed many add tothe horrors of the fearful situation. As usual in great calamities known all over the world, the people are dazed, half their number are crazed by their sufferings, and speak of their los es with an unatural calmness that would astonish those who did not understand it. I do believe there is danger of a spread in the fire but the nervious strain upon the people as they come to realize their condition may be nearly as fatal as the flood itself.

They talk of friends that are gone with tearless eyes, and in tones as if they did not even care about it at all, or even miss their loved ones who are gone, even making no allusion of the loss of proper property and seem to crack jokes about the disaster. A professional gentleman who called upon us Princesses this afternoon a gentleman of most splendid human sympathies and refinement wore a soiled gray shirt, without a coat, and in a ragged trousers and in apologizing to us for his unusual appearance said in the most casual light hearted way;

" Excuse my appearance, I have just returned from burying my dead. My parents and wife and children are under the river yonder. I placed them there."

But I know that these unfortunate people will sooner or later break down under the strain and the Red Cross is glad of the force of strong competent workers which it has brought to their relief.

Portions of the business parts of the city suffered the greatest severity of the flood and not one house is left intact. Relief is coming in as rapidly as possible or as quickly as the fos and other things interering will admit. No one need fear after seeing the brave and manly way in which these surviving people of the disaster are helping themselves, that too much outside aid will be given. In reply to the question" what is most needed here" I would say; The most immediate needs are surgical dressings, fuel, the ordinary medical remedies for wounds and sickness caused by exposure, and declicies for the s ck, and our armies here to keep a watch upon the Glandelinian army close by. We were asked if we were not totally surprised to hear that it was the enemy that caused the flood. We say we are not at all surprised, we are surprised that the enemy has not done worse. For all we have seen and went through, we can expect the most terrible calamities the world would be shocked y next to happen. Nothing susurprises us here for what we have seen these Glandelinians do in the past. That the Glandelinian armies ever receive quarter, that any prisoners are ever taken and spared, is what really surprises us. But if such things as this continue to happen, the mercies of our generals and armies will be things of the past and horrible things will occur to the Glandelinian armies."

Reported dead five times, and their obituaries pre printed in Schloedertown and inthe Angelinia Agathia, and many other city newspapers, generals Charles Brown and Gladerlinia of General Hansons army, were found on the afternoon of November the 20th,, after having passed through a most thrilling experien ceswhich experience which they said was worse than the worse of battles. Generals Charles Charles Brown and Gladerlinia were the officers in s ac search of whom many of general Hansons army officers went to Schloedertown and other places taking men along with them. General prowns story of his experience inthe disaster was a thrilling one indeed. With his coma companion and a large amber of officers who were on furlough city with him he was seated at supper in the hope of one of his friends when the flood broke u upon thetown the town. He seized a wallet containing some important military papers from a bureau and placing it in his bosom, went with general Landerlinia and all the other generals and officers to the fourth story of the house.. There they remained untillthe roaring rushing waters reached them and h they leaped into the darkne ss and the flodd flood. They alighted fortunately in a boat or some size that was floating past as they jumped upon and within which they rode during the endlte duration of the flood, one of the office officers clinging to the gunwahel gun chain. Several times he lost his hold and fell backwards into the icy waters, only to be drawn up again by the others who saw him.

Timbers floated and crashed about their boat, people on all sides of them were drowned or crushed to death or drawn into the swirling waters but with grim perverseverence the generals and their officers held on for four days and nights and rode the fierce flood out. Colonel Horner was pushed off several times from the boat by a comrade who went crazy from his exposure and suffering but Landerlinia always saved him. with his feet crushed and bleeding his uniform torn from his body and nearly exhausted, the officer with the rest were finally taken from hi perilous position several hours after the flood started.

All of the officers were without sufficient uniforms or clothing..... and several of them w r were delirious. They were the only persons saved in the entire fourteen hundred blocks within which they were at the outbreak of the flood.. They were first taken to an ems emergency hospital where some of them tossed in delirium untill a week after. General Brown lost the wallet containing the important military papers, and the two generals and the officers had to appeal to the city aurtheritles for aid and transportation back to general Hansons army but got little as the city itself was more helpless than they. General Landerlinia said when back in general Hansons army;

" At the e early part of the war I treated the enemy rough. Now I'll treat them mild."

The terrible scenes and happenngs in Big Girl Knool(Angelinia State) the great ammount of damage done to basement and lower floors and the intense suffering of the refugees brought or reaching there as a result of the recent flood were vividly portrayed in a letter from Angelinia Aronburg who was there at the time visiting a friends of hers before going back to general Vivians army on duty. She had been on a two weeks furlough. She wrote the letter to Jack Evans who was in general Vivians lines and he showed it to the Vivian Girls. It is is as follows pll

" Big Girl Knool.
November 1912.
Dear Jack Evans my friend;
I am writing to say that much has been said about the damage done to Schloedertown Joan, Perryville and other places, and I suppose things there are so terrible that little thought is giving to other places that have been totally wiped ol out. But But right here inthis city there is wreckage from other places and so much of it including boats and small river craft that w one could not even believe that time could clear it away. Furthermore the suffering here among the many refugees coming in is indeed the greatest I ever heard of and which makes my heart burn fiercer than ever against the Landerlinians. Scores of thousands of refugees are here from the three b three big wrecked cities and other places and the city indeed is being taxed to the limit to find places for all of them. Thursday morning the first big contingent arrived from the south. There were about 10,800 and indeed never in my life ever saw a more forlorn dejected and suffering lot of people that ever were brought together. Thousands were sick and helpless from exposure to the intense cold weather and were taken to hpositals to be taken care of, and also to private homes and the greater number were assigned to other places. But they apparently are not able to quiet themselves unless so fatigued or cold and ill and weak from loss of sleep and want of food that they absolutely fell down exhausted.

They roamed the streets in the bitter cold with scarcely any clothing on them untill taken in, think of it men women, and even poor little children, and all were hollowed eyed and sunken cheeked and on the verge of despair and the men were hurling imprecations at the enemy. And it is terrible Jack my friend to even realize how many families have been broken up by this unaccountable disaster.....

I have listened and heard so many harrowing tales untill I am sick and brave as I am scared. The reports of news papers in every city are not being exaggeratsddone bit and there is really nothing whatever one can a say which will ever express the awful situation. When I arived at general Hansons army I told him I had passed through on a short sight seeing tower the ruined sections of Joan city and there was fierce b fires burning in the wreckage which afforded the only light there was. where no fires were a burning everything was in total darkness save where the red glow could be seen in the sky. It had been reported on the train that over a million lives have been lost on account of the big flood, but this we believed to be a gross exaggeration. But now I have surely changed my mind...

I think now more than any bod: anybody it is only a small figure. I grouped my way through the darknesss stumbling over windrows of smoking debris, to view the wreckage at night and after some difficulty finally got out of the burning city. I went into one house that had been left stunding by the receding waters but which had been moved from its foundation nevertheless. Upon lighting a match I found the place sacked of everything by the flood, the paper was frozen to the ceiling the walls were ice covered icercicles were hanging down from the ceiling and it was cold and uncomfortable. A man having seen me enter followed me and standing there in the darkness said;

" My little girl I want to tell you something." Andche then gave me a harrowing account of what he and his family had passed through, the details of which the others also had gone through and dee rib ibed to me. All the other people in the house had been drowned, and he was th e the only survivor.

There is hardly a structure in the city that escaped the fury of the flood. Windrows of debris cover the streets and are either burning or frozen together telephone and telegraph wires are down, huge piles of brick and timber, tin roofs and all kinds of miscellaneous things such as furniture trees etc all covered with snow and ice.."

Your's Truely.
Gertrude Angeline."

One of the general passenger agents of the Mic-Hollester and Mandora railroad arived in Angelinia Agathia from Perryville. He was in the general office which is connected with the railway station at Perryville during the flood and escaped without injury though the station was swept away big as it was. He said the accounts of the flood disaster were in no ways exaggerated. The debris in many of the streets he declared was thirty feet high and even fourty all snow covered and big fires were raging in two other places. He said he went to his office in the station near General Hand last after the flood and was compelled to remainthere untill the flood had flotsh over.

CHAPTER NINE...

TOTAL DEAD AND MISSING ON ACCOUNT OF THE BIG FLOOD, NOT ONLY AMONG THE INHABATANTS OF THE THREE BIG CITIES BUT ELSEWHERE, 2,854,567. -- $ 75,000,000 NEEDED FOR RELIEF NECESSARY TO CARRY THE SURVIVORS THROUGH THE FALL AND WINTER AND TO SPRING. AN EYE WITNESS TELLS OF THE FLOOD . GOVERNER TURNER OF CALVERINIA STATE SENDS HIS THANKS. GRUESOME SCENES AND HARROWING INCIDENTS. COMPLETE FROZEN AND SMOKING RUINS FOR MILES AND MILES. VERY FEW LITTLE CHILDREN LEFT.. ALL INHABATANTS IN EVERY CITY OR TOWN THROUGHOUT THE STATE OF CALVERINIA HAD REFUSED TO HEED THE LESSIONS TAUGHT BY THEIR EXPERIENCES IN THE WAR TORN COUNTRY IN HORRORS JUST PAST. CARELESSNESS IN FAILING TO PROVIDE AGAINST THE RECCURANCES OF DISASTERS THAT COULD BE BROUGHT ON BY THE ENEMY. GOVERNER TURNER IN A VERY HOPEFUL MOOD. SAD SIGHTS OBSERVED ALL AROUND BIG GIRL POOL..

IT WAS GIVEN OUT FROM EXECUTIVE VIVIANS LINES ON A TUESDAY DATE WITHHELD, that so far as could be ascertained on that date the loss of life or missing throughout the flood belt was as follows; That nearly one million were not accounted for, that the numbers of bodies recovered were!!!!!!!!

Identified	444,756,
Unindetified	300,000
Missing	200,000
Total	$944,756.
Dead found in big Girl Knool washed in by flood	100,101.
Chamberlane	10,000
Rosa city	1,000
TOTAL	$855,857.

Therefore including the bodies not accounted for or missing this may have made the grand total as2,854,567. The horifying news reached Angelinia Agathia late in the afternoon of November the 30th that many towns and villiages thirty miles southeast of Big Girl Knool city near the north bend of the Aranburgs gun somewhere about fourty miles from where the flood began and in the southeastern corner of Hermann County was entirely wiped out by the sudden rush of waters over so much land. Every place was cov considered to have more than 10,000 inhabatants for the largest and somewhat over a thousand for the smallest many of them however being visitors from all over the country. Not a house was leftstandingall having been washed away and more than 45,678 ce dead bodies were found scattered over fifty miles of ice and snow by relief and many soldiers and exploring parties. General Manger Manager of the Mic-Hollester and Pandora Railroad also recieved plenty of informati on that date that more than thirty m eight miles of that road had been entirely destroyed especially its branch and local lines, between Joan city and Angelinia Agathia.

After looking over the si situation carefully the decision was arived at ten days succeeding the awful tragedy that to even put one of the destroyed cities on her feet would require more than $115,000,000 such was the opinion of all the represen tive business men of the city. And to make it worse this did not mean that even thi big sum mentioned come anywhere near restoring the city to the condition before the outbreak of the flood. Far from i indeed. The city itself from the value of all its buildings was worth more than $500,000,000 not counting the materials in the structures. The Mayor of joan city himself was asked;

" What measure of relief s ir will bury all your dead, put out the flames amon the ruins and windrows of wreckage, clean and pru purify your streets and public places feed and clothe the living give them fuel and place the survivors where they can be self sis sustaining, and on the way to gain what has been lost, and to find homes for many res orphans which the flood has caused caused.?"

" His reply was" it will take more than one hundred and fifteen million dollars to only relieve Joan city from the distress of the big flood. At least that sum will be needed to dispose of the many dead, to first extinguish the fires in th ruins to save what materials may be had among the debris, and to help the survivors secure proper shelter before the winter comes on for fair. nd and I think that we should not only feed and clothe, and secure fuel and provisions but we ought to secure some means to help so many of the people rich and poor who have lost ever thing to make a quick start toard the restoration of their homes before the foal extremely severe cold weather sets in, and we have snow blizzards that tie up the whole country which is usually the case with our winters., and we have two storms per week of this kind as we all know. To do this will require every single dil dollar of I $ 150,000,000."

There were then on the scene many nurses and physicians , and at first it was believed that there were more of them than was really required, but there were really only half of what were needed. The injured themselves were recovering rapidly from their hurts and wounds sustained among the wreckage, which were largel, superficial, but there were scores of thousands who were suffering from all results of the exposure to the cold water and zero weather at the same time which really caused the greater loss than really from drowning. Many who saved themselves from drowning or who after being submerged in the water tried to save themselves on floating rafts and house tops were fro zen to death. And many men and women who did survive these complication of horrors with flood and winter element were suffering from severe nervious shock and found it impossible to sleep, and many had horrdible dreams of the disaster. Despite the attempted efforts of the enemy food was coming in by trainload faster than it could be handled in such generious quantities that no further doubts were entertained about supplies and fuel. Estimates of the number dependent upon the relief committees throughout the whole flood regidn varied. The Mayor of joan city made it about eight million, while other aurthotl aurthorities put the number as high as over fifteen million. In the bush business center the streets had been cleaned and opened, but all the surviving buildings still showed marks of the water line and many were still ice covered and snow bound, but goods and materials of all kinds were on display nevertheless and business some how was beginning to be transacted as best as it could be done it.

The city despite the fact that it was faced on the sor theast side by a foe army was gradually assuming the bustling antefloed appearance, but yet not one street was lighted in any way, stenches from the burning wreckage still assailed the nostrils, the recovery and burial of the dead was s ill being pushed regardless of the weather, but it was believed that it would be many days indeed before the working parties of Mandelinian prisoners would secure the last of the bodies from any kind of wreckage.

Every section of this once beautiful city had been submerged but the horrors of the northeastern and extreme western portions of the city beyond the city limits were just being learned at other points of the nation. On One thousand eight hundred hundred and sixty bodies were buried near Ophelia on November the 26th.. Between one thousand three hundred and thirty six bodies were counted among the piles of the half wrecked railway bridge, between Big Girl Knool and her sister city Little Girl Knool which is on the opposite side of the great Aranburg's river.... In lower city that is Jennie Turner about 100 bodies were found eighteen in one block, but the flood did no harm to houses in that vinicity.

The farther you go the more numerous were the dead for the flood scattered them over a verywide territory. Fires were burning every mile or so where the flood fat in the country had disposted great mounds of wreckage, and along many of the railroad right of ways the results of the flood hitting Schibedertoon when the explosion caused the big fire there. In Sherryville fires were burning in the wreckage every three hundred feet, and in houses in many of the streets and all the soldiers who volunteered to fight these smouldering flames could do nothing to stop it and fire departments even could not leave big Girl Knool because of the danger of transportation at such a time as this.

The Mayor of Big Girl Knool Himself made a statement onthat day ofconditions and needs of the countless refugees coming there basing his conclusions on the most reliable information which has come to him. The Mayors statement was as follows!!!!!!

" It is almost impossible to speak properly as yet of the needs of the refugees that came to our city from the flood s districts to seek aid here. We ourselves lending so much aid to the support of the armies and our cause are broke the majority of us and we are indeed thankful our city was not hard hit like the others otherwise the number of dead and refugees would have been quintupled. Joan city must have suffered alone in my estimation based upon all the reports I have s loss in property of nearly $345,000,000, and even we ourselves the people of Big Girl Knool need immense amounts of money to sustain so many refuge ees here. From the advices I have recie recieved I believe the shipments of food, provisions, clothing, fuel and other things and other supplies now on the way will be sufficient to meet the immediate wants. By the time these are used we too shall have regained our own transportation facilities and stocks of everything, so that we can use money more advantageously for the sake of the hundreds of thousands of ref refugees seeking shelter here.

It is impossible to state just how much money has reached us from various parts of the nation. We have already recieved from the Governers of various Abbiannian Abbiannian states about $11,000,000 in cash. and that is from the general funds

Special contributionshave come in through all companies, and we now have between 1,500,000 and three million Glandelinian prisoners in prison garbs at work under guard searching for more odies, helping to fight the flames, clearning the streets and saving what good of the wreckage can be used for rebuilding. Many of these prisonsrs are sorry such a disaster occured and sympathize with us and work willingly but many are not so and wish revenge for being made to work at the point of the bayonet and must bear close watching. Yet of this pressed work which we are trying to have accomplished as fast as possible in the interest of the living, there is enough to keep three million employed for four months although I believe we shall have the principal streets clear in four or five weeks.

Not counting the two other cities, I will have to hesitate to even dare to say how much it will take to put Joan city where her half frozen people can care for themselves and be in proper shelter for the coming winter. Certainlymore than one hundred and fifty million dollars will be a very moderate estimate, as hundreds of millions worth in property has been swept entirely away, not counting the smouldering wreck left under our very noses to taunt us.There is not a single surviving building that is not badly or totally damaged, and all will need straightening on their foundations, and difficult work will be required to get rid of all the tyick ice left on the sides of the buildings which make most of them resemble moderate sized icebergs on land.

If Joan city could get even $ 100,000,000 it would be fused used properly to enable the people to become self sustaining and to give them proper shelter, for the coming winter season.It is true that Joan City is represented as being one of the best of cities of the country as she drew many tourists and sight seers and our river view is excellent and makes a scene like a paradise in summer or winter combined, But our rich people and many rich people who came here for the winter had mostly everything here and are crippled or wiped out. The people of moderate means who had homes and worked hard for saleries are all ruined wiped out in everything, all the doctors and nurseswho have been among the people more than I and my followers have say there are over eight million 8,000,000 who must be fed and clothed, and carried along for some time to come even after immediate needs have been met with. There is no danger of the fires within our cities spreading to the forests some distant beyond and we do not fear of any. But many of the victims are suffering from shock and exposure to the cold and from injuries received from among the ruins, and from frozen hands and feet and ears. The city of joan I am convinced lost fully five hundred thousand persons as so many are missing. All along the stretch of the flood outside of the city were scattered between two hundred and three hundred thousand persons and bodies of people from our city has been found in the river water and ruins filled streets of Schloedertown ad Sperryville, and Sperryville has even her dead in the city of Schlodertown. And from the reports slowly coming in it appears that most of these people lost their lives more from freezing to death in the icy waters or from exposure to the zero weather when on rafts and house tops than from drowning or killed.

The other sections of the land in the part of the flood where small towns and villiages stood seems oto have been swept clean of every habatation.

The most motley crowd of Abi Abbieannian regulars ever seen at attention lined up before general Calmann Shoeman the second week after the flood calamity. His camp with fully 10,000,000 soldiers was surprised by the flood and all the camp wi with provision wagons, batteries of artillery and everything an army has was instantly swept away, uniforms and all and the men were so quickly surprised that 10,000 lost their lives. The whole army was a sorry sight for parts of uniforms here no semblalanxe to any uniform for they were barely sufficient to cover naked nede and in many cases there were bad rents, which made the soldiers look very " Naked indeed". Sixteen batteries came out of the flood with a loss of sixty eight out of 100 men each a loss that general Shoeman said" Has never known in any battle yet. One of these soldiers who was an officer of high rank was picked up floating ten miles on a large door and froun found frozen to death from exposure while wet; another was carried on a large chicken coop across the flood and then into the flooded streets of Big Girl Knool city thirty miles away from where the camp had been. The survivors of the army without tents, without arms without food without fuel and provisions had been barracked in a series of flood shattered towns since the two weeks after the flood.

Finally they were sent to Angelinia Agathia to be outfitted and armed.. The officers generals and men of every co mand of Shoemans army lost everything and many soldiers even had to borrow clothing from friends to cover them and sheild them from the cold. General Kindernine of Hansons army had undertaken to see that general gormanT urner five little children did not suffer. It was believed one of the Members of the Abbieannian court would and will take an interest in this case. General urner came to Shoemans army with his family from Pandora city Calverinia where he was well known. His family consisted of his wife, three little girls and two boys. He had housed them in an army officers barracks. When the suddenly rising of the flood made the big barracks I no longer safe he placed Jenny, Nora, and Mildred little girls from ten to five on a large raft at the top window(the flood being fourty feet deep at the time) and went back for the others. The boys were then placed on the raft being carried all the way tward Big Girl knool and though the children suffered terribly from the cold they survived and were rescued. General urner and his wife, and sixteen officers in that barracks were lost as the barracks was swept to pieces.. General indernine said;

" In my opinion the situation is rapidly growing better despite the hinderance on the part of the enemy the surviving people finding themselves dazed and shattered as a result of the big flood. While there was an abundance ofenergy remaining as is naturally expected, a vast amount of it has not been properly concentrated because of the extreme cold weather and severe blizzard storms but we have a large number of prisoners at work which will do what is necessary to be accomplished, in the proper time.

What is most needed for the restoration of the wrecked cities and towns is money. All the survivor owned homes and have seen them totally destroyed or badly wrecked and are now dependant upon the generiousity of the outside world and upon the relief committees to prepare for the rigors of winter and to refurnish what is left of their homes with necessities. No one one who has not been an eye-witness to the desolation which has swept over so much of this land can have even the faintest conception of what it means.

Joan city lies on the bank of The Aronburgs Run river is about two miles wide at its narrow narrowest, sixteen miles at its broadest, and is fourty in length. Along the northwest and river front side for the whole length every house had been absolutely swept away, and such of these unfortunates who were not frozen to death or drowned are now absolutely without a cent or a home to go to."

One of the most graphic descriptions of the flood was that given by a prominent citizen of Schloedertown.His name I will not recall for certain reasons, but nevertheless he said;

" The flood came so suddenly upon us that I cannot comprehend it. I reached my home after leaving from house to house which were floated in the water, and then made immediate preparations to take my wife and one child where I felt their safty might be assured. The water after the first appearance began to arise so rapidly, that in fifteen minutes we were driveto the fourth floor, and it was then impossible for us or the others in the same bul building from leaving the house without being frozen to death outside or drowned.At this time a big wooden house which adjoined mine went down with every one in it every one perishing, in the swirling waters. Then down Krator Street came floating up a whole row of small houses most of them wooden, one of them which struck a big tree and stopped directly in front of my house. I heard many children crying and women screaming, and men yelling. The words" Oh Jesus Mercy" I can still hear ringing in my ears.. By means of a rope fastened to a stout projection in the window I endeavored to hold the house close enough to enable me and my wife to rescue those within, but another house came sweeping by and after carrying away the gallery of my house, struck the other and crushed it to fragments and itself took dae many in the water at once; and I believe not one of them survived. four other houses, carrying sixteen people each floated by at express train speed, and I and my family could see the struggling forms in the water within them.

Like immense windrows of wreckage piled high up and afire in many places, floating by and thickly interlogged with human bodies, many of whom were alive, and at the mercy of the fire.

Indeed I was expecting it would be my turn next. I therefore kissed my wife and child good bye(a piece of pie) and as I did so my little girl said;

" Father will I go to heaven when I die. Will we all go, or will the flood take us to the bad place??????"""""

Then came the piercing shrieks of women and the crying of other children, followed by a crash and another house which had passed us crashed into that windrow of burningwreckage burning wreckage and then turned over on its side, and was driven past and through the wreckage by the blizzard or cold wave winds, and by the pressure of the flood.. Indeed it seemed to me as if the current was running fast enough to even outdue the swiftest express train in its highest speed. The water was already on our fourth floor and the waves kept knocking us about untill we were completely exhausted, and numb with the contact of the ice cold water. Then the house of ours began to move off too like as if it was a boat, but the water began to fall. I looked about at the approach of morning and could see nothing but a sea of water, and floating houses and debris, there being nothing but a flood of water in every direction, as if the river itself had already become a big inland sea.

It was too days more however before the flood had receded lower enough to freeze over, and our house had floated for about fourty miles untill it came close enough toard the shore to allow people on the dry land who stood in immense crowds to draw us to safty, and quickly bring us to big hot bonfires to thaw out our almost frozen bodies."

On november the 27th,, up and down the Great Mif- Nic-pollester and Pandora railroad, the Abbiesannian, In International and Great Southern, the Abbiesannia Pondinia, and Calverine, the Sandon Pandora lines, and their connections,the wires were already carrying the official information that Schloedertown town after this we would be a Terminal, a sure enough stepping place for main line trains, as soon as the new tracks could be made tour tward her. The Vice Presidents and general Managers and General Agents had mastered the railroad wreck, they had set the time for running the first train into schloedertown, and that time was on a Friday. By that day near the end of ovember the last Friday of that month, according to the engineers, the temporary bridge would be ready for use,
It was ready to the minute and strongly guarded by christian troops who were encamped there..The news that these great railroads had declared readiness to accept fr frieght for Schloedertown, and through schloedertown was recieved by business men as tidings of the greatest joy for it also added greatly to the improvemnt improvement of the spirit. For many days after the l flood,, the preditions were that no trains of any kind would enter Schloedertown under sixty five days and that the time might be four months.
Equally exhilarating with the action of the railroad men was the action taken by the armies close by keeping the enemy from advancing, and also that exportation of wheat could soon be resumed. The machinery of some of the repaired elevators had already been s arted up and was succes ul successful and several of the wharves had been cleared.A steamship coming all the way down from Dorothy Gale city was brought under the spout and loaded.Some of the officials said almost the entire remainder of the city would be safe from the enemy according to what the christian generals had promished.
The number of persons who left the city of Schloedertown at the sudden approach of the Glandelinian army after the recession of the flood up to November the 23th it was stated at relief headquarters of the army was over eight hundred thousand of whom five hundred thousand were them in the army, the rest,at Big Girl Knool bein being cared for. Others had gone on into the aterior of the state, or to other states. The number coming up on the trains showed no falling off....

New arrangements made at sperryville also threatened by the foe enabled people to get out without so much red tape and they took advantage of the opportunit, opportunity to do so. The Calverinian Governer , urner had still remained in charge of the relief work here and at all points, and therefore money was given out only where needed, more than provisions and clothing.....
The Abbiesannian embassy at Orancic yermonuia, cabled $ 5,000 to Governer urner on November the 26th. General Also president of the Abbiesannian Red Cross Society state state of Vernie, city of urner, recieved on November the 28th a telegram from one of the Abbiesannian Princess's violet herself who was with her sisters at joan city as follows:::::::

" Find immediate needs of all kinds to a most great proportion, and especially surgical dressing, fuels for the survivers, clothing, usual medicines for those who are taken cold, or sufferserjously from the result of exposure, and delicacies for the sick and injured. There is an epidemic of deathly colds because of exposure in the icy cold waters, or to the zero winds while floating on wreckage, and many are worn out with extreme suffering, and exertion, who also need tender care and proper food, and plenty of fuel. People are forced to use the wreckage for fuel otherwise many more will die.

VIOLET. ANGELIC. VIVIAN.""

BUILDING material was badly needed at Schlodertwon Schloedertown and sperryville but on account of all the efforts of enemy armies and raiders and the like its delivery was unusually slow or nil altogether, and also because of the lack of certai certain railroad communication with the city in other directions which was cut off by the rebel armies.There were still as many pitiable cases of destitution.
hundreds of half demented persons absolutely refused to leave their wrecked homes and as persistently refused to offi offer or refuse officers of relief extended them. In many instances despite the fearfully cold weather and blinding winter storms with winds of almost cyclonic velocity parents who had lost children still occupied ruins of their former home and the surroundingshad brought them to a state of mental and physical collaspe.
The number who had gone insane or on the verge of insanity as a result of their experiences will probably never be known. Inevery large lot of refugees sent out of either of the three stricken cities, there were many insane men and women. The victims first made light of their losses, and laugo laughed moderately or immoderately when telling of deaths of relatives in the flood. Indeed it was a very short step from this to uncontrollable madness, and the enemy was fully responsible for all this...The soldiers did splendid work in patrolling the e- these cities after the big flood, and many thousands of the men were of the full belief that they should be allowed to return to their homes what in left, and troops sent from other parts or general vivians army to fill their places, and guard the working landelinian prisoners, whom many of the enraged citizens snow balls or spit upon and hit with boards and planks.The fears of a epidmicbecause of such exposure to the weather were allayed by the presence and the quick distribution of medinc medicines and therefore a feature which would have without the slightest doubts have had the effect of causing many to seek succor elsewhere, was therefore eliminated from the situation.On November the 29th,, Angelinia Agathia had raised over $ 56,789,000 for the flood sufferers, including many given out by school children, and even orphans, porothy Gale, nearly 4 $ 45,678,333,,, Angeline junction, nearly $70,000,000 and other cities and towns the following amount:::::::

Governer urner of Calve inia Calverinia state sent out the following express expression of thanks onbehalf of the sufferers of the flood in the three cities, and elsewhere and as the representive of the people of his own state(you are late) as follows;
" In bela behalf of the people of the sta e o state of Calverinia I desire to express my acknowledgement to the people of the loyal parts of Abbiesannia and Calverinia, as well as the others of the Abbiesannian nation for the ready and most generous response they hav cmade gave made in coming to the aid of our afflicted people. The immense deaths not said by drowning at the most by but by freezing and exposure in the ice cold water, the awful magnitude of destitution, the loss of property, and the numbe of orphans made by the enemy caused disaster is far far greater than any one could ever anticipate and which any one could ever eg exaggerated.The Secretary of tye A the Abbiesannian Navy has placed the revenue cutters belonging to the defenses of Angelinia Agathia at my disposal, and I have in turn placed it at the disposal of the Mayor of Schloedertown. The addition of these cuttus(s(providing they do any cutting0) to the boats already loaned by the Imperial government will give us fifty five more boats at Schloedertown, to handl handle supplies and passengers to and from the city, and I anticipate that their presence there will relie rel relieve the situation tremendously.
The city authorities at Schloedertown and the two others, are now in fulll controlll and every effort is still contining to be made at urying the remaining dead, to remove all good timbers and wood and brick and masonery from the debris to rebuilu homes with, and to sanitate the cities.Contributions of the most liberial character are reaching me, and therefore I shall see that the money is used to the best advantage for the suffers andthat also ther shall be no wa waste,, of the man magnificent contributions coming from the frees hands and generous hearts of a sympathic people.....o idea could possibly be formed as to the frightful and usual crush to railroad trains bearing relief supplies and fuel in and around Big Girl Knool and Ormman City, the latter being but four mile miles from Schlosdertown and the t o two others but s eperated from them by a big stretch of beautiful forest, and ice covered lakes and streams.... Owing to the small number of river craft plying between Angelinia Agathia city and the three flood victims the shipment of supplies to the three latter was necessarily aggravitingly slow, and the enemy have tried to hinder all trum transportation on the ri railroad, and reports com in to me of thou ands of skirmishes for that purpose in which many lost their lives.

The most gruesome scenes and soul harrowing incidents of the im time following immediately after the great flood were graphically portrayed in a letter from a little 10 year old girl caught in the city in the awful flood., to her mother and father. It was written by little Ella Nelly Joner to her parents who lived at 5875 Riverview Street Angelinia Agathia.....The little girl had gone with her aunt for Schlosdertown the very morning before the sea of waters burst upon the city reaching the doomed city just in time to participate in the terrible experience.

Her letter follows true.

SCHLOSDERTOWN. NOVEMBER THE 20TH.
NOVEMBER THE 24TH 1913.

DEAREST PARENTS,

this is the first time I have had the chance to write, and even now I am not able to collect my thoughts to tell you of thehorrible disaster down here.

Fires burning by hundreds everywhere, a sea of a raging waters so wide you cannot see across it; hundreds of thousands of dead bodies left in the ice covered streets; the land for scores of miles stream as thick as an extensive slaughter ground with dr dead bodies. The whole city is demolish a demolished; to get a drink we have to melt snow or ice as thehriver is defouled with so many dead bodies floating in the b water between the ice cakes. Food is scarce. If help does st not reach u us soon there will be great starvation for every body. Very few of the dead are being is ntified; they athrow most of them on wagons and drays and sleighs and take them to the river barges where they are loaded like corwood and taken out to the middle of the river to be cast into the waves, so so peaceful but thoch were so hungry for them in their al angar..

.....I was at one of the surviving wharves this morningcold as it is not only for a short time, and saw twenty barges loaded with their gruesome freight and the bodies are all frozen and nearly every one of them nude. God alone knows th they are.

The whole stretch of land over which the flood had spread for scores of miles miles is covered with dead animals of every kind you can think of including cattle and horsestogether with innumerable human corpses all f rfrozen into the ice of the still remains rea remaining but now frozen flood, covered white with freshly fallen snow. I t seems it will be impossible to remove all these dead from the ice until a tha w some or from the burning debris, the whole scene is frightful more frightful than any one can imagine. Yet every one is striving to get the bodies buried.

I never expected to escape from the flood alive, but thank God and His Blessed Mother not one of us was killed though we suffered terribly. We were first driven to the top of the stairs of the third flight bythe great flood waves. The water was rushing past at great speed, and the snow fell in blinding clouds a terrible day for the begining of the flood, with a sixty mile an hour wind blowing in the bargain and almost zero cold.Never shall I forget the sight as darkness of the first day of horror settled upon us with the blizzard storm at itshe ight. I thought of you papa, and mamma and prayed that you might be comforted. Our roof has fallen in the walls have fallen around us but we still have what is left of a floor---and I can't tell you it is too terrible.

On the second day of the flood I was nearly drowned in one of the rooms and a man gone crazy with the experienced sprang at me and strangled me and would have killed me if three others did not interfere. Then he raved and jumped into the flood and we saw him no more. My aunt is almost crazy also and is in a dangerous condition. We have lost everything, am now wearing clothes borrowed from those who were f more fortunate. The stench from burning bodies in the wreckage is horrible. Countless thousands of horses and cattle were wiped out none surviving; all cats and dogs are dead and chickens al o also, and the surviving people---I wonder that every one is not insane from the horrors. No account can even exaggerate it. It is absolutely necessary that all the schoolchildren and every one in Abblesmnia do what they can.Nearly every one in all the buildings around us were drowned or frozen, and the town is under martial law to protect it from the mob of Mandelinian vandals. Last night after the flood had fully gone down a Mandelinian was ar ested arrested with some suspicious papers; and ten fingers and rings in his pockets, and he was shot as well as many others; I as young as I am have done what I could to help the dying and wounded.

We were on the hi heat point in the city of Schlosdertown, and that is probably all that saved us. Not blocks and blocks reaching into scores of miles or as far as eye can reach not a house remainsu anywhere, not a building but is completely washed away; houses just torn board by board and swept away. Many or piled up into windrows upon windrows of burning wreckage. I have climbed over wreckage more than fourty feet high in the streets to get to certain places, and I surely think we were more fortunate than any one else in the city. I say not one was killed in the house we took refuge in; though our escape indeed was narrow. With the exception of my aunt, all were calm; though I believe everybody quaked inside- at least I know I surely did. A week has passed since the flood and I am well go about little to eat this porridgand a little melted snow for water. Coffee even is wiped out and water is not fit to drink even though we are within view of the flower river.

As they pick up the dead bodies they are found frozen hard.. Many of them are in great heaps of windrows of wreckage all afire and the horrors multiply. I have seen many men shot down in the streets by the soldiers soldiers; and the stench of burning bodies cannot be imagined. Last night the awful smell kept us awake although we were utterly exhausted. It fills your throat and mouth, and makes your head ache so.

It will take years and years for me to tell the horrible experiences and a full life time to ever forget it. And dear papa, and and mamma if you could only be here you would feel that your anxiety was nothing. It is so saddening, so pitable to see so many husbands husbands, with with looks of despair in their very eyes searching vainly for their wives and children, wives for their loved ones; and most pitable of all, the comparatively small number of children---although indeed they are enough, God knows to be left orphans and homeless---looking into every one's face with frightened appealing eyes. It is absolutely heart rending. No don't worry about me as I am much better off, and am safe. I hope to hear from you soon.

Best love and kisses to both from

Although many other places have been struck more than once with disasters caused by th the enemy, and have been swept by fires and so on; even these experiences were not enough to convince the residents that as long as the war was to continue on it surely might happen again. Only a few of the more cautious had any idea after the latest disasters of the war already mentioned in the past chapters of chapters of taking steps to prevent them occuring again. Asked if anything could be done to make it impossible in the future for the enemy to make future floods and other disasters they might probably quote the old Saxon saw;

"Lightning never strikes in the same place twice" and look therefore to think that settles it. In the next sen enceThey would compare th e damage done at Pullaway and other places and of forest fires with this latest disaster.

"No" said C. T Hander, assistant Abblesmnian governmental Engineer "The people of every city andtown throughout the nation will go on living in fancied security just as they did before. The plan to put a dike around every citylnear rivers and lakes, in valleys or on plains is perfectly feasible, and so is a series of jetties. I think the good old Holland plan is much the best. These cities ruined by the flood do not need to be changed. I was fourteen years government engineer of the nation and following the destruction of Jennie Vivian city by a cloud burst two years and a half ago drew plans for a dike seventeen feet high and extending all around the city. The people of that city gave this plan great consideration and there is a map of the city in existence now which shows shows it with a high dike around it.The legislature gave authority to bond the city, but it was some months after the cloud burst that flooded the lens land when this had been secured, and the city is strongly protected from floods as they surely did twice more stronger dikes than even planned.The construction by the government of two jetties eighteen miles long extending out southwest for the purpose of making a narrower and deeper channel for boats on the Norma Run coming into Jennie Vivians harbor made the necessity of remedial work more apparent, and therefore only fire or explosions or windstorm can wreck the city now, or ware desolation can do some harm but I believe she is free from devestation floods, and also has a strong christian army guarding it from the advance of ice armies in that direction to the succor of Vivian sixty eighteen miles distant.

if Schloeddertown and the two others would have been protected in a similar way this triple disaster would not have occurred. Schloeddertown and Kerryville I believe were the hardest hit, first Schloeddertown wrecked by the force of the distant explosion; then her buildings bursting into flames at hundreds of places; and then whole sections swept away in a moment by flood. Where the flood struck first is the place where whole blocks of buildings by the thousands were literally washed away without the inhabitants ever having the chance to save themselves, and leaving not even a foundation stone anywhere to ever indicate that a building ever stood there. In that part of the city the water at the start rose to a depth depth of thirty feet in the streets in a minute. Had most of the houses demolished by the suddenness of the flood not formed into a great jam but extending along the north side of the city for eighteen and a half miles, this enormous body of water would have swept upon the two other cities with the same force and depth, and no one of those three cities would have lived to see another day and not a trace of these cities as except wreckage scattered all over the country would have been found. Less probably the flood would have spread further and covered more territory and the number of dead of country towns and villages would ha been quadrupled.

" it formed something like an immense mountain of brokenwaters" said he in calling attention to this feature of the flood" and had it not been for that big wall of debris not one soul of us of either the three cities or any of the towns and villages would be here now, as powerful ,ivians ship which was stationed fourty miles seaward the time would have reclaved the front of the flood and been also wiped out.

So far it was the greatest flood on record."

According to Hendrick Smyhoe Schloeddertown had the wrong style of architecture for a river side town. Its water buildings were built on the country plan with balloon frames and poorly adapted to stand the force of torrents of water.

"This torrent was a enemy made inundation" he said" just such as any place a near a river can expect any day, but which we so far perhaps had not had until this disaster. Still no one can tell when another such disaster like this will come again, and not trusting the enemy we should build our houses accordingly and see to it to the forming of dikes on the " Jennie Vivian city" plans."

Secretary Vivian had given some time in the past to consideration of projects to pre e prevent even the inundations. H not only favored the jetty and dike system but also favored the proposition of having all levees and dikes of dams, dams, lakes and rivers closely watched by so ; secret servi e men and soldiers and the like in disguise and if any one is caught starting even a small leak to shoot him like a dog on the spot.

He said however that with so much going on now nothing for the time being could be done.

" You never heard of any such disaster being averted under such conditions yet i did you?" he asked." What we want is not to prevent the bursting of these river and like dikes by the enemy. That is usually impossible as they'll do it secretly secretly and at unexpected places. We want the great waves of the flood to break their force or to stop its course before they reach a city or town. It was the force of the flood which wrecked the houses. Like the cities all around is the test of all plans. Jennie Vivian has been diked, the Huron has had overflowed its banks often ever since and Sadly too but Jennie Vivian has never been troubled since the overflowing of the river when caused by the cloudburst..."""

The work of ben of extracting bodies from the mas of frozen or burning wreckage continued. On the last of November four thousand and bodies were taken out of the debris which lined the river front. With all that can being don and hand been done to recover bodies buried beneath or pinned and frozen tight to the lumber frozen and half burning drift the work so far even now had scarcely started as the heat of the fires, and the severity of the weather pus too much for the glandelinian prisoners.

There was no means to dig graves, and the frozen bodies beaten and bruised beyond identification was again consigned to the flames to get rid of them entirely.

More glandelinian prisoners for this gruesome task came in fast. And glandelinians who had tried to avoid such work under ordinary conditions were now working with more will and energy in putting them away.

Under one pile of wreckage on the last of November two hundred and sixty five bodies were taken out and re-cremated. An increased force of glandelinian prisoners were engaged in removing the dead as far as possible from the frozen flood as far away from the cities as twenty miles out in the flooded coast country. At this point the water had run to a height of seventy feet, and hung up in high trees and big telephone pole sorethe bodies of men women and children and every kind of animal which were being collected and cremated as quickly as it was even possible.

Everywhere as far as the flood might have extended and as far as it might have swept the bodies the searching for and cremating of them that either perished or found lodgement there also was being pushed most vigorously. Indeed the situation the flooded section of the coast country extending from Big Girl Knool to even Glorianna city was possibly worse than in any other section of the land where the flood has swept so furiously. Violet and her sisters issued other appeals to the people throughout the Abblesunian nation for money and supplies for the sick and wounded. All members of the relief committee stated that the greatest sufferers from the flood were the people of limited means, who owned homes which were swept away intirely. There were scores of thousands of these people in one city alone who had owned mortgaged lots and had homes constructed by the loan companies and through their property was swept away the loan companies were prited on by liens.

They advised that a fund be raised for people who had therefore suffered this way that they might be able to restore what took them years to even accumulate, and was taken from them in a single moment.

Even the resources of the numerous aid relief stations scattered throughout the country around the flood belt were tax taxed to their utmost capacity and long lines of people were compelled to wait for their turns in the cold for clothing and provisions.

At Big Girl Knool city and , ittle ,irl Knool also a force of deputy Abblesunian marshalls under Marshall Pierce was guarding all approaches to Schloeddertown and the two others and keeping back all people who could show no good reason for desiring to go there, for fear many , may be Glandelinian vandals and the like in disguise. People were still leaving both city a majority being women and children. Even now the three cities were still under martial law and will remain so for months or until the disorder stops and the heat by Glandelinian army goes away.

Riders and sight seers, who eluded the guards upon their arrival in any one of the cities were pressed into the street services with the rebel prisoners. No matter who he was or what he was, there was no place for a man who could not work. It was work or go to jail, and they generally went to work.

I look for the rebuilding and restoration of the cities and towns swept by the flood to be well under ways soon as the outcome will permit" said Governor Turner of Calverinia on November 30th, at Angelinia Agathia city, the National Capital. The work" The work of cleaning these cities of trash refuse, and , burial of dead will have been completed within another month or so, and all the available labor in the cities as well as the forced aid of the Glandelinian prisoners can be applied to the rebuilding of the ruined homes. If we can only get the right number of laboring people from all over the country to come to work prosperity will again smile on these cities but so many are in the armies that laborers are sadly too few. Arrangements are made therefore to pay what laborers that can be obtained about 11 $ 11.50 and rations for every day they have worked and can work if they can only be obtained.

The money and food contributions coming from a generous people of the nation have been a great help to the the people of the flood as it has relieved them of the necessity of spending their money to support the needy, and it can not be applied to the improvement of whatever lived of their own property and putting again on foot their business interrupted.

$ 10 a day is being offered to the mechanics who can come to the wrecked cities; and with the assurance from reputable doctors that there is no unusual danger of sickness, it is hoped outside laborers that have not gone into the army will flock to the places and before many days; three new cities will rise on the flood swept land.

The telegraph and telephone companies and railroads have been exceedingly generous since the great war calamity. They have not only given money but everything has been transported to the stricken places free of charge while all those who desired to get away from the horrowing scene of the flood have been transported free. The people of the state of Calverinia will long remember with grateful hearts the kindness of these companies, and it is now an assured fact that trains will be running into any one of these three cities any time this week week and if communication is not further hindered by the enemy, the three cities should soon assume their normal condition.""""""""""""""

When one of the relief trains rushed reached the city of Big Girl Knool, which is fourty or so miles away from Schloeddertown, it was found of those who survived the f flood the majority were severely injured, and many died of hurts and exposure; Most of them were bruised or maimed, or had suffered from frozen legs and feet hands or arms presenting everywhere to see a most pitiable sight, their limbs lacerated and bleeding. All bemoaned the fate of these dearest to them and heaped imprecations upon the enemy for causing the disaster.

Many of the dead, and the ice covered and flooded ground all around Big Girl Knoel was thickly covered with them--had their faces and heads mutilated so that it was almost impossible to learn the names of those who found their last resting place in the crude graves so hurried dug in the ground where digging could be done. Only a mere head board was placed on the grave on every instance, giving as nearly as possible age and accurate description, telling also whether it was a man woman or child, what city and the like.It was found necessary in many instances to bury fourty to a hundred in on long grave. All those who survived the disaster were homeless, and had hardly anything to eat and were depended upon the people of the city of Big Girl Knoel.

And most of them were injured and there therefore it was not possible for them to organize any movement on their own part. Therefore life sustenance was furnished these survivors in order that they might not swell the horrible list of dead; most of the bodies found in and around the vicinity of Big Girl Knoel were supposed to have been far there from the three flood wrecked cities.

When the flood had spread from Schlesdettown and went through Perryville and Town city, it sped southward over the counties of Frank, Lamgore, and Triduro its path really being about three hundred miles in length and about a hundred at its widest, and then spreading and slightly turning toward the east or slightly southeast, crossed the fert farm lands of five other counties, and then lowering steadily and gradually finally free ever but before it had done this it had created great h havoc and wreck, wherever it went. It caused great loss of life and property in the lower part of the state of Angelina in Virginia and over the boundary line of the Angelinia state, flooding many small rivers and destroyed many river craft throughout its whole reach.

The following dispatches may show how wide spread was the flood, counting on cities and towns cities and towns not too hard hit by the flood as no news can be gotten from those entirely swept away; were as follows:Brigg

Saltchia November the 14th . 1912.----------

Immense damage was committed here a and at other small towns and villages by the Schlesdettown flood which traveled with great speed and violence all over the land yesterday and remained in full body for nearly six days. Reports from Cypress town a summer ad winter resort on the Archburgs gun side of Angelinia state says that every river dock has been destroyed, all and all the boats and river craft belonging the to the fishing commerce of this little city with many large river steamers and anchored there were completed, wrecked and washed all over the territory. In this citythe water rose to a depth of five feet in the lowest streets and moved at a rate of twenty miles an hourly and seemed to regain some of the dreadful power which it exhibited in wrecking other cities and small towns. Reports of great property, loss and a large number of deaths and injuries have already come in.....

St Ann. Northern Angelinia state. November the 12th. 1912.

The big river steamerthe St Maria arrived here at one oclock P M from Angelinia Agathia. She left that place at twelve oclock noon two day ago, and the captian reports a fearful voage not down a beautiful river as he supposed should be there but over an open sea or something on that order, filled with floating houses; wreckage bodies and many scores of thousands of trees. The captians wife and children was here from Angelinia Agathia and was on the dock to meet the captian who is the leader and husband & wife husband. The meeting between them indeed was affecting beyond description. All these hours anxious watchers had a waiting on the wharves for a glimpse of the missing river steamer. Many people had friends on among the passengers and crew, and as the day wore on and a big billboard was raging their anxiety became more and more intense.

Frinklin, November the 12th. 1912.-------As a result of the dreadful flood which has swept over the southern part of Calverinia fourty miles near Big Girl Knool to day and which lasted for nearly a week telegraph and telephone lines were prostrated inall directions from this city to day and all country bridges, all country towns and villages and the like are said to have been swept away without a sign of a piece of their timbers remaining. During the height of the flood the speed of the current reached a velocity of said to be sixty miles an hour as estimating the rate of the wrecks passing by us. To day the flood has fross over very hard after having dropped down to a depth of ten feet in the deepest. up to noon to. day the many big river passenger steamers and gun and other war craft hundreds of them which left Dorothy Dale city the day of the flood for this port have not been heard from. They were due here at seven oclock in the morning of two days ago. The war frigate The German due here from the city of Angelinia Agathia has not arrived yet and it was supposed to have been due three days ago. The torrent swept into the riverlike an immense tidal wave but the curvings and however been so through that it is said very few vessels have been caught unprepared,but that did did give them in the least. The River Steamer Angelinia Agathia of the Angelinia Agathia steamship company's fleet lost her smoke stack off at Big Girl Knool. Her barge and tug anchored but both came into port three days and six hour late. The River frigate Helte has not yet arrived having been in shelter at Long River during the worst of the floodiiiiii.

Gloria, November the 12th.----------The flood reached a height of sixteen feet around it and the water rushed past at a speed of probably thirty m miles an hour from the northeast at midnight; the flood being accompanied by a terrific wind and blizzard storm from the east by northfrom what many of the spectators on shore testify many lives were lost for they claim bodies floated past as thick, as straws from a number of hay stacks.

Undandon, Calverinia, November the 12th.------- The Tail end of the flood struck struck this section with great force about twelve thirty of clock this morning or night whatever time it be and continued to rise for nearly three days and continued until most of it from over. Our streets which were flooded to a depth of five feet in places are covered with dead bodies of people and animals from which we do not know there as no loss of life occured among our inhabatants. The loss to river shipping is very heavy heavy.

Imperialville, Calverinia, November the 12th.------- We found shipping of the big river in some of our streets on the outskirts last night and this morning which were driven into the place by the waters of the flood. Not one of the crew of these ships were saved. The water is moving from the northwest; and shipping on the river suffered heavily many sailors and others being drowned; bodies of cities citizens of some city were found within our streets.

South San Pond Calverinia.-------November 12th------- The flood lasted six days here and though the city, did not suffer from the water six small river schooners were found in one of our streets which were wrecked and bodies from some such or city, that had been swept away are in the streets.

Frank City, Northern Angelinia, State" November the 12th.

The flood attacked our city, on the 14th starting at night and after rising for four days attained a velocity early in the afternoon of about seventy two miles an hour destroying many lives in our city and neighborhood, and causing great damage to property on the land and wrecked or swept away many vessels from the river.The flood however was not as sudden here as at other places but came gradually. We are about sixteen miles west of Schlesdertown. We heard before the flood started some strange thundering noise like a series of explosions and saw a rolling embankment of ominious clouds rise suddenly in the direction of Lake Melissa and which was broken by an occasional flash. But as this cloud came arose it darkened and rolled upward to a great height and spread out like an immense black thunderhead until the heavens along the horison assumed a forbidding look. Yet the increased violence of the flood had carried everything before it. No one disputed its rights to the streets, and it overturned fences innumerable and sadly crippling the telegraph and top telephone service.

The Western Union's one hundred and fifty six Angelinia Agathia lines were all down.From Undandon the flood continued its progress across Ward Calverinia a city but dimin diminished greatly from there, and the flood reached the greatest depth and speed between Schlesdertown and outside of town city.

Perhaps the world is not always so bad or so hard hearted as many have said it was or so heartless and so indifferent as many of the so called pessimists would have us all believe. Of course in most ordinary conditions when as we say nothing unusual happens any where all men and women of any nation no matter what kind it be have enough to do in attending to their own affairs, and of cour e also expecting others to so do the same and consequently they do not pay very much attention to what is going on around them, but when their hearts are really touched because of some unusually severe disaster they drop everything and rush to the rescue of those afflicted.

So it was was in the case of flood stricken Calverinia. The catastrophe in this part of Calvarinia indeed served to bring most consc conspicuously into notice the best and worse sides of human nature which as we ourselves know is always the result of all appalling disasters no matter where they happen to occur.

The people of the afflicted cities and towns who survived were suddenly overwhelmed by the almost unpred unprecedented fury of the big flood al elements and therefore were rendered absolutely helpless. Hundreds of thousands were killed, and many were injured or frozen to death. All of the survivors no matter how great their numbers lost their homes and places of business. They were suffering with hunger and menaced with great fires and pestilence. All of any sect were brought down to a common level by dangers and horrors of every description death in its most awful forms and an outlook of terrible uncertainity.

And just to say in the midst of all this ruin and suffering because it was war time they were harrassed by disguised Glandelinian thugs thieves and ghouls, who looted or burned property, assaulted and killed women who resisted them and despoiled and disfigured the dead in a shockingly savage manner to secure rings and other jewles to use for or obtain more; and provisions for their efforts to carry on the war against the Abbieannian states.

Devoid of any feeling of the slightest sympathy whatever whatever having not even the slightest pity seized upon this awful disaster caused by their own comrades as an opportunity to enrich themselves for the support of a very wicked cause. As soon however as the christian armies moved up and the aurthot aurthorities could recover from the first shock of the awful disaster the cities were placed under strick martial law and the c soldiers patrolling the streets of the cities certainly did not hesitate in the least to kill or hang every one of the disguised Glandelinian Vandals caught in the commission of his infamious work. Public opinion sustained this prompt style of punishment. It was a species of Abbieannian lynching to which no objection whatever was ever raised, not especially for Glandelinian Ghouls and vandals.

But the disaster also brought into prominence the great and strong passion of human passion. The Glandelinian armies close by taking advantage of the fact that the whole region swept by flood was cut off from bridge and rail communication conspired to secure control of the transportation by either rail and water, with the purpose rail and water with the purpose to prevent relief reaching the stricken people who survived the disasterNever among an enemy in war was a more inhuman purpose organized. Millions of dollars worth of fresh fo provisions for the stricken were seized by the raiders as fas fast as they came and ruined, the enemy not even leaving a few canned and dried articles which were u available for food, and therefore the national armies had to take a hand. Emperor Vivian and his generals proved themselves equal to the emergency, and by sending large troops of soldiers with every food train or provisitn train prevented the confiscation of the food supply, reduced the number of food trains that were wrecked, and capturing the would be raiders shot them without mercy on the spot as ghouls, and compelled the Glandelinian army to move off about thirty miles from Schloesertown, the rebel army being much too small to engage the christian army in a battle.

This of course was the dark side of human nature, but to begin with the picture has its bright side also. The news of the awful disaster had hardly appeared in public print before tents and hundreds of millions of helping hands were busy sending relief. The Chief Executives of the Abbeannian nation, the Governors of every state, and the Mayor of every city, gave what they could and issued their appeals to the people whose sympathies were already aroused, and whose hearts and hands were in enlisted generously and most enthusiastically in the work of relief while their indignation against the enemy was at white heat.

Many of the far off countries sent their offerings, every city and town in the world where Abbieannian and other people lived contributed heavily, unusually, and crowned heads hastened to cable sympathies and lend aid in every way possible. and withhout without delay and without delay of any kind whatever instantly and spontaneously charity began its work and in a up surprising way too.

And in the presence of such a dreadful visitation involving suffering and wholesale death the brotherhood of man everywhere asserted itself and all things else were forgotten. Only the nigher and most nobler attributes of h u human nature happened to assert itself. Private persons, business houses, great corporations municipal, state and national Imperial government vied with eac other as they did when fire swept co over Calverine and the flood overwhelmed Jennie Vivian way before the war in sending relief to the flood ruined people of southern Californinia. Day by day heavily guarded trains sped to the stricken people and trains from every part of the Abbieannian country, from north, or south, loaded with supplies of every kind and fuel, and the telegraph also carried orders for immense sums of money money testifying to the magnitude of the relief work and to the higher and nobler instincts of human nature when it is appealed to by the claims of humanity.

The Glandelinian ghouls were by this i time very small in number so many having been shot down. The generous sympathizers could have been counted by the hundreds of millions. The orphans throughout the land were moved by the sufferings of the flood victims and contributed as much money as it was in their power. Are not orphans therefore intitled to a little consideration too. The Scope and rapidity of the flood relief work all co overthe Abbieannian Country indeed afforded a spectacle at once very gratifying and noteworthy. Many trains laden with foods and comforts for the millions of sufferers were still being rushed toward the stricken region from every part of the Abbi annian nation, and the aurthorities urged the christian generals in charge of various armies to strike at the enemy harder than they had ever done before.

From Angeline junction City to Angelinia Agathia every city or town regardless of size contributed its a quota to the generous cause for the afflicted and for the support of the armies also. Even from across the deep and wide Mic-whirthian Seas, the Irish Hickencile, the Blomlinia, the Protestintia nations and others send funds also some of these nations being on the list of $ 100,000,000 each. Therefore within a week after the awful disaster, the cities of Big girl Knool and others, and Emperior Vivian were in possession of a magnificent relief relief find fund that went far beyond alleviating the physicials sufferings of the homeless millions throughout tnt part of the land.

This may be called th Social phenomennon phenomenon that maywell give pause to all critics who are always wont to inveigh against all commercial and industrial agei Since the war began these exhibitions of such generous givings are not of any rare occurance in this powerful Abbieannian Country. for a long series of them can be compiled within the period between the seige of Pullaway and this latter disaster. Singly and in the facts they should be a most striking negative to any rebuke and th increased willingness of the people of the Abbieannian country to help stricken communities like Schloesertown and other places, is due more to the fa reason that Abbieannia was a great Catholic Christian nation more than anything else and the railroads and telegraph lines helped a great deal in this on the line of transportation.

Abbieannian Charity is the child of modern conditions, and the fact according to this story of Abbieain Abbieannia being such a righteous nation alone makes wide spr a spread relief possible. And if the telegraph and the news papers had not placed the poc pictures of the sad misfortunes of the towns and cities in the path of this flood at once before the eyes of not only the Abbieannians but the other people of other nations as well, from ocean to ocean there could have been no such national impulse of generousity because of the fact no one would have known quick enough anything about it.

During theseige of Pullaway, however in southern Angelinia state the battle seige and fire, as we all know brought calamity to many of the inhabatants who fled for safty, but because all communications had been cut off by the enemy it was more than three months before the news reached even any part of the Abbieania country and another two months elasped before relief could be carried to the suffere sufferers and support to the victorious christian armies. Therefore the impulse to give cannot thrive under such circumstances. As we all know there have been tender hearts in all ages but only in our time have the means of quick communication in our own United states have made human sympathy effective across continents, because there is no defouled enemy to ruin everything where ever he goes. The railroads, the telegraph and the news paper have always lent lengthened the army of arms of charity quite as much as that of business. The Schloesertown incident is also a fine example of the way in which these agencies bind all sections of the war stricken Abbieannian nation together(leaving out the states of Glandelinia) in increasing solidarity.

The great value of the United Abbieanian armies under the commands of Emperor Vivian and his generals, and the remarkable correctness of all the generals and h their h officers and signal scouts in their ob e observations, and of the full knowledge of the Geography and other matters, all things considered(if considered fully of other matters of military affairs as well) was demonstrated, by the events preceeding the beginning of the war, and succeeding the big flood and even other great disasters that have happened way before tymt... that...These officiers, and their helpers, counting also thvir many boy and girl scouts, and all the large scouting parties, h al ays gave warnings of the directed advances and plans of the enemy, day before a glandelinianarmy even was anywhere in sight. By quick and long distance scouting these men anticipatedthe course of the advance o of any glandelinian army, from the starting point, untill it reached a point to come face to face with some christian army which would i mediately se step in its path, as hitherto seen. ometimes these glandelinian armies cutting off all communic itions so as their intentions so would not be known have made such things known as deflections as human skill could have foreseen. ut the Christian generals would never be caught napping however.

They all know their geographies, can study maps and find things on the most difficult map blind folded and therefore would send out signals both for the path of the expected advance of the enemy, and many point points elsewhere, and when the enemy was discovered the nearest christian army would u turn its attentich to it, and not only warn the people of towns in the foes path of the foes coming, but would also make a hasty march and extend their columns all along the stretch of country, thus preventing the enemy from going around in another direction, and preventing the enemy from coming upon the rear...

Of course sometimes the military observers could not know what terrible fury and dnerm a battle would have once one started on this occasion. perhaps still greater acc rancy in forcasting to towns the advance of an enemy was displayed by the d scouts in the the warnings given out to other armies to hasten their advance to the aid of the towns in danger Even the armies of under mperor Vivian kept track of the motions of the flood as it swept through Schlosdertown and other places, and gave timely warning to towns far off that they might be reached by it how it would move across many farm lands, and thence across and into the Aronburgs Run River. The military scouts further predicted by wireless and telegraph the furious strength of the rushing waters, the maximum velocity of speed of wreckage and houses floating by, the change caused by the reaction of the flood, and the fall of the inundation to the ninety of a depth. Every river captian has ample warning given him but it was believed they did not heed it, or could not make preparations against the fearful flood..

In times gone by it was the habit o to jeer at Old Probabilities and when ever a predo prediction failed of verification to condemn many of the Christian signal stations as most unreliable, and not worth the expense of their building and maintanance. During this war however the operators of these signal stations have gained greatly in sk skill and their record is now of a character of which its military officials have every reason to be proud proud of and which should amply justi fy justify whatever expense it may entail by its great saving of life and property, and of keeping the enemy away from the towns a as much as possible whether a christian army is worsted in a conflict or not.

The appalling nature of the wreck to which Schlosdertown and her two sister cities were reduced naturally led to some consideraole talk among the surviving inhabitants of abandoning the three cities altogether untill the war was entire over, or of either removing or rebuilding the cities on towns somewhere on higher ground and hill sides, and have them strongly guarded from fur future disasters. An army officer concluded his report to the Headquar Headquarters of the Abbieannian Government at Angelinia Agathia by expressing the opinion that the three big cities like all the surrounding towns were destroyed by be,ond the ability to recover, andeven the Mic Mic- ollester and Pendora railroad was said to be in favor of leaving the wreckage to the sport of the enemy and the flood, and heading a movement to rebuilding the cities on the higher embankments of the Aronburg's Run, a plac place where floods were utterly impossible.

It is natural on account of future flood perils and of the dangers of meeting with the fierce landelinians that the non-combatants of these places should consider the advisability of abandoning such perilous sites, especially during such a war there can never be any complete security against a disaster like that of November the thirteenth. But it was yet safe to say that the three big cities and even the towns as far as possible will be rebuilt on the same spotsMankind of the Abbieannian nation is not wont to desert any spot of the earths surface because of a sudden and rare disaster caused by an inhuman enemy who hates christians because they ate the Good Lord who died on the very Cross for them.

Jennie ivian was not abandoned because of the disasterous flood that destroyed so much property three years before the war began. And recent disasters of the war already predicted in earlier parts of the book have not induced the survivors to abandon a single city. hey uphold the city and def, the enemy. When 100,000 men and women and children lost their homes in the burning of Fullawa y during the early part of the war it did not change the site of the city, nor have the still more greater disasters of forest fires along the Glic- ollester pan River ever caused the survivors to change their habitation because their homes were in great.. danger.slet history itself will show ,uropeans and Americans to be quite as tenacious in this regard as the Abbieannians. The people around Angeline junction continue to cultivate the farms in spite of all past war disasters and the inhabitan inhabitants of other towns and villiages were not disheartened, when the enemy try to force the very nature to commit fearful ravages to win their wicked purposes.

The leading business men of the three cities emphasized a point when they began to talk of rebuilding which had escaped general attention untill that time. They were exceedingly anxious however that commercial bodies, river steamship owners, brokers and those interested in the commerce of the cities should be as considerate as it is possible in their treatement of the citi s that is to say there should be liberality in thecommercial relations. These men urged that the full extent of the war made calamity should be quickly taken into account when adjustments of contracts finally takes place, and in all business arrangements untill the cities could reg regain their footing. And the business men of own city hoped that the enemy would not have the chance to interfere with their business connections, and that their business connections would apply a like spirit to all commerce affected by the great explosion, fire and flood..

They were not to be disappointed, as the results soon showed.The cities had home however with the coming of an early winter just passed most of the business season season. There had been more than three or six thousand river ships of all kinds under sailing contracts, with all ports down to the mouth of the river, for the months of november till December just before the ice floes closes up the river navigation. All of these ships were when the flood came scattered all over the land for miles and even thrust into streets of cities and owns only slightly hit by the flood. even a temporary paralysis of sixty days meant much loss and the derangement of many contracts, but as many of these ships were found not much damaged there was hopes of them being brought back to their proper owners and places and repaired. u ,ut this would take titanic labor as many of the river crafts found lodged on flood swept farms and other places were ornormous ships, almost like ocean going liners and the like...

It therefore was a time which called for the generous policy not for strick or strict enforcement of the letter of agreements of reclaiming these ships. oan jose city and the two others only asked what their business men thought was just that thereby this tremendous and cr freakish shock to river commerce might be relieved. When the time came these cities found they had not asked too much as they recieved even more consideration and sympathy and provisions than ever expected or wished for.

Representives of the many Abbieannian Railroad systems which connected C Schloe dertown with other big places all over Abbieannia and her sates before the occurance of the tremendous war disaster agreed in declaring in a meeting held at Angelinia Agathia that their residents would rebuild on the same site in spite of the terrible exp r experiences, and the dams and leves s of lake Belicia repaired or rebuilded, and full means made to prevent blasting.in the future of such dikes impossible even if the war lasted a thousand years.They believed that the three cities injured financially though her s their surviving citizens had been would be rebuilt by the citizens without the aid of outside capital.

John Belden ,rpe, hairman of the Board of Directors of the Bendon-glic-hollester and Pendora ailroad a said he felt certain hat the cities would be rebuilt and the towns also.The new energy and courage of the survivig people and the determinat ion displayed by them is what is expected in any Abbieannian cityso full of Abbieannian pluck. Though stunned and severely rucked and prso prostrated under the first most fatal disaster that had ever overtaxen an Abbieannian community, which was worse than any of the big Typhoons which swept so many towns in Abbieannia to ruin, Schlosdertown, her sister s cities, and the villiages and towns took only a few da sto regain their breath.

It has simply reasserted the same indomitable courage and will power by which us ,mericans in time far past built up a great nation of our very own where there was an impenetrable wilderness about a litti v little over a century ago.

Everywhere in the streets of these three cities could be now observed the terse motto which was" CLEAN UP IMMEDIATELY. PUT THE PRISONERS TO WORK.""

Behind i behind its grim rumor there was a stern determination that was one of the proudest attributes of th the Abbieannian race., and therefore there was no re reason why even a greater city shouldnot speedily rise on the site of the present ruins in spite of the enemy. hereport unof one of the military officers of General Vivians army that the three cities were absolutely ruined beyond the slightest hope of recovern and the suggestions of many other persons that the three ca cities be rebuilt on other sites found no sympathy among the surviving citizens. The cities will surely be rebuilt upon their former sites.

Carpenters, masons, and artisans were constantly being called for fur scores of thousands, even many in the army were allowed off on long furloughs and therefore with the generous aid contributed by people all over the Abbiesannian Country it was expected that there would soon be a rapid transformation. The three cities have turned their backs behind them, and therefore have their faces set toward the very future.Since the danger of such floods cannot be removedno look as the enemy will make no, it was to be hoped the builders and masons and engineers, will begin a new era of security by raising what will be called " War Flood dikes" around the cities. Good strong dikes would absolutely decrease the danger from floods. It would also be wise to construct the foundations of all buildings whether large or small of stone to a height above the level reached by the recent inundation, and in resolving to defy an untward fate at the hand of an inhuman foe, these three cities should begin by adopting all practical means for defying not elements let loose but also thouse caused by storms.

Even though the expense and delay will be greater, it however will surely pay to givethe new buildings all possible safe guards on of solidit ally. The three cities surely will be rebuilt, for its inhabitants are reasoning that these cities have existed for three quarters of a century in comparative safty, and that no no such flood has ever occured even at the high tide of the Aronburg's Run river by mere accident, and that such a disaster caused by the enemy is not likely to occur again as far as the effort s of the military who will prevent it are concerned. The same commercial advan advantages that first tempted country settlers to the river and that made these three cities some of the most thriving on the ri e river coast are still apparent.

Even all the men who own real estate in the ruined cities will not abandon them even though the improvements thereon have been even iped wiped out. They even know that if they did abandon it, others would be thousands of others to take it-- risks and all--and rebuild the cities. Not even the Federal government hesitated about rebuilding its structures on so precarious a site, and therefore why should private interests abandon a city even for so terrible a disaster as that of this flood?

The city of Joan with a stretch of fourthy eight miles in length and ten in width was situated on a rise of ground that as about six feet or more above the level of the Great Aronburg's Run River. Around it after the bursting of the levees of Lake Sellcia because of the explosion there had been an unbroken sea of sweepig sweeping waters for nearly two hundred miles,, or more.. and yet not over fourthy miles away south of or north of it rather was the originating of the big flood. a flood that came from the waters of Lake Sellcia, and swept southward with a fury that nothing could stnt withstand. On account of the situation of th the land the land this flood described a sort of parabola with the westward arch sweeping away the cities of Schloedertown and Sperryville, after which the sweep of the big inundation was southeastward, finally spreadi ng out in a vast sea of roaring waters and then freezing over after it spread far enough to lessen a great deal in the speedof the current and depth.

go far as I can recal n any probabilities this might have been the first big flood of the war so far. Yet in the tewtwelve hours time since the beginni beginning between twelve of clock noon of the Thirteenth, and about the same time the next day, fifty seven big towns and country villiages had been swept off their revery foundations, and it may be believed that most of the wreckage of these places were swept down the river where the river overflowing because of the flood pouring into it overspread the country, bursting its own dikes or levees and scattering wreckage and shipping in all directions. The flood spreadig ever deeper on the 18th of November came into the streets of Kunr , ormman city and wrought considerab considerable havoc as it spread all the way to Fort Chamberlane. The flood then reache reached as far as Big Girl Knool on the 16th curving again toward The rear of Chamberlane. It was in this stage of the flood that Chamberlane, Big Girl Knool and Ruse, as well as the cities of Tp Topsy and others reported so many dead bodies brought into the streets, and where so many villiages and towns were destroyed beyond recovery. With this unusual kind of a flood only two conditions really v favor their occurance for the purpose of the Nat National Engineers make it so. They place under Government orders high embankments of solid construction at all points where rivers are won't to overflow and they are made so h g that they are usally thirty feet high a ove the level of the rivers even at high waters.

These constructions also are expensive but such as Nation as Abbia Abbiesannia is the government will spare no expense to make river towns and villiages saf from high waters in tim of melting snows of winter and storm of spring and summer. Therefore only two causes could bel bring on such a flood in this country. Accidental occurance according to the construction according to this story is absolutely impossible. The flood therefore must be of a original design such as this one already written. The most dangerous of all Rivers running through the lands of Calverinia without these dikes would be the Aronburgs Run.

When the flood occured the war waters from that immense lake poured on like a tidal wave from the Oceanafter an earthquake took the path straight toward the Mighty Aronburgs Run and instead of working around the river as was expected because of the nature of the landit passed far north southward and poured clear over the dikes of the river pouring such torrents of water in the half frozen stream that the river itself became a flo flood high enough to remain a way above the height od the dikes. It was this very condition exactly which diverted the flood to the Southward and made theriver overflow the land for the first time in a hundred years since the powerful and safe guarding dikes were constructed. The origin of such a flood therefore can be either by some mysterious undermining caused by a colvulsion of the earth, or by blasting.

The origin of this big flood was not fully settled. The prisoners who were arrested on the charge of causing the busting stoutly denied that they had anything to do with it, and also their statement that an earthquake caused it and not an explosion yet is enough to bring some good evidence against them because of the fact that there was more than ten big explosions the noise and concussion of which leveled thousands of buildig in the three cities, set Schouldertown on fire and caused the overwhelming torrent. The accompanying phenomena of such blasting as which was heard at such a long distance however was significant to the most casual observer. The first sign of the concussion before the roar of the blast was heard was a long strange swell on the river which tossed the floating ice slabs up and down in a peculiar fashion and with a loud rattling roar. A faint rish of air followed, windows went out in every place in the three cities as stated at the beginning of the disaster, houses fell in or were wrecked, and in Schloedertown big fires broke out. Great clouds resembling that of a big volcanic eruption rose high in the air and the noise even at that great distance was enough to stun any one, and make a queer effect on the ear drums.

Then came the terrible flood half an hour afterward, the tremendous roar of the approaching wall of waters, the tarranting of broken and sma bed up houses against each other, and the drowning spray which seemed to be dashed from mighty tanks with the force of hundreds of thousands of titans. No disaster possible in this war so far presented all the terrors that accompany s ch a flood. Fires Fires are thrilling enough b t they give you some chance even though the property may be entirely wiped o t. But afloods climax can be reached in a moment and yet grows and grows, and when it reaches a stage like the previous one nothing except mountain ranges can withstand it.

It was this terrible flood that so nearly took these three big Calverinian cities clear off the map. The bi beginning of the flood frightened the city. Now the fate of the three cities and the many towns is keeping the whole country of Abbiesannia absolutely uneasy for it isgreatly feared the enemy will start another such disaster. and yet it is now suggested of rebuilding the cities, and this p, plan is being met with the disapprobation of many of the sympathising Abolesannians who are stillgiving freely to the stricken people. But the abandonment of . these cities cannot be without a serious struggle. For ever since these three cities had been constructed and the levees of big Lake Sellcia had been constructed and those of the rivers before no flood had come causing death and destruction, and therefore the people declared it could never happen unless by earthquake or by design. Yet they gave no consisted reason for their belief for they said the condition proves it, the cities were nearly a century old, the rivers were as safe as when the levees were first construc ed, the waters still remained in their proper places. Their belief spread therefore and the three beautiful cities grew, and developed as no old settler has ever hopeu to see them grow. This settler stock of these three cities were of queer characteristics however.

The settlement of these cities were a sort of ---well--we may say of a queer likeness of a Captian Streeter origin. The only variation was that the city ones who founded them bought the lands from the Abbiesannian governments and as the scenery around there was an unusually beautiful established a town site in three special places to attract immigration. Each city as they grew were about thirty thirty miles away. A beautiful river wound its way past the three cities in these magnificent bends and all around was a beautiful thrifty agricultural country that made great crops for all farmers who owned them.

So the settlers who started these cities waited patiently. They held to their lots and traded with every stranger who came their way. As the cities grew the trade grew too and in this way they developed in growing properties, and as a result the three cities were the most most magnificent cities in that part of Calverinia. They had beautiful river wharves where all kinds of river craft came with supplies, or were loaded. When for these cities just before the war came a new element had been attracted but which increased the conditions of the three cities. They out of their own pocket book and with the aid of generous friends made beautiful expensive changes, and these new immigrants were looked upon by the conservatism of the three cities as a good element, who improved the cities a good deal, making artesian water in mains, or making rain water cisterns above ground out of r wers, but with covers on so they are closed down after a rain is passed so that no insects got in. Then new waterworks, eletric light works and other great buildings were constructed, new mills had been established under great difficulties but with the aid of the new comers, and then affairs had come to pass,when well we,ll say the new Sperryvillian and the old found a great union together!

" This town is much more improved than it used to be " Said the conservative

" As a matter of fact" the young business man would say" Sperryville is the best of southern Calverinian cities I have lived in. In fact it is no city, it is a heaven."

This was the situation slightly more increased by time, when big bridges were built over the beautiful river, when the Abbiesannian government appropriated $666,783,999 for the deeping deepening of the river harbors of the cities, and when export trade of all kinds from the three approx has simply the mark of $300,000,000 annually. $300,000,000. annually.

And this absolutely was the three beautiful Calverinian cities now in ruins. Yet in rebuilding these cities it may be suggested that the river shore be dredged of sand and the warves raised a little to a level of fifteen feet more above flood tide.The plan is all right in every sense and it is also contended that the value of these cities as a excellent river ports more than justify the costs. However the people of these three cities may decide they have to depart from several notable instances of water swept cities in rebuilding.In addition to the abandonment of the totally wrecked or swept towns elsewhere are the stories of long Long Port on the North Bend of the river and of Marie Bernamme City a great River fishing resort right at the best and deepest part of the stream.. Long port was overwhelmed entirely, and every one in that little place lost their lives in the flood. The description of the flood that swept upon this town is quite unusual/-

It was in the afternoon when a blizzard seemed to grow more fiercely than ever a big blizzard ever did before, when there was noticed by observers in the river a sudden change that touched the quick silver smoothness of the waters-- the swaying shadow of a motion among the big ice floes. first the far distant part of the long stream southward to northward appeared to slightly rock the ice floes, the line darkened and approached a monsterous wrinkle, an immense immeasureable fold of green water moving swiftly as a cloud shadow pursued by sun light. but however it had looked formidable by startling contrast with the previous placidity of the open waters between the ice floes, it was scarcely a foot high, and it gradually lessened in. in seize as it also as it continued on. Swift in pursuit another followed, and a third, a feebler fourth, then the river waters only swayed a little and became still again.

The observers knew that something unusual had occured somewhere. If it had not been snowing so hard at this time probably they could have seen a large cloud rise p and arch the sky with a single span of black cottony color. And the cloud rose and spread, and formed out like a cloud bridge . Then to the starr startled inhabatants of the little town the waters of the river began to rise even nigh to the very top of the levees, the waters overflowed, and then suddenly from the north the main torrent came down. Houses began to rock and sway and move from their foundations, and float away,trees floated down on the flood. And still the flood grew fiercer and deeper and wider with every passing hour. So the waters rose magnificently, hurling along with it great jams of debris and floating human beings, heaping up smoking and frozen wreckage against its shores, uptorning the woods, roaring other rivers, changing river courses to roaring wat wastes of wreckage filled waters. Before Big Girl Knool the waters of the mile broad Aronburge Ran rose sixteen feet above its highest flood mark. One hundred and ten miles away "Lorianna trembled at the wavering rise of the river. Other lakes received the flood and then strove to burst their very boundaries. All kinds of river craft went over the land, or tugged wildly at their cables shivering like tethered creatures that hear by night the approaching howl of destroyers..

And swift in the wake of the disaster the Glandelinian wreckers come, the ghoulish scavengers of the dead, savage Glandelinian skimmers of the brutal war for there is plunder for all-----birds and soldiers.

The three cities however were built upon the banks of one of the fairest rivers in the Calverinian State.According to Professor Wil Whilliam De orne of the Abbiesannian war Relief bureau at Angelinia Agathia not only was Schloedertown built most securely upon the river banks but other cities on the banks of other rivers and also atthe sea and lake coasts lying at tide, and the only reason just now is it is believed they could be subjected to danger was because of the same cause as whatstarted this ernormous flood. Nearly more than a hundred small villiages and towns were in the path of this flood and wiped out or destroyed.

The great inundation struck almost anywhere without hardly any warning from the southern Bend of Aronburge river on down the stream, around the curve of the river and anywhere within the great arch described by the river up to big Girl Knool CityAt the worse this flood was probably about a little over a hundred miles wide, and more than two hundred in length, and at the greatest had a depth of more than a hundred feet, and it was in this vortex of the flood that the land was laid in waste and it is this fact that will lead more strongly than ever to the rebuilding of the three cities, that only such disasters came from design, and that the government promished strictly that with their aid it will never happen again. And with the three cities having an export business of more than three hundred million dollars annually,(each city singly) the great nation in spite of the war will bring all the pressure possible to bear upon the maintenance of the three river ports..

In any one of these three cities there are many kinds of men and even women. may the whole population that will not be driven from their homes just because the wicked Glandelinians let loose upon them an unusual flood of great magnitude.And they know too that there are five hundred miles of Calverinian lands on which the same kind of a flood may swarm over without touching any city any place, and both conservatiivism and commercialism wh will take the risk in the great war that all the other Calverinian cities and towns are taking.

And at the same time there are those who see any one of these three cities as also a great commercial center, cities which without the State of Calverinia would be paralized for many want of proper supplies as long as the war is to continue.But yet as far as the war may be concerned it might be probable that these cities can never grown grow as they have grown in the past, but again in spite of everything it may be the home of people whose fortunes are not tied up in the disasterous flood/

Ever since the beginning of the war any Calverinian city or town has had to contend withthe fears of the enemy and what the Glandelinian armies may do.But for the three cities years and years will not wipe out the black record for the enemy for all the big disasters they have caused. Hundreds of thousands have left every city or town at the approach of the enemy as a place of residence untill the foe was driven off, thousands of children at many places have been killed by the Glandelinian armies, or cremated by the Glandelinians alive in hot sand , or buried with weights on them while alive in quick sands or in the depths of waters or the treacherious sea. A death rate of many thousands of children at Bromley drove the citys population almostfrom the map of Calverinia.

One million five hundreds of thousands of the three million population of the three cities combined must have its influen ce upon the living survivors.

For with the assurance of the Abbiesannian war bureau, it is recognized that in natural phenonena there are certain cycle py periods in which extremes of disasters caused by the enemy are repated upon Natures great laboratory.. And observation has put this period of repetion of every v few weeks. And according to this in the case of so many war disasters the a range of maximum and minimum will be within many unex e unexpected periods. Without question Schloedertown and her sisye sister towns were in fir a certain kind of disaster as long as any Glandelinian army was close by for there is never no telling what an enemy army might do and therefore there was no escape when once the Glandelinian engineers let go the flood. And the situation of the land made it impossible for any flood to miss the three cities, for the three were actually in the track of the worse fury of the flood which on account of the course it took failed to be deflected from its course or allowed to spread at so as to lessen its depth when reaching the cities. Therefore the flood continuing its depth kept to its southward course, and struck the three cities with the same force, and in this flood a new maximum of disasters see seemed to have been established because so far it was the f worse of disasters of the war, and yet some place else may look for another such disaster within any unexpected time for it is well underted understood that the enemy will do the worse thing any one can imagine to accomplish the end they desire.

As as a mm matter of efact indeed the average of the period of disasters at some points and between the reoccurance of these maximum disasters had been so very frequent that people of every town or villiage tremble when they hear of the near approach of a Glandelinian army,

James Daniel Collier one of the many chief engineers of the river levees and dikes a in marking the route ofthe flood from its starting point and to where it spread far out and finally froze over is also an observer of all period natural disasters caus caused by the Glandelinians and his throey holds in great measure with the observations of the Abbiesannian war Department..

" It is a general proposition" said Mr Collier" it just means this much much- suppose that the Glandelinian would make a big floodat Angelinia Agathia on well about next month.Well probably within a period of less than another month we may expect another disaster of the same kind elsewhere. It may not be in Angelinia Agathia itself, the disaster may occur about a hndred miles away, or on any side of her without touching her at the least. But in the same general territory and unexpectedly it may be repeated.

Suppose a general terrible battle developes it's repeat make be looked for at some other period. go with extremes of losses by fire, and all the other horrors that this great War causesThey too have their cycles, and any period may cover most of them at any time. But in the case of Schloedertown one of the wars first greatest of disasters was already experienced,. Those facts term or tend to confirm Mr Colliers statements. Schloedertowns destruction and that ofso many other towns similarly situated had been expected right along, for there was believed to be no escape, shou should the enemy intend to let go a levee of the river of or do any damage to the dike of the big lake. General Hindernine himself said;

" Every town and villiage situated in the broad valley of the Arenburgs Run was really destined to a destructive flood. Should an enemy blow up a levee or a like a rush of waters would ensue that nothing could stop. Schloedertown, Joan city Sperryville, and all the others were doomed. Many of them, scores suffered in variousdegress in proportion as they approximate the river level. Thefurther big cities like Ophelia, Chamberlane, Big Girl Knool, Lucillie Aikeen, and Glorieania suffered less becaues of the quick spreading of the flood in another direction, but the destruction of h scores of smaller towns and villiages all around them was the grandest horror. The flood began northeast of Schloedertown the first place hit and extended tward Sperryville as it tried to spread, and coming this way the flood made a rebound metting meeting the other section which send each flood rebounding back and forth like a crazy sea wave, and therefore the shock upon the two cities hit first was terrible e incurring great loss of life extending from Joan city all the way down tward Big Girl Knool but the conformation of the river shores further south made this great flood far less destructive down there than at the upper part of the land.

Nevertheless it was very calamitous to the farmlands and all towns and villiages Little Girl Knool suffered severely along the river front, but no loss of life was reported among its inhabatants, though at first the great numbers of bodies brought there bythe waters from other places gave the inhabatants a great scare. The destruction of each place which was anticipated was between twenty four minutes minutes time for each, being sudden and brief for many--all within an Hour. Starting from Lake Solicia as already described, the flood rushed southwestward first, and then southeastward like a mighty tidal wave. All points was badly assailed by the torrent.

The destruction of the city of Agowe was total with the loss of twenty thousand li lives, in fact the entire population was wiped out; The lower streets of Big Girl Knool was flooded badly for six days, and Veracruse Street reporting a depth o six p feet at the highest, basement floors and other portions of buildings suffering severely, but Central Street had only a foot of water which froze over when the flood rose no higher there. Tampicio and Matamoras Street also suffered severely; street cars could not run for the depth of water, and street tunnels were flooded to the ceiling itself, and along the river wharves property was property was in a dangerous condition. All over for the full stretch it had been an awful calamity whither it wiped out lives or not in the other places. Big Girl Knool only had the lessener part of the flood, but Little Girl Knool Little Girl Knool at her outskirts was struck with destructive force.

Mobile Street suffered severely in Big Girl Knool and fire companies by hundreds worked to pump out flooded basements, Ponce and Pensacol streets suffered somewhat less. Seventy towns were said to have been entirely submerged and swept away. St Alb was severely shaken, and Chamberlane was only half submerged though from the strength of its buildings it did not suffer severely. Everywhere out side of the Girl Knool cities the damage was great, for cities and towns were destroyed entirey that could not even be accounted for. A town near Rosa was reported wiped out, Rosa suffered about as much as Chamberlane Ophelia and Janit suffered thereffects of the flood to a considerable extent but not disasterioucly, the outskirts of the city of Jessipia suffered especially in the more lower sections but not much and after the flood froze over people went out skating by thousands, but Kornman town and Aderinn suffered more severely on their water front, for their large buildings were flooded in basements and on first floor but none of the buildings were injured and no bodies were reported from found here.

Arenburg city, and Cape Ann were devastated with their entir population wiped out, but Long Run was protected by the high rise of ground from any severe disaster. The rising waters affected Beppo Lennin, and Corrazon, and also Big Betty Rose the latter being the most unfortunate of the smaller cities everything on its outskirts and lower grounds being overwhelmed. but no loss of life occured though property loss was immense.

It's post office reported fourteen feet of water around it, and all the water margins of the city suffered.....Untill the fury of the flood wrecked its vengeance upon the fair city of Schloedertown and vented its wrath upon the unoffending and helpless population, the awful disaster striking Sperryville, was the most frightfu of the calamity second only to that of Schloedertown. Sperryville itself was struck by the flood almost exactly like Johnstown at Pa. and also almost literally wiped from the face of the earth, the suddeness of the flood which created the havo preventing the escape of any one who were unfortunate enough to be caught in its path. Unlike the part of the catastrophe at Scho Schloedertown and Joan city, the same flood when it struck Sperryville poured its terrible rushing torrents of waters and wreckage from towns and cities without the slightest warni warning andthe slaughter was accomplished even within the space of a very few minutes despite the size of the city and the greatness of the pu population. The majority of the victims were drowned or killed in their falling houses, or dashed to pieces amid the swirling crashing wreckage before they even had time to realize realize the horror of it all. At Schloedertown and Joan city the situation though not so swift was more horrible. For the people f not only knew for hours but for four days and nights before the angry wreckage laden waters submerged the houses and the resistless current tore the business buildings and residences to pieces what their fate was to be.

They looked death squarely in the face, for many hours day and night, exposed to extremes of winter temperature of fi and fierce blizzards and cold waves, suffering all the torments and terrors f diro certainity could inflict, their knowledge that they were absolutely powerless and beyond the reach of aid adding greatly to their agonies.. At Sperryville and many other towns suddenly torn away by the floo flood, death was merciful, he was cruel to his prey at Schloedertown and Joan city, and delighted in the tortures he was able to impose before he placed his icy hand upon them, and bade them come.

Perhaps the only parellel of the flood was the destruction of Joan city which was nearly equally as bad. The frightened inhabatants could see the waters risi n rising higher and higher but even then many of them were m r mercifully drowned bythe tremendous swirling waters which soon enveloped them, and completely covered their homes. They too stand for hours, with the black ness of each succeeding night around them, listening to the noise of rushing waters, the roar of falling houses, the crash of wreckage banging against their houses and hear thei their death knell long before they were compelled to undergo the pain of an awful death. Even many were caught as they sought af safty in the upper stories of the houses and drowned while endeavoring to get beyond the reach of the waters, but most of them could not move and act in accordance with their u impulses which would prompt them to make a fligh flight for life, and only few of them were able to struggle desperately before death overwhelmed them.

But it was much worse at Schloedertown. The men women and children were at not even permitted the small but precious boon of falling while battling with the dreadful flood, they were caugn caught and imprisoned, even as those who were done to death during the time when the " Reign of Terer Terror started in Norma Catherine and on the way to be massacred were as it might be saidcompelled to bear the very cross upon which they were to be impaled. If this could be a true account there would be no record whatever of such a long drawn out agony as that which the doveted people of both Schloedertown and Joan city endured during the four or five days and nights intervening between the beginning of the most disasterous of floods, and the final imposition of the death penalty.

Fathers by countless numbers saw their wives and babes crushed by the wreckage flung aloft and around by the fury of the torrent without even the slightest chance to rescue them, or saw them fished out of the water and placed on rafs rafts only to freeze to death by being exposed while soaking wet to the extremely cold temperatures, wives saw their husbands and children torn from them and swept from their sight for ever, children saw their parents disappear in the murkey murkey turbid waters of the flood.

Countless men saw the dead faces of their loved ones they would have deemed it a joy to save at the risk of their own lives as they were borne along upon the bosom of the icy waters. Men invited destruction in their desperate attempt at rescue only to realize how weak and utterly futile was their strength in comparison to the irrestible power of the flood. Men died by thousand despondingly because they could not save those they loved and heretofore protected, and went down in despair a and gloom.

At Sperryville the released waters tore their way through the city with the rush and speed of a great avalanche and enfolded their victims in their merciless embrace, the inhabatants were in tye twinkling of an eye borne from the sunshine of life to the gloom of the valley of the shadow, they may have felt a momentary terror before they succombed, but it was all over in an instant.

At Sperryville the inhabatants were forced to wait for the inevitable, they clung to their brief remaining supports and died probably a thousand deaths before death claims claimed them, they stood upon the brink of eternity and cried in vain for the succor they knew would never come, they prayed for mercy, but there was none. When the waters of the flood rushed upon the spot where all the beautiful city sat in a l it its glory the people first fled to the high places, and yet as the flood creep higher and higher untill it finally over came them. Although it was not not untill the darkness of the first night had long since settled upon them they had known in the very afternoon that Schloedertown was doomed. The flood would not permit them to escape but sundered all communications with every part of Calverinia and then laughed at all their puny efforts at preservation.The death roster in and around Sperryville was fully eighty or more thousands, at Schloedertown the known number of victims was a score less than 300,000. Many died at Schloedertown and Ocean city of whom nothing was ever heard, and there were possiblyscores of thousands engulfed in the flood which all but destroyed the three cities entirely, but at the same time the probabilities are that 500,000 people died at Schloedertown and in the immediate vicinity. Bodies were found embedded in ice for all the miles the flood had spread, and bodies were found in the river and thrown up in cities near the rivers mouth by hundreds many days after the disaster, how many were burned in the many funeral pyres of the wreckage no accurate record could be made.

In one respect the calamity to the three big cities were alike alike, the destruction of probably hundreds of millions of dollars worth of property, but the losses were not so great at Sperryville during these fearful three minus minutes as those occasioned by the beating of the flood waves and windrows of swirling wreckage wreckage which for four days and six hours had Schloedertown and Ocean city at their mercy.

Sperryville was a city of 930,000 teeming with the industry of a big manufacturing town. With not even a warning sound to apprise the inhabatants the flood swept down and engulfed the big city and its inhabatants before they even knew of their danger. The whole city was a mass of debris and dead when the deluge deluge subsided and the wreckage also was scattered all over the land. Schloedertown was a city of nearly 1,140,000 people and even had within its gates thousands of strangers, not only of the other Abbiannian cities, but of fi foriegn countries and therefore the facts that so many telegrams of inquiries from all parts of Abbiannia and from foriegn nations poured into the Mayer's office at Angelinia Agathia in a perfect endless stream for days and days after the flood indicated that scores of hundreds were killed of whom the searchers knew nothing.

But these three cities were not alone in their misery.

The tragedy was enacted similiarly at many other points. Wherever it spread after passing beyond these cities the flood was immeasureable in its very force and fury, and blotted out scores of towns and villiages entirely, wiped out farms of which no one could account for, destroyed forests of trees, and swept away big cattle ranches destroyed thousands of heads of cattle. But at The three big cities the flood destroyed thousands of the finest buildings ever constructed, levelling massive structures to the ground, sweeping away all the smaller and weaker, carried away railroad locomotives as if they were logs of wat wood, even the current held these heavy things above the surface of the water, and swept away even some of the strongest bridges in the country. Of Schloedertown and the two other cities, surpassed all these other smaller towns and villiages in the frightful nature of the disaster.

Thousands of insane people are to be cared for their reason having been overthrown by their losses and great sufferings. Even children are sadthis was one of the saddest features of the shocking visitation. These poor creatures first deprived of home, family, property and things of unrecoverable goods are to be new living legacies of the most stupendous catastrophe the Abbiannian Country has ever known. And because the enemy wanted to drive general Vivians army out of its position by means of the flood, regardless what it would do elsewhere. Oh what a penalty the Glandelinian nation will have to pay if it loses the war. Indeed since the ernormous flood which the bible says had covered the earth after the deluge and of which Noah and his family were said to be the only survivors, we know that the world has seen many of these kinds of disasters, and millions of lives have been lost through gales, overflows of rivers, and bursting of dams including tidal waves but who ever heard of a flood of this nature being caused by an enemy yet?

This flood is far writing off was more tremendous than probably that of the descrit description of Noah and His arch to my way of thinking and maybe killed and drowned more here in this story than even the historic deluge. Now we will go to the names of other places hardest hit next to Schloedertown, and her two neighbors.

At Jennie Richee which is fourty miles northeast of Angelinia Agathia seventy two villiages and on over 100,000 were destroyed on the 14th of Novemb r November the flood taking till the next day to reach that far. It was at this point a general inundation nearly the whole of the land north of Angelinia Agathia being flooded and upward of nearly four hundred thousand were rendered homeless or lost their lives.

In Big Beppo it was said that fifty thousand persons perished by the flood. Six thousand five hundred perished by the same flood in Potinia and about four thousand at Beppo Lemain on the same day.The loss of life during the str stang stage of thr the flood in the region around Oceana Hi ogan fifty miles north of Angelinia Agathia and near Mildred Maxwell have never been fully reco reckoned because of the bodies being washed out of reach of searchers though nearly 100,000 were said to have perished in the inundations around Mildred Maxwell but these figures are not as yet regarded as trustworthy. This is the only part of the flood where the loss of life had been estimated at over fifty thousand. The list from smaller towns is almost an endless one.But the lands around Angelinia Agathia and near Schloedertown and extending some distance toard Big Girl Knool suffered the worse from the nature of its situation. The Aronburg Run River at most every point is guarded by dikes and levees but since the war came on a so constant vigilance has been required of people all over to prevent the enemy from causing the river to claim hithe whole land. The dikes and levees were so streng however that the rush of flood waters instead of breaking down these dikes flowed over them, and the ernormous list of drowned and killed or frozen to death suffice to show how awful the havoc caused by this flood must have been. The inundation at Jennie Richee began near Roseanna where the big flood covered the dikes like an ocean wave. In that terro tefritory alone more than 10,000 people were overwhelmed and perished, while over 100,000 were drowned in around Glorienia and other points. So w far as disasters go up to this period of the war this sus subsequent inundation was the most frightful on record.

The flood annihilated all the smaller country h towns and villiages, wiped out all the most expensive farms in the, count ry besidesthe poor poorer ones and only to the indomitable pluck and industry which have ever been known of the people of the that country wastheir recovery to be due.A part of the city of Evangeline St Clare was inundated by the flood which swelled that stream near to the city of its name to a raging sea. The submerged districts comprised an ernormous area and the harbor and town of Little Beppo only thirty miles south was completely covered by water. The awful inundation also affected Journell and occasioned the little creek there to overflow its very dikes. Numerous lives here also were lost, and the records stated that 44,000 houses, and 40,000 head of cattle were swept away and drowned.

A part of the city ofTamerline-Genillian was inundated by the same flood and more than 2456 2,456 of the inhabatants were lost in the floods. The neighboring city Phelan while her citizens with but a few exceptions were saved sustained an inhalculable loss to property and nearly half of its houses were swept away.

In the northern boundary of the flood which hit round Jennie Richee the ruin of the Abbiannian National Guard under general Turpein Turpein which was concentrating in that part of the country at the time of the great disaster was materially aggerated by the force of waters. It consisted of an Abbiannian Corps of over 22,000 men who were encamped before the small town of Latinia, where they were surprised and met instant death to a man.One of the worse features of the flood that part of Calverinia north of Angelinia Agathia suffered was when it wasbelieved that 284, villiages were literally laid under water, and a great loss of life and port property followed the inundation. The flood at that part of the country entailed losses which no account was known. No real definite statistics of loss of life and damages can ever be obtained because of this very disasterous flood everything was found swept clean when the flood had receded enough to freeze oer over.

Hundreds of thousands of houses must have been swept away, and thousands perished in Jennie Richee alone, while equal or greater parts of the calamity was produced south of that city.

At Jennie Cory the dwelling dwellings of five hundred thousand inhabatants were laid under water. Twenty two thousand perie persons perished in Little Aronburg and the beautiful little Robert's Creek recieving the torrent rose beyond its might and burst some of its levees and dikes bringing additional disaster to the inhabatants ofthe counties through which it wound. The town of Robert's Creek suffered to an ernormous extent to the effects of the flood,and ov of the stream turning into a sea. Twenty five villiages here were swept away, and a large amber of inhabatants were swept away and perished either freezing to death on drift or being killed or drowned.

A part of the Catastrophe which in some respect could have brought one in mind of Johnstown Pa occured at Big Bethel on the 13th of November about less than thirteen miles east of Schloedertown. The flood descended upon this town in an itt irrestible torrent, and upwards of 11,000 persons were destroyed because they could realize what was happening to them.

The country around Annie Maxwell City suffered most severely from the flood. Small rivers and streams in this region recieved the flood and became one vast lake causing great loss of life and damage to pro property. The stream Big Anna flooded the center and southwest of Big Anna CountieCounty by an unprecedented rise from recieving the flood waters a thing which never happened to the stream before, and [illegible] did succeed in escaping to a great extent, damages aggregating [illegible] $50,000,000

$ 30,000,000 were sustained and an enormous ammount of fall drops crops and farm animals were destroyed. Snow drifts ten to twenty feet high piled that deep by the winds of recent blizzards were washed away. A large part of the town of Catteline was destroyed by the rising of the creek by its name and so sudden and disasterous was the flood coming into the very creek and turning it into a sea that the inhabt inhabatants were taken ut erly unawares and over 20,000 lost their lives. The Awful inundations reached even as far south and east as Alhabrambia. The River by that name recieved the flood also, the river broke its highest banks, which never before had it done, and where the river was was for days an ernormous lake for the water covered nearly 600,000 acres. The Town of Alhambria was almost entirely submerged, in Andencia 10,000 houses were swept away with all the occupants perishing, 212,000 houses were swept away at Bonton, $56 456,789 houses were carried away at La paloma and upward of 300,000 at Idol' Dell, Marshall, and Nemus,. It was the worse part of the flood entirely. At the same spot at the town of Jackson Ford, the waters came with the fury of a waterspout, the torrent pouring down upon the plac place like a gigantic cataract. The loss of property and lives will never be known as ve everything was swept away.

None of the b bodies were ever recivered. More than a thousand lives were lost in Murcia by the same inundation and the deluge overwhelmed the most fertile districts o of or around humberlane killing hundreds, and plunging the survivors into direst poe poverty. Famine threatened, and the cold temperature of the water carried thousands away like cattle. Rome Andon suffered great loss for around there the flood submerged thousands of acres and 3,000 perish persons were drowned in the town of Aurandebondia. While the record as given above can by no means be complete it will serve for all purposes of comparison with other portions of the most extensive flood on record. It embraces the most important da disasters of the rushing waters on record outside of Schloesdertown and other big places, and shows what a destructive force the same element has proven when let loose by theviched hand of a Glandelinian enemy.

Other places affected by the flood but not totally swept away are as follows;
Aronburg ,unction, 45,000 li s lives and 1,000 river craft lost.
Marseeville, and vinicity for fifty miles;200,000 lives lost.
Angeline Beldon, great destruction of life and property, and much cattle and other farm animals lost.

CHAPTER ELEVEN.

THE SITUATION TWO WEEKS, AND T THREE DAYS AFTER.. NOT MORE THAN ONE THIRD OF THE BODIES IDENTIFIED. HUNDREDS OF THOUSANDS OF THE CORPSES OF THE UNKONNW UNKNOWN NEVER RECOVERED, THOUSANDS HO AREGROUND CAST INTO THE RIVER. OTHERS BURIED IN THE HARD GROUND OR CREMATED.

A war correspondent accompanied by others described the situation about two weeks and three days after the flood had subsided and frozen over, and spoke of it in this way to those who questioned him;;;;;;;;;;

So vast is the field of destruction caused by the flood as far as eye can seee see than to get any ade uate adequate idea from any point level from the city of Sperryville and other places, at lesat of the flood as far as view will tell is simply impossible...It must be viewed from a very great height. From the top of the Glorianna Heights just at the est east of the city of glorianna the whole strange panorama can be seen especially if no shrow snow shroud or fog or mist happens to obstruct the view.

Looking down from the height or in all directions many things about the big flood that appear inexplicable from below are perfectly plain. How so many houses all over the territory for ever so many miles happened to be so queerly shattered or twisted for instance as if the water had a movement of the sea instead of a flood was made perfectly l clear.

The city of Sperryville was built in the form of an almost equilateral triangle with one angle pointed squared squarely up the mighty Aronburg's gun River to the northeast, from which the big flood came.At the northerly angle but further to the north was the jue junction of the Mic-Hollester and Pandora and Evangeline St Claire railroads. The southern angle pointed up the same valley. now about three quarters and a half og the triangle which probably covered as much ground as Chicago or even New York and equally as densely covered with buildings as either, is swept clear as a platter, except for about a little over 10,000 buildings near the angle where it points up tward the northeastern part of the Aronburgs Run Valley.

Therefore the course of the flood from the exact point from which or where it issued from the Lake Selicia into the Aronburgs Run Valley to where it spread out into avast sea below a turn or bend in the river, and beyond the Evangeline St Clare creek by spreading itself over the country districts of about one hundred miles is clearly defined as far as view can be obtained. The whole body of water issued str straight from the Lake in a sild monsterous wave and first tore across a score of small villiages and so on down to Sperryville taking away at once the northern part of the triangle. Here a cluster of more strongly constructed brick buildings aided by the strange conformation of the land evidently divided the flood..

The greater part therefore must have turned to the west swept up and down the main section of the brick blocks and then mixed with the ruins of the villiages above all the way down to Schloesdertown. The other section of the flood reared a ross across the triangle and was turned fully southward and spread out over miles of country, where the other section of the flood overflowing the river and making it turn into a wild sea finished the work of the tirangle turning then to the east and eastward, and carrying all before it as it swept over farm lands and country towns.

The flood that moved down and upon Evangeline St Clare Creek was first turned back by the latters dikes and then wasreinforced by the backwater from the overflowing Aronburgs gun and then flooded the former river till it too became an inland sea. The peculiar spreading and turning of this big flood forced against buildings, his higher rise of ground and dikes of the two rivers apparently first gave it a strange whirling movement from right to left and made a tremendous fifty five mile wide eddy with the force of some big whirlpool in midocean whose centrifugal force twisted everything it touched just as if the flood had the same power of a gigantic waterspout or tornado.

This accounted for the comparatively narrow path of the flood through the centeral part of the town where its course through the thickly clustered frame and other dwelling houses is as plain as a desert.

Though the force of the flood dimins diminished gradually as it spread out further and further and went southeastward it never lost its destructive force until some disa distance within thirty miles north of Big Girl Knool and even at the surburbs at that place on the north, every wooden house had been ground to pieces or carried away, whileelsewhere the houses were only turned a little on their foundations, turned over onttheir sides or upside down.
Further down on the outskirts of this city they are not single but great heaps of shattered lumber that look like nothing but huge lumber yards fu filled with lumber which was thrown every which way and pieces of all sizes just where the thrower seemed fit.To the northeast of Big Girl Knool the work of the water is of a different sort.

It ; picked up everything except the big buildings and piled the fragments of wrecked buildings swept down on the flood from other places right upon all northern outskirts of Big Girl ,nool so that that city itself seemed to have become a perfect hog of all the lumber that might have been manufactured from logs and timbers o all over the world. Lumber piles and lums extending for miles could be seen piece bypiece frozen together,and the inhabatants of Big Girl Knool said a that all household furniture of every building crushed by the flood much have been sent down to big Big ,irl Knool, and that the flood was very " Generous indeed".

ut at the starting point the flood left a great water frozen over barren plain so unusual andso often spoken off afterwards in the dispatches where stood hundreds of thousands of the best buildings in ,perryville. In this plain there is nothing now except a regular sea of frozen waters and whiteness of snow, and eve this does not relieve the shocking picture of ruin spread out below other points, but by contrast make it all the more striking....

The action of the flood had been so unusual however that you would have to go to Big Girl Knool or ,oss and ,hamberlane to see some of the queerest sights of wreck, not buildings of these cities themselves but buildings brought all the way down there by the flood. Many of the houses thus left there are scattered helter skelter, thrown on their sides, standing on their roofs, or standing on low tree tops and none of these buildings had ever been near or in ,ig Girl Knool before or any where near or in the eighborhood of ,hamberlane before. They had come down on the breast of the wave from as far up as ,perryville, were carried safely by the bridges crossing the river high up near Big Girl Knool and finally settled in their new resting places little or not injured.

A long row of them near Heidi street(Big Girl Knool) was pa cked closely together and every one seemed to be tipped over at about the same angle and one of the still more queerer freaks that the water had played with these houses, was that furniture not belonging to these houses were found there, and that one third of these houses came from Schloedertown, ,perryville, town city, and several other places. A big wagon belonging to u ,ruette Company ,erryville was found in the street of ,ig Girl Knool, and one house which was a big wooden one was found jammed half way into one wooden structure of big Girl Knool city. I got into this house in my walk through the lower part of the city to day in a big encastern. The first three stories had been filled with wear water and everything in it except some pictures on the walls had been torn out. The carpet had been split into more strings on the floor probably by the sheer force of the rushing ti tide. From the interior ice hung from the ceiling and the building was more of an iceburg out side than a wooden structure. Heaps of frozen mud stood in the corners and in one of these corners laf a dead olaf calf frozen stiff!

There was furniture in one of the room but the furniture was jammed against the wall, but there was no vestige of anything in side of the c furniture. The walls were coated heavy with ice. The ceiling was gone, the windows were out and the blinding snow blew in and the only thingthat was left intact was a full life sized statue of the Sacred Heart of Jesus that you always exc expect to find in our Great Cathedrals. It still stood where it had been fastened and though much awry and ice covered in some places it was utterly unharmed save for one of its finge fingers. Above it was these words;

" SUFFER LITTLE CHILDREN TO COME UNTO ME AND FORBID THEM NOT FOR OF SUCH IS THE KINGDOM OF HEAVEN"

" A selancholy of a wreck of a home of this sort our Blessed Lord looked down upon. A dead body of a little girl lay in the same room right before that statue and the sight of it, and the appearance of the statue gave me a feeling which I can never forget. I saw a wagon in the middle of Algo Street in Big girl Knool sticking tongue and all straight up into the air resting on its tail board with the hi hind wheels almost completely buried in the snow and ice. I also saw a house standing exactly in the middle of ,ornman street near the surburbs the side stove in by crashing against the side of some other house, and neither these two houses nor the wagon ever belonged to Big ,irl Knool.

Countless thousands of books of all sizes had been strewn over the same street and the trail of good books had extended for nearly twenty blocks, and every book had marked on it in the inside;
"The Gentile Public Library, Schloedertown. Calverinia."

One house which had come all the way from ,perryville by the store sign on the lower base had been lifted up over two other wooden hou s on the citys surburbs in some my mysterious way by the flood and then had settled down between them, and there it stuck high up in the air, so that you would have to use a ladder to get into it by the entrance of the store.

Down at the surburbs of the same street there was a big four story wooden house lying on one corner and held there by being fastened deep in wreckage and snow and ice. Through its side the trun of an ornormous fir tree, had bee been driven like an arrow and there it stayed sticking out through the front of another house of Big Girl Knool city with a bedstead, a wardrobe and a bunch of clothing hanging from it within plain view.

In a big snow snow drift was the the horn and producer of a big Victor machine and far down where the snow lay level near the debris near a small bridge were its frame, and works. An upright box full of ,i Victor records hung on a tree near by, while an upright wardrobe with all the clothing taken out stood straight up under the same tree. The house that contained these these could be found nowhere at all.The remarkable stories that could have been told about people floating down to Big Girl Knool from ,perryville or Schloedertwo Schloedertown without being dead or frozen are easily credible after seeing the evidence of the strange ,ourse the flood took toward the city. Pe People who stood near the ruins of Altonia Bridge saw fourteen women and children on a large floating jam of wreckage come down the stream, turn a short distance above and go southward, turn once again and go straight west. Then they were seen to go far down on thecurrent to the lower part of the city's surburbs and were rescued as they passed the second story window of a Convent schoolhouse.

A man who was imprisoned in the attic of his own house put his wid wife and child on a roof that was eddying past and stayed behind to die alone. ut both houses all the way to Big Girl Knool continued to float abreast of each other without once one of the other gaining, and finally the three were rescued by people who came out to them in a big boat.

Also at Big Girl Knool there is a house which must have come all the way from the very lake itself. On it was a man who who lived near Selicia 'illage which also as was also swept away. He lived in the town of ,hamberlane and he was carried right past his own home, and coly told the people on shore to bid his wife and children good bye for him. The house passed ,hamberlane, Ophelia, and Topsy the man carrying on a conversation with the people on the shore whoever he could and giving directions for his burial if his body should be found,. At night fall the house grounded on the flats near Big Girl Knool and in an hour or two the man who trying to telegraph his family that he was safe at Big Girl Knool City.

Three little girls and a woman supposedly to be their mother who went by in a roof crawled into the branches of a big tree and stayed there for two hours nearly frozen to death before they could make anyone understand where they were. At one time hundreds of floating snow covered roofs or houses were wedged in together near the shore where thousands of people stood. Brave men by scores went in or out from shore, and stopping carefully from house roof to house roof brought in two hundred and twelve women and children and two men. Some women crawled from these roofs into the attics of the houses, for in their struggles with the flood most of their clothing had been torn from them and rather than appear half naked before the men they stayed where they were untill the danger of freezing to death forced them to shout out of the winnow for help. At this stage of the flood moore perscns were lost by being crushed to death, than by drowning or freezing.

As they floated by on houses or roofs and wreckage floes the toppling houses fell over upon them and killed them.

The horrors began on the wreck on Main Street of ,ig Girl Knool just opposite the first national bank one of the busiest part of the surburbs which had checked and recieved the flood wreckage jam. A . large number of people from So ,perryville city here found here, great banks of wreckage being jammed against the houses like a snow drift showing the remarkable force of the flood.Two hundred and fourty one bodies were taken out early yesterday morning Nob November the 18th and taken to a Morgue. And they were not much injured considering the weight of lumber above them. In many instances they were wedged in crevices. They were all in a good state of preservation because of the cold and when they were embla embalmed they looked almost life like. All buildings on the outskirts of ,ig Girl Knool are banked up high with lumber and driftwood taken down and hurled against them by the water and it is like mining to make any kind of a clearing space. Thirteen hundred bodies were taken from the big pile of burning debris yesterday afternoon, and none of them were recognisable and they were buried immediately. they were so badly cremated that it was impossible to keep them untill they could be identified.

During a blast at the wreckage a number of bodies wer were almost blown to pieces. Bodies everywhere throughout the region of the flood is still being found and buried, and a large force of ghandelinian prisoners have been put to work at digging graves.thousands of laborers are at working straightening out the ruins on the outskirts of the city and are doing a wonderful amount of work. In an interview he told of the work that will have to be done and the contractors estimates show more than anything the chaotic condition of even this city. It will take a hundred thousand men more than two months to clear the ground so that the streets are passable and the work of rebuilding the ruined houses of the sutburbs surburbs can be commenced'said he' and I am at a loss to know how the work is to be done when there are so many mechanics and contractors and masons in the various armies. now fighting inthis unusual war. It will take a full year for my men alone to do what work is necessary. Steps must be taken at once if possible to for the military to release some of these workmen and I shall send a communication of appeal to the ,overnment asking for the release of workmen. I shall also send a petition to all companies in big cities asking all different manufacturers to take turns for a month or so in furnishing reliefs of worm workmen who have not joined the army. I shall ask that each establishment stop work for a week at a time and send all hands in the charge of a foremen or time keeper. He will board and care for them here. These gangs should come for a week at a time as no organization can be affected if workmen arivin arive and leave when they please."

A meeting was held here in the afternoon of the 19th which resulted in the appointment of Francis Bruno of Angelinia Agathia as head of the laborers. Mr Bruno in an interview said that he proposed to clear the city of Big Girl Knool of all wreckage and debris ofall descriptions brought into her streets from other places by She flood and to turn the townsite over to the Citizens committee when he had complete completed his work clean and free from all obstructions. He said the cities not at all harmed by the flood except furniture in lower floors looked as bas had a s towns devastated because of all the wreckage in the streets. I was here on the surburbs when a gang of prisoners came across me of the upper stories of a house that had floated into pir street. It was merely a pile of boards apparently but in small pieces of a bureau not belonging to the house either, and a bed spring from which the cloths had been burned and frozen at the same time apparently showed the nature of the find. A faint oder of burned flesh prevailed exactly at this spot.

" Dig here" said the officer in charge expecting to find a human body." There is at least one bigr body close to the surface and probably it is a man. The prisoners started in with unwillingness. A large pile of underclothing and household linin linin was brought brought up first. It was of fine quality and evidently such as would be stored in the bedroom of a house occupied p by people who were quick rich ru rich.

Presently one of the prisoners exposed the head of a little girl, then dug up its body which was nothing but a charred lump of flesh and lifted it up on the end of a pitchfork. The soldier in charged reeled. It was all that remained of his own little daughter who with his wife had met no doubt an awful death between fire and water. These Glandelinians though fighting against the christians were however more human, they took compassion on the soldier. The trunk was put on a cloth, the ends were looped up making a bag of it, and the thing was taken to the river bank. It weighed probably about thirty five pounds. There it was buried and a stake was driven into the ground to which a tag was attatched giving a description of the remains.

This was done in many cases to burned bodies and hthey lay covered with cloths untill men came with coffins and removed them... The actual number of li-es lost in all districts because of this flood will never be known, but over 44,500 bodies of the frightful catastrophe were identified, and these together with the scores of thousands may hundreds of thousands of unindentified corpses which were buried anywhere and anyhow, in the river, in the gru ground ,in bogs, in the yards and grounds of private residences, those bodies which must have been carried out to the middle of the river when the flood receded, those crematedate ashes by the big fires, the hundreds of thousands found around and in Big Girl knool and other places and those taken from the river at Angelinia Agathia and porothy Gale, those dis covered in all sorts of places, the bodies found outside of Little Girl knool and gloriamnia being p buried where picked up--all these served to swell the flood death list to possibly 1, 700,000 which was the figure named by the Major of Angelinia Agathia the te tenth day after the flood and he had every opportunity for obtaining information on this point.

Untill the cremation of bodies began in the wreckage the foremen of the various burial gangs made lists of the bodies disposed of by their men but when it became necessary to disposed of so many corpses found burned beyond recognition the compl compilation of these lists were abandoned and a mere general estimate made/. The work of clearing the streets of Big Girl Knool itself proceeded but slowly, the men or prisoners assigned to this being at times overcome by the intense cold of the weather and depressed by the gloomy character of their surroundings. Most of the men thus employed were even citizens of perryville and other places that is survivors many of whom were in comfortable circumstances before the flood swept awa, their possessions. And in the majority of cases these workers had lost not only their earthl earthly possessions but all members of their families as well, and were heartsore and crushed in spirit and not at all gentle to glandelinian prisoners placed under they their charge. In the main they engaged in this work because they wanted to help the city out of its desperate condition brought on by the wreckage from other places throw thrown into her by the flood and for further reason that is not busied in mind and body they might possibly go mad The first list of the identified dead was made out and made public on the eleventh day following the disaster and the lists compiled the succeeding days were given out as soon as completed.

A DEBATEMENT ON WHO WAS REALLY GUILTY OF THE FLOOD. GLANDELINIANS WHO ARE TA EN TAKEN ARE TOO MANY TO FIND PROOFS OF WHICH BURS ED THE DAM. THE ARMY MOVES AWAY FROM THE SCENES OF THE FLOOD!

The rbal causes of the flood thoughthe enemy was accused, and as many witnesses stated Glandelinians had been there when the disaster began was very doubtful because there were no proofs furnished. owevern However when most of the excitement brought on by the flood had died down emperor Vivian had gathered all his most import ant generals; the Vivian Girls; and many others who had witnessed the flood, and the Mayors of the stricken x cities as well as most of the prominent citizens and held a agenerial council over the affair. first every person bere asked to state their own version of the flod, flood of their losses; and of what else had occured: Others who were closest to the dam were asked to state the explosions they had heard and seen and the rush of the waters and so on. Then the finincchial losses of the firms of every city were added up and it was found that even very every bank in the ruined cities had been wiped out and that every person survivong who may have put their hard earned savings in the bank were totally wiped out of every cent.

first all these were accounted for as well as the great losses in property of every kind and then of the numbers who were killed or drowned; and who died of exposure and those who were renderless homeless and insane. Then finally the whole t in thing stare started anew about other matters of losses and then to the very cause of the flood itself: One witness was called forth and he was asked;

" At what part of the dam was the first explosion?"

" At the western end."

" How many Glandelinians ran from the scene when the explosion occured."?

" About thirty six."

" Thirty six?"

" Yes sir.

" Privates or engineers."?

" Glandelinian officers sir and one engineer."

" How bigwasthe blast."

" Cannot tell sir; but my ears are still shocked from the noise. I saw clouds of stones go up into the air withthe smoke but the first explosion did not commit the havoc expected by the Glandelinians."

" No harm at all?"

" Yes! The water came out like a q squirt from a big hole in a bursted pipe."

" When did the second explosion occur?"

" On the 5oth."

" On the tenth of November?"

" Yes sir. It had no effect whatever and was muffled."

" Why did you and your soldiers not try to stop this vile work?"

" We made every attemptxsir but were worsted as the Glandelinians were bthetter armed and overwhelmed us sixt to one."

" What did the Glandelinians use to blow up the dam?"

" I do not know sir, but it was a very powerful explosive."

" Did you see the final explosion that totally wrecked the dam?"

" No sir. I was within the camp at the time."

" Do you know who saw the final blast?"

" Yes sir."

" Who was it?"

" General Jack Evans."

" All right witness, sit down."

As he did so Evans rose to his feet when bidden by violet and her sisters and the questioner asked him;

" How many explosions your excellency really opened that dam?"

" Three explosions. The first in the centre, the second at the right and the third above the center. They a occured almost simultan simultaneously. I was on a hill above the dam when it occured."

" Did you see any Glandelinian soldiers about?"

" Yes and my Concentinians captured a few but the rest fought it out and got away; and ten perished in the flood themselves."

" What answers did they give when questioned?"

" They refuse to say a word even during the worst grilling."

" Why did you not torture them into telling?"

" I di did."

" And still they remain silent."

" Yes sir."

"What are these men, soldiers, engineers or officers.?"

" They are the whole three sir; and one is colonel. I have not questioned him because I thought it best to have him investigated before he is brought before the tribunal. I thought sir that if he would also refuse to answer any questions asked of him we should deport his wife and children far out of his reach to Abyssinkile because they came with him when arrested. This seems of course a mean thing to do sir but just the same I do not believe it is necessary to carry o it out for if we threaten this he may yeild."

" It is a good plan said t " said the "mperor."

Then motioning Evans to be seated he made a signal to one of the officers who said something to one ofthe soldiers and he disappeared. A minute passed of comparative quiet when the officer was finally brought in, and stood before the whole assembly with his hands bound behind him. Emperor Vivian rose to his feet and said;

" Sir as you are the leader of one of the bunches who are said tobe responsible for this flood, we are therefore believing it our duty to have you questioned: Will I'll put the questioning to you through my friend and the guardian of the Vivian Girls , Jack Evans, and if you refuse to answer his questions, I'll leave it fully inhis power to do with you what he does fit no matter how mean it is and not interfere either. Evans question him."

Evans stood up, made as imposing an appearance about him self as possible and assuming a most dignified and ferocious look combined began;

" What is the reason that you allowed and ordered your men to blow up the dam of a big lake whose contents within probably about four days or more caused hundreds of millions of dollars of property of all kinds, to be wiped out, and the loss of lives among men women and children of whom your army should have no concern what ever according to the war as they had no responsibility for it: Can you answer me that?"

" Ism I'm sorry sir," answered the officer, but looking defiant" I'm not under any orders to answer any questions put to me by enemies of Glandelinia and especially by a person who in his boyhood was nothing but an uncitified boy slave."

" It may be justso at that" said Evans with a apparent pleasant smile. " I appreciate your last words very much. There are many of us here who may have been slaves when young whoare now even greater generals than I am. But that does not concern us at all. We are fighting for the freedomof children and we'll win it too. But such things as your men have done is not at all necessary to war, as war against Nature to my idea isreally a war against god himself. If you refuse to answer my question then I'll graciously not bother you any further." Then turningto an officer;

" bring in his wife wife and two children will you Jake?"

The man spoken to departed, and within a short time appeared with the woman and two boys.They wanted to throw themselves into the colonels arms but were not allowed to do so.

" We are " Christian Dogs" as you call us" continued Evans but dogs you

" But dogs you know who never bark but bite, and when we bite we also tear. Your bursting of the dam sir has caused many thousands of survivors to have lost their whole families who are dear to them, many of these are either broken hearted or are insane. Many children who survived have lost fathers and mothers and indeed our orphan asylums all o' over the country turned them away because there is no room for them; and newo asylums are to be builded. Things have been caused by this g flood sir that no one ever comprehended. We " Christian Dogs" will do the same to yousand all your followers if this keeps up. Whatever arm was responsible for these orders given to you if known will recieve no quarter in battle. Now for the main point, I ask you only once more?"

" What is the reason for you to make this flood?"

" The prisoner remained silent.

Evans with an impatient gesture sat down, with the Vivian girls looking at him in surprise.

" Have you given up already?" asked the emperor also surprised.

" Yes sir, I have failed. His wife andchildren go to Abyssinkile as exiles to morroe, and he'll be shot."

The prisoner was certainly taken back by this new change of things. But the firm features of Evans, the surprised looks of the other officers, and the strange solemn quietness in the room was evident to him that Evans was absolutely a man of his word and then another officer said;

" Your Excellency general Evans, the preparations can be made right away if yo wish. Why wait till to morroe?"

At this the prisoner grew nervious. To lose his wife and children probably never see them again,---no he could not stand that. He would rather die a thousand deaths. Suddenly he cried out;

" Have mercy I'll tell."

" But supposing it is too late, and I won't change my mind now" I asked Evans with a scowl.

" But sir I will tell you all. I'll answer your questions. Do not take them away from me please? Have mercy."

" But you did not have any mercy when you broke open that dam? you knew that it would destroy everybody not responsible for the war did you not?"

" Yes sir. I had to obey orders sir. I cannot help it therefore."

" Neither can I. But I'll be merciful if you tell me the truth and not lies. First What was the motive of the flood?"

" To stop the advance of the Christian armies toward Vivian Wickey. To wipe it out before it go there."

" A very good plan indeed, to wipe out all the women and children." said Evans. " And it worked good too for your purpose I suppose. Still we are here yetand the whole army. What do you think of that?"

" I can't help it sir. It ain't my fault?"

" Neither is it mine. We were not in its path that's all. But just the same as the dam when bursted would sweep out everything else I believe you intended to destroy a christian army even at the risk of every body elses lives. I need not ask you that because I know whether it is a lie or not you'll deny it just the same. You glandelinians must love lots of water, especially with bodies of women and children in it. Whose army do you belong to?"

" General Jack Brooks."

" Brooks army is it not far from Perryville and Schloedertown?"

" General Mylstrom."

" What general told you to make the flood?"

" General Manley."

" Impossible. He is far away."

" But he did sir. He notified me the order by wireless. He wished me to wipe out by flood all christian armies that were moving tup support agunsion at Vivian Wicked Wickey."

" I don't believe it still. But if you intended to make the flood why did you not have the inhabitants of all these towns and villiages warned first."?

" Because their citizens would telegraph warnings to the christian armies. That is why. So where does the fault come in: I obeyed orders."

" So did I by hanging half of your followers yesterday, and will hang a few more to morrow. Orders is orders no matter where they come from: What you glandelinians do to us we should also do to you both Notwithstanding all that has occured since the war commenced, with all massacres of children, deacrut destruction of property by the whole sale, we yet aretoo easy with you, considering your nation is nothing but the leading traitor of the whole world. But we are going to avenge this disaster mark my words. And I believe you mendid not even try to see where the christian armies were situated before you let loose the flood. You have told things probably to save you your wife and children from bei g being parted from you, and though you may have succeeded I do not believe a word you say. The whole thing seems fishy to me! The nearest army at the time of the flood was si situated on the slopes of Glorlinnia heights, and ours was about sixty miles from the starting point of the flood, and on too high ground to be effected or devastated by it though i must confess emperor Vivians army was surrounded by it, and I and my command then on the slopes of Heidi junction cut off from all communications from its your motive for the flood was something different than what you say. And if Manley really did command it I can almost realize the reason of the flood, for who does not know the ways of that worse of all scoundrels scoundrels that the world has ever seen, a Military war lord, that instead of fighting with great christian armies, fights women childrenn and priests, minister s and all Catholic and other churches, and then calls himself the bravest man in the world. If he is brave then I am a jelly fish . I'll get him some day and then heaven will be surprised what will happen to him! What explosives did you use to blast the dams?"

" I might have to believe you one way and in another not. you used something else besides T.N.T. You might have used something else besides gun cotton because even that I no do not believe is strong enough to ruin such a powerful wall. But that will do from you as it is not necessary toquestion you further. Your wife and children will be allowed their freecom but as to you I cannot say when you'll ever see your own home again. Maybe next time we invade your country it may too be defeatated before you are free again. Take him away."

The prisoner was removed and his wife and chilred children too and then there was silence for some moment, the clerk having written down everything the prisoner said. Some other prisoners were brought in and questioned but their answers were not satisfactory, though of course it was suspected nevertheless that they may have lied, as it is hardly a glandelinian can be found who will tell the truth. Then the whole assemblance debated on the course of the flood, its expanting force and its extent, and of how much of the water was drained out of the beautiful lakes.

Emperor Vivian then said;

" The lake was bought by me once at an awful expense and therefore the letting loose of all this water appears to be a great loss to me as well as there were no one knows how many billions of excellent fish in the reservior and of which went down with the flood and was scattered all over the country. I had never expected that a dam so strongly constructed could have given way before any explosion no matter what was used unless there were enough explosives placed under the walls powerful enough to blow up a whole mountain. The explosives of course might have been T.N.T h which is probably the most explosive known, but it might have also been combined with an enormous store of dynimite and gun cotton and Ne Nitroglycerine which may have been placed under some portion of the wall that might have been tunnels tunneled under when no one was looking!How long this work was in progress before the attempt was discovered I believe no one knows as no one saw it from the starts. I have observed by tracing this map that the flood starting from Sperryville spread eastward and westward and it rushed south, and that therefore our own army escaping it was really a wonderful miracle at that.

We were entirely surrounded for about five to six days, untill it went down enough to lose the force of the current or to freeze over. Really my daughters here being up early in the morning were to the first to discover that we were surrounded. if you wish to hear they will tell you of their surprise."

One of them arose, bowed respectfully to the whole assemblance, and said;

" As you know we always rise early in the mornings except on occasion when our duties may have kept us out late at night, but the night of the 12th we had retired as soon as sunset because we had not done a thing all days except take it easy. Violet was the first to awake in the morning, and she then awoke me with the words; " Jolie dear, what's the matter? I hear water running somewhere. Let's get upand look."

I did and looked first. We were on the outskirts of the camp and when I went out the tent I literally stepped in water up to my very bosom and got scared. I then arose or aroused my sisters and we all went out but could see nothing as it was so dark. I feared the Arenburgs gun River might have accomplished a marvel, that would be of bursting one of its most powerful dikes and flooded the land, but the fact that we picked up pieces of strange drift wood, make us feel surprised indeed. Fearing we would be washed out we left the tent, and running over to higher ground, came upon a guard, and telling him what we discovered he fired the signal which is known for all dangers threatening the campThe soldiers of the guard came in a hurry and when informed soon to it the warning stroke was made to arouse the camp.

Nothing however cloul could be done as it was so dark yet but when it grew light enough we were surprised out of our wits to see the army surrounded as it seemed by an ocean itself. Innumerable trees, wreckage of houses, all sorts of drift wood and human bodies were floating past and all around us, and even on the later time of the day we heard that the cities below us had been struck by the flood which gives us belief that the flood surrounded us early the morning of the 13th and did not strike the cities untill the afternoon, though at what hour the fa dams were really blasted no one knows. Our army however suffered no losse as the flood though remaining around us did not rise to any further proportions and the soldiers were fully a whole day occupied in their attempts to rescue people from drift wood and house tops. It was the first flood we have seen in our lives and if we had not been on land before beside the little stream we surely would have believed we were on a piece of land that might have floated from shore out into the open sea. I hope to never see another such a flood as long as I live."

." No we did not. But there was terrible noise at about midnight on the beginning of the 13th." said yolee. " at least I heard it but the others said they did not wake up at all. It sounded to me like thunder you hear far off when a storm is just approaching with the lighting in the clouds above the horizon. I got up and looked out but the stars were out, with heavy patches of clouds here and there and also it was surely too cold to cause a storm of that sort and the river was full of float ing ice. I then listened and finally heard another rolling boom more louder I then before and saw a flash to the northward of a strange red color, and then all was silent. Later it began to snow and therefore thinking it might be some of the common explosions we experience in this war I went back to bed again. It believe it was about one hour later when Violet woke me and asked me if I did not hear water. At first I believed she was dreaming and told her to forget it and go to sleep but she insisted, and then I did listen and heard it also and then discovered the facts. The witnesses may of course the explosions occured on the afternoon of the 13th but if so then the flood that surrounded our camp might have been the waters of the first stage before the main torrent was let loose to destroy everything before it. But the statement of these witnesses, my discovery, and other things seems vey very mysterious to me. but nevertheless the morning of the 13th we were surrounded by water and it was even too much water to be occasioned by the overflow of the Arenburgs Run in so short a time. But I do not really claim the main flood which swept upon Sperryville happened that early morning as I never was there to see it when it began. The witnesses may be right and they may be mistaken. I would advise you to have them questioned once more."

" But which one should I have questioned!!!!!!"

" We then call for Colonel Medi a cavarly officer who was in charge of scouting parties at the time of the calmity." said one of the generals.....

" Where is he?"

" I believe he is in general Hansons army ."

" No he is still with us" said another officer. " I spoke to him this morning."

Therefore the man this mentioned was summoned .

There however was quite a wait before this man was located because he had just been preparing to leave the camp when some soldiers on horseback accosted him and brought him back with the statement that emperor Vivian wishes him to be a witness of the flood; sh because he confessed he knew much about it, its beginning and so on. while the assembly waited they examined some more "landelinian prisoners who were brought in, and then recieving no satisfaction from them except the stubborn persistent answer answer that they" Know nothing about the flood, b never been within sight of any " Old" dam, they were therefore sent back to the i prison camp. Then Medi arrived with the escort, and he immediately and gladly took the witness stand as he was only too happy to have the chance to tell his own story of the flood and how it began..

General Evans questioned him. First he was swore in as witness and then Evans said;

" What time did the flood begin?"

" your Excellency onthe eleventh. The enemy broke portions of the dam underneath and the first section of the flood though quick and gradually gradual surrounded some vast christian camp, whose it was I can really guess. The flood I mean surrounded your camp at midnight on the 12th of this past month, and if the walls of the dam had not been so quickly destroyed as they were your army itself would have been enfulled for the flood was drained by the flow of waters from the opening."

" I see and understand the mystery of the flood on the Twelvth then" said Evans.

" Did you discover or investigate the kind of explosives which the Landelinian engin eers used to blow up the dam.?"

" Yes sir my men after the blast or after most of the water had drained out of the lake went below at the time when it was comparitavely safe and though we could not tell for sure yet the smell of powder relating to Dynimite only was about the place. If so there must have been hundreds of tons of it stored there ready for the blast because the explosion had such force that it shook my three horse off from our horses while we raced for the dam. several of us were killed by the queer accident and while quite a few injuries and I recieved a sprained ankle and my horse went lame."

" How often did the enemy return to the dam in case their explosives failed to do the work?"

" About six times within my time of scouting duty."

" When did they first appear on the vinicity of the dam that is on the time of your beat?"

" On November the 15th."

" not any later?"

" No sir, butthey did not start the explosives then, and these soldiers were qi quite cleverly disguised and I thought they were men sent to r inspect the walls of the dam and therefore did not make ant any attempts to investigate their movements untill they were there too long for my liking. I and my own frustrated several attempts, and then it was a week before any one came back and stars started over again. And then they came in great numbers and well armed, and I sent a notice to your brother emperor Hanson and he sent a cavarly squadron to watch the foe and stop their work if possible, but they were worsted. "

" When was this.?"

A week and two days before the disaster.!"

" who was in the main charge of the Glandelinians who were trying to destroy the dam at that time?"

" A few officers who bytheir uniform appeared to be two colonels one captain, a major and even a general, but whom they were I do not know though the general done one most of the directing, and superintended the work. The main ones responsible o for the disaster got away, and were never captured."

" But we have one colonel here whom I questioned only an hour ago and he admits he was at the dam and was responi responsible for it." said Evans.

" Who captured him?"

" My men did."

" Could I see him please your Excellency?"

" Can you recognize him if he is the one?"
" Yes sir positively. I recognized them all."
Again the Glandelinian colonel was sent for. He came alone this time and was brought was brought before piedi, who looked at him closely.
" Yes he was one of them sir, and it surprises me greatly that he was captured, said piedi. B" ut a general was among them also and who he is I do not know by n but remember his description well. He was six feet tall, wore a black beard, had long hair, and wore a uniform like the king of many nations if there is any such. I could have sworn he was general Izner Mylotze but I cannot say for sure."
" Was Mylotze with you when the flood started because of the explosions?" Evans continued addressing the prisoner.
" On my full honor no sir." answered the prisoner. " He was a man who resembles resembles him at a great distance, but he belonged to Manleys camp sir. I'm not lying sir, and if you do not believe me sir I have all the proof that can be furinh furnished. Izner Mylotze ordered it sir however through Manleys advice."
" How many Glandelinians worked on the dam before they set the explosives?" asked Evans of piedi.
" About one thousand. two hundred. The thousand were on guard to prevent any interference while the rest done the work of digging and setting the explosives."
" Did you not inform the other scouting parties."
" Yes sir, and they ordered me to stop the work, and appealed to the military but nothing could be done.. The soldiers the there were too strong in numbers."
" this this is in the second time that you acted as witness" said Evand Evans and therefore we do not need to question you any further. So you may remain if you wish however in case of needed for further questioning.. " piedi then remained seated while the proceeding cond continued in other ways.. It was now with the purpose of how to set the real guilt. which Glandelinian general was really responsible, for it general Manley or Izner Mylotze. They debated on h what the enemy had done during the war in the past, and the most horrors they had accomplished since the beginning of the struggle from Crowley up to Vivian Wickey and Norma Catherine and nothing had been done either to stop these horrors. It did not take long however for this to be settled, and it was finally decieded decided that both Manley and Izner Mylotze was to blame for the disaster and not only that but also some of the National scouts who had failed to give the warning of the work of the foe on time to have it absolutely prevented by mustering a large force against the dam .
But though though this was decided it could not be proo proved however because no one could really state the facts and as there were no clues or other evidence to furnish it by. But as it is well known that moo os most of these rebel generals were mean enough to do anything and as they had done the worst of things on record all through their setvice in the Glandelinian government they nevertheless suspected and therefore it was decided that either Manley or Izner Mylotze were toblame for the disaster and therefore were to be held accountable for it.
Then general Kindernine rose up and said;
" Your Majesty, as you have witnessed the scenes and also your daughters too, and as you have also witnessed the sad scenes because of the flood, the destruction of property by the wholesale, the deaths of so many people and most of them innocent children, the bereavement of those who survived, I would like to suggest one thing if you will hear me." f
" Be speak."
" I vote no quarter to the enemy from now on."
Some others seconded their opinion but others opposed it saying that it would only make matters worse. General Gladerlinia said;
" I do not oppose as sure as any about such a vote for I believe t it is well deserve to the enemy enemy but I believe we should wait our time, and when the opportunity strikes to go at them just as they have done to us.. Of course we do not mean that we should include their women and children. Far be it. but what general Kindernne meant was no " Quarter " to the Glandelinian armies. That is fair enough."
" But then the other nations wouldclook upon us a as butchers also" said general Charles brown.
" They would eye" said general Kindernine. "Well what this nation does in its own behalf is none of their business. nd if they too saw the destruction of hundreds of thousands of the innocent victims women and children, and such an immeasrureable loss to proper property, with all banks and Insurance companies and the like entirely wiped out, I suppose they would kiss and make up with Glandelinia would they. I suppose they o would ask them Glandelinian soldiers to do it again eh. Yes would not."
" But if we allow the Glandelinians to continue this way, why they'll even win the war too" said another. " I will have to ask Emperor Vivian to excuse me for saying this but suppose Violet and her sisters would have perished in this flood and their mother too then we let the matter drop as an accidental flood I suppose or shake Glandelinia by the hand. I surely would do it myself but the hand I'd use would have a sabre on the end if it, so I vote for no " Qu Quarter" also. The enemy do not so show mercy to our own side, why should we show mercy to them. We see in the bible where in the olden times God had commanded the Hebrews to destroy all the heathen enemies and allow no one to live, and are not these Glandelinians far worse than any of these heathenes who even probably did not know better. Would Heaven hold us responsible because we destroy such enemies who for no reason at all creature by their own hands such disasters as just past, besides wipe our our most magnificent forests by big fires, and so on no matter what might even result from these conflagrations. Tell me that?"

A hot debatement followed on this, and finally Emperor Vivian himself stood up and said;
" It is best to wait on this question. If we go and start such things now it may as the others have said make things far worse for us and also the enemy will surely return the compliments which we do not desire. The best thing just now is to try and find out how many and which of the Glandelinians were responsible in the making of such a flood I disaster and to make a good example of them. But as to massacre whole Glandelinian armies just because of such a flood disaster would be utterly impossible for several reasons. I First--the Glandelinian armies are too large, there are too many Glandelinian soldiers to Even was waiste the time to destroy by massacre, besides so many dead as we have seen recently in the results of our big battles imperils the very world with pestilences if not buried or gotten rid of quickly and therefore the massacre would make matters far worse and probably destroy the both of us. Second----If we now started to massacre all Glandelinian soldiers and refuse any quarter, they will forwith do the same and surely we all know that the Glandelinian armies have many prisoners within their possession whom they could destroy without mercy should they even desire to do so. just because of this disaster therefore we cannot start this when the Glandelinian have it in their power to do the same to us.
There is always time to settle with the Glandelinians for any disaster that they have caused in the past, or for any disaster that through them may come in the future and therefore we'll have to be patient and wait. I hate to let things go like this without punishing the enemy for it but then we cannot be too rash and will have to stand the punishment as long we as we have at the opportunity to strike back. But we can surely condemn those who were wholly responsible for the flood by death, and the penalty would and will be" burning at the stake" but we'll have to go slow and find out the real guilty parsons not by questioning the prisoners but by full circumstantial evidence against them. and so far we have none, and we have many prisoners who were taken since the distance, hundreds and hundreds of them but none of them seem to know or will tell anything and therefore we cannot do a thing.
It is just like recieving an insult and not having the proper means to resent the insult and gain the proper satisfaction for it. I'd have to say the same even if my wife and daughters had been also the victims of the flood. But I can say this, we'll not give in nevertheless. The enemy will not gain anything by doing this and it will only cause more armies to be formed and not only that but this disaster has caused such anger and excitement throughout our nation that all Draft and Conscription and enlistment stations have written to me for help as they cannot even handle all the men who have applied for application in the army since the disaster has been made known. This ought to give a good warning to the enemy and prove to them what their dastard actions are causing. Why the men who apply if turned away sneak in the army under pretence that they were sent.
Yet no matter how they get in I do not stop them and have notified the conscription stations on such facts, stating that no matter what little defects men may have they may be admitted should they have good enough strength and ablebodied mean to fight, shoot and run and have good sight, even if it is in one eye providing the sighting eye is alright.
This disaster has caused the mobelization camps to be overcrowded with men who have besieged the places to get into the army, and the same is at Angelinia Agathia, Dorothy Gale, Pandora, Jessicia, and many other places including Evangeline St Claire. Therefore though the disaster had many bad results it had one good one at least. Mobilization camps are spring up everywhere now as thick as a fore forest to house the millions who have been recieved within the last week, and many more are coming. so as far as it goes that ought to be one lesson to the enemy, that to make a disaster only causes a greater concentration against him.. Therefore all I can say for conclusion is that we must wait and strike when the I opportunity presents itself. The best thing to do is wait for the opportunity to invade the enemy's territory and then devastate as far as we see fit..."""" """
After this the council was dismissed with it partly undecided of which was to be done about the matter.
Another thing had happened and that was that so many Glandelinians which were believe to have been observed around the dam before the I disaster had been taken prisoner, hundreds of them, officers, privates, and mining and other kind of men who were said to have been at work to blow up the dam and cause the flood. And only a few at a time had been brought before the military tribunal to be questioned but either but either they did not know anything about the matter, or either nothing whatever would make them reveal a thing. Evans as we remember had questioned the colonel during the council but whether he really told the truth or not was hard to understand, because in many occasions you cannot never trust the Glandelinians no matter what they say, and during a grilling they usually will really tell a lie rather than reveal the work of their comrades.

Therefore it was very doubtful as to which one of the Glandelinians who had been taken prisoner caused the irreparable disaster, and yet the Christian officials no matter how mean the Glandelinians are did not and do not desire to put to death any one who is not really guilty, and to punish them all whether guilty or not by death seemed too serious a plan to carry through, even if it would have been a worthy one or not.

It might have been sure however that any one or all of these Glandelinians taken prisoner had something to do with the disaster whether they aided it or not and therefore they were held not as Glandelinian prisoners of war but prisoners as criminals of the First degree, but the death sentence was not imposed on them nevertheless and they were sent to be confined in the army camps.

By the sixth of December the big christian armies having recieved the orders to move were glad to recieve a chance to advance and get away from the scenes of the awful flood. By request most of the refugees fearing Isner Mylstze and his Glandelin soldiers remained with the National army, and many of the men folk enlisted into the service to mostly revenge their losses while the army decided on the transportation of the women and children to other places. Where Emperor Vivian was heading for it could not be questioned but it was with the sole purpose to advance after the retreating army under the Manleys, while Hanson himself was signalled to watch every movement that Mylstze might make.

CHAPTER THIRTEEN.

OUT COMES THE SUN.

A ARONBURGS VOW.....

As the poor child struggled,, ,, the fiendish looking Glandelinian drew a fie fiendish looking knife,,, and pece proceeded to cut one of his ears, off .Poor Violet and her sisters could not do anything, for their endagered frisnis, for they had been dragged down into a cellar,, and locked in with their feets, and hands tied r or bound with strong ropes. The chocking child kicked fiercely, and tried to beat at him with his little brown hands, but under the merciless chocking, he bocame utterly helpless, and was quicky quickly dting.

But the Glandelinian wishing to use him in a more or cruel and brutal way soon let go of his neck, and threw him to the floor sitting on top of him. The other children except the baby were too frightened, to move cruttor or otter a word, but nevertheless the other Glandelinian child slave masters watched them closely. The Glandelinian who had been chocking the child didnot get his cruel wish satisfied for the child did not recover from the effects of the strangulation and died very quickly..... The others wee now also put to death, after indescribable torture, and dragged outside to be burned so that the Angelinian spies would not know what had happened. One of the cruel Glandelinians remained, and unlocked the cellar door. One by one he carried out violet and her sisters, and untied the ropes.Violet and her sisters felt terribly over the butchery of the poor innocent children, and spo spoke not a single word though the wicked Glandelinians asked them harsh questions. The Glandelinians took them to another fa ctory w ich which was more old and weird, and locked them in. As soon as the cruel Glandelinian left them, Violet and her sisters decided to try to effect their escape.

As the factory had broken window in it, they decided to pull the sashes out of one and jump out. This was a hazardious undetaking undertaking as they well knew, as the Glandelinians follow with bloodhounds, after any escaped prisoner, and who could trail them no matter who they were.To get through the window they had to break the whole sash, which they didy but not without making tremendous noise .The noise brought a considerable Glandelinianson the spo spot a right away, but Violet and hs sisters hid a behind a large curtain, before the Glandelinians broke in. These Glandelinians were all strangers and did not know that any o children had been placed in there. Violet and her sisters did not dare to breathe for fear of being discovered and they remained as still as they could not moving a single fingue gin finger.

The Glandelinians as they entered, discovered the broken window sash, and cooly make an exmeanation. What the Glandelinians were saying Violet and her sisters could not make out, for the Glandelinians were talking in the lowest tones, but the children knew that by the scowl of the graycoats, that they were talking about the broken w window sash. The Glandelinians now began to search about the room, very closely, and oh how Violet anf and her wisters-did pray tto god asking him to save them from being discovered..... The Glandelinians now reached the curtain and pulled it aside. Violet and her sisters were discovered. They were instantly seized and x dragged from behind, and to the mill middle of the room.

"Did you rascally girl children break that window sash with the intention of running away?"Asked one of the Glandelinians.

Violet gave no answer, and neither did her sisters.

"So you are some of the child rebels, and who were captured, and then tried to make your escape eh?"He asked again, with a fiendish grin grin."Well we'll have to take you t o a more secure place, for you little girls might escape if we leave you here.""

The Glandelinians went out taking violet and her sisters with them. As they went on there suddenly cause an unearthly mournful howl of a small Blengiglomenan creature from around the corner of the snow covered stesrett street and all of a sudds appeared at first what seemed a monster of a dog, but which was a Dog headed Blengiglomenan blengiglomenan creature, and as mad and as angry as could be.

"Gracious -an infuriated Dog-headed blengiglomenan serpent."Gasped Gasped one of the Glandelinians drawing his pistol."

"We'll have to fight him"Growled another.""Or he'll rescue the crazy christian children dogs."

The Blengiglomenan creature with blood shot eyes, with the thick ropy mucus forming through the hollowof its posion fangs was preparing to charge at them giving forth a tremendous howls, and demanding in the human language to the Glandelinians to leave the children free or take the consequences of being bitten. The Glandelinians defied, it and as the monster made a swoop and endeavored to down them with a blow with its left wing the Glandelinians dashed aside, delivering a volley, which to the coolness of the rash Glandelinians struck its mark, but did not injur the creature any more than to arouse it to a frightful rage.

Pain maddened the creature made a precipitious dash and down a number of the Glandelinians the thick mucus like formation flying from its posion tralons in its wings in all directions. Violets sisters knowing that they might accidentally get torn by one of those horrible tarlons scattered, but Violet got scratched before she could get a chance to run. The glen giglomenean creature being only slight silghtly wounded by the second h volle fired by the Glandelinians, and snarling like a tiger, rushed once more tward the Glandelininns its lolling tongue thickly covered with foam. The Glandelinians not having their muskets loaded scattered to avoid the charge , then together laughing shrilly, made a charge at the monster themselves, and clubbed him fiercely. Again the creature drew out of their way, and now some of the Glandelinians having their muskets loaded, fired before the creature was able to prepare for another charge, and fired point blank injuring it severely, thus enabling themsives time to grab Violet and her sisters and hurr y off to the shelter of some big factory before any more of these creatures prowling around to rescue children would unexpectedly swoop down upon them. Violet having been scratched in the arm was now suf fering intense pain, and her sisters feared that the horrible effe cts of the deadly ps posion would set in or was already setting in. Violet also dreaded it, and besides on account of the scratch she could hardly walk without jarring the wound, but the rude Glandelinians having her by the hand forced her along laughing at her pleads.

The immense place was soon reached, and the weeping children were soon brought in and taken before the Glandelinian officer, who was one of the best generals. It was only a few minut mauites later that the building was captured by AAnnie Aronburgs rebels, and finding out what had occured Annie Aronburg- said to the prisoner before her;

"You mean Glandelinian general behold at your feet six little girls h who have pleaded for their sister."

"You little rebel. You have us now but we care not for pleads for any one." Said the Glandelinian quite aroused over the sudden seizure of the place by the rebels.

"Those poor Vivian Girls were in your pow power before we arived, and you refuse to spare her sister." Said Annie furiously flourishing her club, and turning her sweet but angry face to that of the general's defiantly.

"The vivian girl shall not and cannot be spared now." Said the general in anger. "All you christians ought to have worse things than even hydrophobin, and the Vivian Girl cal ed Violet deserves to die from the effects of the Blenglglomenean creatures posion. You have us and others a prisoner but to save Violet you cannot force me to do."

"You have conc demned the Vivian Girls for nothing and they are nearly as innocent and as holy as the angels and Saints in heaven." Cried Annie Aronburg in passionate angry tones. "You are a cruel man to refuse to aid her wi d wildly suf ering as you see she is."

"Rebel I assure you that I will not. Who are you to dare to com mand me like that a prisoner though I am much against my will." Said the Glandelinian angered still more. "Come over to us you little beauties, and do not approach those child rebels. You are our prisoners, and not rescued at all."

"Never" Was the answer, and over to the rebels they went.

"Youcare dispernesent imps." Said the offiver angrily. "You and your sisters have been found guilty of wilful hatred of Gaten, and you" Pointing to poor Violet Was a spy, and has been very justly condemned. I will do nothing for thespy or her bite, come what may." Added the gener general while his brow grew dark.

"We are innocent." Almost sk-shrieked the wretched children. "And we have, and will be faithful to god alone. We defy you Glandelinians no matter how much we will suffer for it."

"I'll not believe it for violet and you other children have been proven guilty many times, of being spies." Said the graycoat.

"It's false, as false as the black hearts of your perjuries, who swore against uscin Beppo. We are innocent, more innocent than you, and if you Glandelinians hope for pardon from god for your sins, free our sister from the danger threatening her."

"You little fools I command you to come back over to us."

"Never ,never. Oh general you do not know how we love our sister. We have no one else in this country to love us but our parents. Oh general we have suffered cold and hunger, and thirst, and hard work for the sake of the freedom of the childslaves, that you never want. We have toiled for the freedom of the child slaves for over a month, and were forced to stoop to sights, and actions we , loathed, that we were nearly dead from it, and when we were brought to old Beppo, we had to suffer worse though it was like rending our souls and bodies apart. Several times already we were torn away from our parents, sentto cruel factiroes, and forced to witness unceasing butcheries and sl sufferings which we were foolish enough to keep to ourselves and not say a word. We were sent to the old city of Calverine, with indescribable sorrow. We were also sent to Foun cee-Cee-woolin after our escape from Calverine, and now though the child slaves have taken you prisoner and freed us, nevertheless our sister is doomed within half an hour to die a horrible death from the posion. We were only brought here two twice by our merciless enemies. For more than the length of this cruel child slavery our lives have been of el endless sorrow and misery. We were sleeping and walking in sorrow and trials, and thought that our sufferings would never end. Oh general if you have not mercy on my sister, the child rebels will not turn you over to the Angolinian aurthorities as you believe but will see to it that you are slain by another Blengiglomenean creature. I Know the rebels too well. If angered they show no mercy either."

A spasm of anger passed over the face of the cruel general and he answered sternly;

"Ye little devils your sister is a spy. I will not spare i her though I have the means, she is guilty of being a s y spy ,and so guilty of a death well deserved."

"Perish the soul so base as to believe such a falsehood, of one of the poor vivian irls." Said Aronburg threateningly. "And she is no spy and you ave no proof of it either. Oh sooner would the wicked Glandelinians themsaves be guilty of it than she or any of the poor vivian girls....."

"Ye rebels are raving over your victory. Once again I tell you that I refuse. Do what you wish with me I do not or care."

"Mery mercy for my sister." Cried the littlegirls.

"Ye rebels and christian dogs I will not. I pity none of you little rebel ta traitors of gaten. I hate all of you christians, and she is a christian dog, a regular insect, and insect, ye little rebel and so must suffer."

"Oh dear god how will I convince him." Cried Violet's wretched sisters wringing their hands in the wildest despair.

"Oh please spare my sister."

"Once more I tell you that I will not. Ye and your sisters have been condemned to morrow and would have died if the rebels had not taken us by surprise. Your sentince would have been executed, and I would not have done anything to avert it. Ye sisters of the christian dogs, deserve a worsefate, and I will give no mercy to your sister violet."

"For the sake of god, if there is one spark of pity for us in your hearts do not let the posion kill her. For general it will be a double murder, her death and maybe ours. If this sentense is or had been executed you would have brought run ruin sight away on your nation because the w olewhole world would strike against Glandelinia."

"The law must take its course, and for gatens sake I will not prevent it, though I can refuse, and once more ye rebels I beseech ye to turn yourselves over to us Glandelinians and command the rebel leader to allow us to go free. You little rebels should kneel to gaten alone and not to god."

"Gatens no good, and cannot and will not hel pi her though Blessed Jesus would had I pleaded to him. Oh general I have always knelt before my god but to no other man before and never had my petition been spure spurned as now by you. You hold the life of all the poor children in the hollow of your hand and you will not grant?"

"I tell you I will not and cannot?"

"You can ,you can. It is o in your power."

"You are great, and rich, and powerful, and would and could have our sen tence annulled and violets life saved if you wanted to. By your sould souls salvation, by your mothers grave, by him whom you have wilfully turned your back upon I conjure you to save my poor sister from the posion."

An indescribable and sad sight was those poor despaired children as they knelt by the sterns generals feet, their very voice sharp with inward agony. He shaded his eyes with his hands to keep out the pitiful sight and his stern determined look did not pass away but increase increased. His face seemed hardened like iron and the little girls by his actions thought his iron chest was melting.

"You are yeilding maybe.She may yet be saved.Oh I hoped your iron chest would soften."She cried out taking hope for his silence and action.

"Ye rebels decieve, ye rebels I will do noth ing for your sister pretty as she be."Said the general:"What do you rebels mean by pleading!"

"What you still refuse!Oh it cannot be."She will soon be stricken sure at this cruel delay.Tell me——oh please, please tell me that our sister will be spared."

"Ye rebels I tell ye I will not have mercy and will not spare her life."

"Oh you ought to please. You ought to do it.You think she could li ve one sig single week from that frightful posion if infected wound, and the posion that will be tearing at her heart As you hope for pardon, have mercy on my dear siste sister."

"It is all in vain.Rise ye rebels or by gatens name I'll make o you rise."

"You refuse."!

"I do.Rise I say."And he drew his sword.

At this moment with a bound like a catamount Annie Aronburg sprang his his way and between him and the vivian girls with her drawn pristols and like a tigress robbed of its young she stood before him and said;

"Don't you dare to draw your vile sword on those little saints or I,ll blow your damn brain out just where you stant you demon of hell. You heart of steel hear me. From this very moment I vow before God, our blessed Saviour, that if we ever have the chance, which I swear we will, we will do all we can to devote our very lives to revenge on you and your whole nation, and all cru e e enemies of God, whom we cannot help but hate, though christians as we were and are.Living, as a curse, may ruin, miser misery, and despair equal more than ours or all slaves be your portion, and your whole nations,, dead may you, and all your wicked followers, who afterwards persecute the vivian girls or any other children, and christian religeous, may your souls never rest in the earth, you and your followers sprung from, and when standing before the judgement seat of god, you and your whole nation sue for Pardon, may he for yours and their merci less cruelty that I know will follow, hurl your merciless soul, and that of your whole nation to perdition for an answer. And may his cu and my curse decend upon your devilish nation and their armies, men women and proper y property forever, and may every earthly and eternal evil follow a wronged Rebels curse. May the Angelinian nation cruse yours beyound recovery, and May Abbisannia d all in her power to reduce your nation to complete destru tion and keep it so forever, and ever."

This Glandelinian general was a man of thirty years, tall and Stalwart with a dark complexion, a strikingly handsome face, a daring reckless air ,wicked as he was, and an expression of mingled scorn, hatred, and fierce mess in face. There were fleshy bloody hearts arou around his neck, and human skulls around his abdomen.There were feathers in his hat and he wore a dress or regalia like those of the Tripoligonli ans.Indeed he look like a handsome demon to his defiant captors.

He laughed a bitter mocking laugh, terrible to hear while his eyes flashed fiercely.Annie Aronburg was for the first time in a mad rage over the treatement of the vivian girls, and she picked up her iron club and gave it such a flou flourish that it came in contact with the generals head, and set more stars dancing before his eyes than could be seen in the sky.The outraged general, who was only shocked, and for a moment had turned his back on the children, indignantly sprang around, and collared Jennie, thinking that she did it, and whose complexion had turned from white to gray with terror, and whose teeth shattered with mangled fear and shame, sa and looking bayonets at his treabling victim he would have thrown her rough ly against the wall but Aronburg again-intervened, and he could do nothing and had to release Jennie, though the Glandelinians dark stern face with its fierce black eyes, and wildly streaming black hiar now defiantly turned to Joice and then to Annie he herself, who still held the rod in one hand and a revolver in the other, and who was pouting. Angeline vivian was shrinking from the generals glances, and joice gasped;

"Uge what a face."

"You'll all suffer for this blow one of you gave me if I am ever free again."He growled turning the sharp light of his stelleto like eyes on Annie Aronburg."I believe it was you who struck me."Pointing to Annis who only pouted, and assumed a pugnacious expression of face. There was a devilish look in his eyes, and violet and her sisters who saw her was not likely to forget the way Annie folded her arms and looked at the general with all the scowling she could make on her pretty face.Violet and her sisters felt a sent sensation as if having an argue shiver, as they watched the retur returning glance of the general.With his fierce passionate nature he had become like a demon, and woe had been to those before who had ever gotten into his murderous hands.But Annis Aronburg was as relentless as a garrican, in her desire for vengeance, though she be a christian.She did not know whether she should shoot her defiant prisoner down in cold blood or turnh him over to her rebel soul soldiers for turture.

"Oh I wish I do wish we were already in heaven."Moaned poor lit tle Angeline.

"Heaven broke out the wicked Glandelinian with passionate fierce fierceness."Never mind [illegible] or I'll cut you to pieces whether I,m a prisoner or not."What is heaven, God, Mercy and happiness.'All a mockery, and worse than a mockery.."""

"Whawn I done that I and my sisters should see poor violet in danger of such a cruel death.What crime have or my sisters committed, that I and my sistern should be doomed upon a hell us upon this earth.But God himself will have his revenge."She added while the fierce eyes of the Glandelinin blazed and his fists clinched. Flames like eternal fires seemed to be raging in the generals heart, and brain but he did not dare to do anything rash rash as the rebels had him and his followers covered with fixed bayonets.' Ye rebels are going mad to rebel and do this so often.' He said to Annie Aronburg' 'Unless ye are calm, ye will bring on a greater rebellion of the Calverinians against us, and have Calverinia against devas tated as long ago."

The Prisoners were sent off and the vivian girls first taken into custody by the rebels and then sent to their own parents.However fortunately for Violet, and to the humiliation of the Glandelinians the deadly posion had not entered the wound at the time violet was scratched, and no effects came whatever from it.

With the main or less throughoutly organized near Aurandecallio at the orders of general Hanson vivian general W J Williamsberger Zimmermann or Concentinian Aronburg as was his right name started his armies across the Gunbeam Creek and came into collision with general Ro Ripad Rapidans army of Mungabecos and in an hours engagement crippled a part of his principal rebel army in the terr ble action along the right of the gunbeam Creek, while other forces of christians flanked him on the left, drove upon the forces of Glandelinians near a Court House, and though repulsed assaulted again nd a still again, on which last occasion the assaulting Angelinians captured a whole division of the wicked Glandelinian army. Thus during those few hours that fearful mr morning the Angelinians kept on an unceasing warfare indeed, ever persuing the offensive , and hourly drawning nearer and nearer to the region of Aurandecallio, untill at last general Rapidan was driven within the main defenses of the rebel line.

Never was the persistent courage, or the determined purpose wh with which the foundation of general Concentinian Aronburgs or Hansons character more clearly brought out than in this fearful engagement thus starting near Jennie Vivian on the gun- beam Creek, and never indeed was it more needed. Well did he or any of the other christian generals know that no signle triumph, however brilliant would win on the vast Glandeli i Glanddlinian army now massed before them. General Hanson Vivian and even Concentinian Aronburg and others saw plainly that nothing but fierce and ruthless hammering away would avail. The main stone wall of the wicked Glandelinian Condeferacy had indeed too broad and a too firm a base to be suddenly overturned by even the strongest christian armies, it had to be only reduced slowly to powder.During the anxious hours which followed the beginning of the battles of Aurandecallio or gunbeam Creek, or again what was known as Jennie Vivian a war correspondent asked violet and her sisters who from afar was witnessing the tremendous war of the world on land;

"How does your uncle, or father or Concentinian Aronburg, or your friend and guardian general Jack Evans impress you as compared with many other christian generals!!!"""

"Te greatest thing about them and their assistance and their men also"Said violet and her sisters"Is to us their cool persistency of purpose and will. They though furious and pugnacious fighters are never easily excited, and they all have the grip ed bull dogs.You know sir when any bull dog ever get s his teeth into anything, he never let's go for anything and not hing whatever can make him let go or shake him off. They are like bulldogs."

Gertrude Angeline and Jennie Turner who witnessed the tremendous battle from a safe distance felt and saw the same quality. Then after three hours of indesi indecisive battle, the fighting somewhere for about ten minutes came to a waynit was believed in other portions of the christian lines that the big Angelinian columns were falling back in confusion.

General Kindermine then said to Gertrude Angeline;

''I have no doubt at all that general Hanson Vivian or Concentinian Aronbug Aronburg Aronburg are being pressed back and are retreating''.''

Gertrude Angeline and the other little girl friend including violet and her sisters surely knew better and slowly shook their heads.

''You are mistaken general.'' Replied Gertrude ernestly and looking him in the face.''You are indeed quite mistaken.''

''And violet said''General Hanson our Un l Uncle or General Concentinian Aronburg or the others are not retreating, and what is more they are not retreating men.''

Fierce action followed near Nenden Anna's rebel line, and in the meanwhile general Jack Evans who was move moving on tward the west changed his own base to the Litt le Sunbeam Creek, and attacked the rebel troops under general Peterson Vania. Slowly but surely the christian armies seemed to be closing in and the action was growinb more and more severe and sanguinary. O n the christian side everywhere it seemed as if falling back or being defeate had gone completely out of fashion. south west north or east all generals could see that a most steady resistless force, was back of the fiercely batt ling christian armies pushing them ever on tward the rebel lines.

The losses of the christians in the mornings actions were tremendously heavy, but general Mic-Hollestor Johnstons resources were wrecked in a much more serious and dangerous proportion, and for his t'o troops no reinforcements for the time being was possible.Their dead who lay so thickly on the fields already were called the onl ''Children of the Calverininn soi l'' and as Manley was heavily engaged with Hanson Vivian and his Brotherhe could not send no troops to replace the losses of Johnston. Already whole familes of the rebels had been destroyed, but the survivors were fighting on most desperately. Even in Mic-Hollestor Johnstons lines stretched for ten miles there was complete and had been for two weeks before complete and ah absolute destitution. Many war correspondents who had been near ther e and saw the horrible battle testified shortly after the end of the probable bloodiest battle of the war that the rebels had even ate every dog, cat rate, and mouse, and rule and even toads. General Hanson himself was pressing onward like an irrestible tidal wave, general Jacksonia Evans advance through the region of North gunbeam Run had made it appear now as if general Mic-Hollester Johnstons line was like an eggshell, general Kindermines p splendid cavarly and dragoons was ever hovering around the defenders of the Glandelinian flag.

One rebel general surrounded saw all was over and on the following noon hour wrote a memorable letter asking the terms of surrender and bring the slaughter of his men to an end... o while the actionwas raging elsewhere between the lines, general Lansin met to arrange the surrender of his army and it was Jack Evans who he met. The terms of surrender was unconditional. Officers and men were held to be investigated to find who among them were responsible for recent horrors among children, no officer was allowe allowed to retain their side arms their baggage, or their horses and even the men who had orp probably lost everything had not been allowed to keep their horses. The whole country around Vivian Vickey preficus to this had been so raided by both armies that it was doubtful whether any one around Vivian Wickey would be able to put a in a or crop to carry themselves and their familes through the next winter without the aid of horses they were then ridding and it was a blow indeed indeed to the rebel prisoners who had thus surrendered themselves..It seemed a cruel decree but so many rebels had been guilty of massacres of children and tortures of children that it was passed. However general Evans was lenient enough to sull supply rations from his own stores to general Lansins starving rebel army.

For days they had before the outbreak of this battle been living only on parched corn and other hard tack. He gave them forage and when Angelinian soldiers started firing a a salute of hundreds of guns to celebrate the surrender, Evans ordered the firing of that kind stopped declaring that though the rebels were now their prisoners and had to submit to so hard a term it was not necessary to exult thusly over their sudden downfall. The rejoicing throughout the Angelinian armies over the surrender of this rebel army and the restoration of the main christian army was during the battle checked by the sudden blow of the death of one of the main christian generals during the morning battle of Lucius Franklin who was mortally wounded

THE BATTLES OF JENNIE VIVIAN, OR SUNBEAM CREEK, AND FORT DAMINEAN. JENNIE VIVIAN ON DECEMBER 4TH/ THE OTHER ON THE 12TH.

THE HARDEST FIGHTING IN the northern region of the war and the greatest coss in life occured in the main divisions of general Whillimsburger Zimmermanns forces at the frightful battle of Jennie Vivian or Sunbeamcreek in which more men were killed or wounded than in any other battle known in the war, and that any army had ever suffered in any recent campaign into Calverinia, and which had ended disasterously for the enemy. General Vivian and his brother with other armies had united their forces together in the effort to crush the enemy at Evangelinia Crania and had been disasteriously beaten with the two main leaders wounded. and only the complete arival of Zimmermanns G Army saved the battle from being lost.Zimmermanns main losses in the battle of Jennie Vivian was II,IIO,007 in killed, 6,I20,748 in would wounded, and I,600,000 in missing the total losses being I7,330,755, along the left wing alone. The estimated losses in total were not acurately estimated. General Benligianin the third chief commander had led on the first charge against the Glandelinian center under Tomas Tamerline at the battle of Jennie vivian, and at whose head he fell, the one which under general Cupid Glorinia continued the bloody assault, and which under Hindernine fought so well across back and forth on the shell swept plains, which under general Hansonia swept over the enemys works at one point, and general Nero who was nearly in the jaws of death during the highest fury of the onslaught managed to escape and carry all before him.

Within Zimmermanns lines had been the divisions under general Thoa Thomas and Jacksonia Evans and the cavarly divisions under supreme general Mary Hansonia Nance, the seventeenth corps under Henrique St Clare, and general Concentinian Aronburgs or Zimmermanns fierce dragoons of Concentinians and Aby sinkiliams. Over one hundred and fourty thousand were killed in these divisions, and which lost fifteen hundred thousand muskets. Two thousand eight hundred and ninty nine muskets had been captured by the enemy from Jacksonia Evans command, twelve thousand one hundred carbines, and twenty four pistols were captured from the cavarly. Evans veterans were prominient by reason of its equal and continuous service larger organization, hardest fighting, and greater number of casualties. Within its lines was Hindernines columns consisting of the left wing wi which sustained the largest precentage of losses in the unusual contest along the enemys center, also the division which sustained the greatest losses in the afternoons almost preternat ural resistance. This division also again sustained the greatest loss during its long term of service it being nine hundred and twenty one thousand at the first onslaught against general Tamerlines center.I'll have to make known to you my dear readers these forces had not lost a single color during the conflict, although ofternar and more desperately engaged than any other forces of the army. I have not told exactly the number of guns and colors captured by the christians, but nine were captured by Evans command, and fourty fell into the hands of Jacksonia Evans during this frightful onslaught. Before the success of this frightful onslaught jacksonia Evans had at least captured over six hundred battleflags, although at a cost of over three hundred thousand casulities. The cavarly divisions itself had captured more guns and colors than all the rest combined. The reverses had been many, and they began only when the cavarly had dwindled to a remnant of its former strength. Hindernine had also won the onslaught he had made though he had f allen wounded and lost fourteen brigade commanders and over three hundred thousand two hundred and twenty five men in slain, and over two thousand two hundred and twenty five regi mental commanders, and over one million men entirely.

It was this division that broke that broke through the enemys linesm routed many divisions of the enemy, made most important captures, and resumed the attacks so vigoriously and tenaciously that general Stateenis rode up to the very christian lines to surren der his army when he fell mangled and bleeding. We can also refer to its achievements as Hindernine reported when his divisions scaling the whole line captured two divisions of the glandelinian army, with thirty six hundred pieces of heavy artillery, eighty hundred colors, and nearly one million prisoners. Up to that time its record was most remarkable for it had not lost a color or a gun, although it had captured eighty four hundred standards of colors, and hndreds of thousands of prisoners, it capturing in that single bloody day more battleflags, cannon and prisoners, than it had lost during its entire service in the whole war.

The signal christian victories along the right and left gave great gratifications and encouragements to the armies of Hindernine. Every victory won by their comrades along other parts of the line was hailed with great rejoicing, by the men who were in the captured trenches, and continually under fire. Then the main change had come when Haldemann had massed his main forces which overwhelming the Glandelinians had compelled them to withdraw to other points and then retreat altogether abandonig Evangelinia Crania and form up new positions further west at the St Daninean for tifications and it was at this moment that he had fallen, even when the main armies under Tamerline learned of the disasterous defeats of their other forces, and the victorious onslaught of Ha sonia and the tru triumphant advance upon the demorilized center, it producing a demorilising effect, and convincing them of the uttermost hopelessness of their efforts, and their armies never fought with Zimmermann again, with the same dash and indomitable fortitude that had marked their conn conduct during the whole first year of the war. Even then Zimmermanns army had been increased by the return of hundreds of thousands in one week, men who had been dis disabled by w u wounds or sickness, and by additional recruits so that the christian army was in splinded condition and the equipment was never better than at any other time now. This was indeed the condition of the two other armies of the christians under general Zimmermann known as Concentinian Aronburg or the "Th Terrible warth of God" and Hansonia after they had won the battle of Jennie vivian and disabled for life their main supreme commander Mc-Hollester Johnston for the loss of the main christian general who was killed and whose name was Francis Schmidt.

The fortifications of St Daninean are located on land on both opposite banks of the Battery Line River guarding the southwest portion of vivinn Wickey, and facing these now was the extensive christian line which exte ded to the extreme left n the Esmininia and Galdon railroads nearly eighteen miles in extent. A line of formidable field fortifications had also been constructed by the main forces of the enemy including inclosed fortifications built of concrete, earth and timber and brick walls of stone surrounded by wide deep ditches connected by lines of earthworks protected by every device in the way of obstructions/ slashed timber, abatis, cheraux-de-frise, and many other footlocks of dangerous character, including two hundred and fifty six destructive batteries. The main glandelinian armies now under John and Huebaum Manley and general Johnston Jacken Manley occupied a line parellel to that of the christian line. Should this Glandelinian army withdraw and unite his forces with Goscono who had been reinstated and was then opposing the local forces it might prove serious and fatal for the latter.

Therefore the greatest activity was exserzied along the whole christian line to keep as near to Manleys line as possible to prevent his escape, by which he could make by the Angeline River. So general Zimmermann sent forces under general Meldon and Hienzes Zimmermannia to place thousands of x secret mines in the river along Manleys rear. The work was full of peril and suffering having begun way before the battle of Osmondonson had started, and was not completed untill December the 9th or tenth. General Johnston Hanson Manley the chief general of the right of the foe army realized the hopeless condition of his position and in order to withdraw successfully adopted the tatics of a dversion in his efforts to accoplish that purpose. This was done by a bold and desperate assault near the center and key of the christian position in his attack on general Meldons lines on December 4Th 1912. This plan was well conceived and admirably executed under the lead of one of the ablest generals Mc-Hollester Jennings who succeeded in capturing thise post important position with its hundredsof thousands of prisoners, as well as the adjacient lines of rifle pits occupied by a score of brigades, two of which were captured. The guns of the captured positions were turned upon the christian lines, and three batteries occupying adjacent works were abandoned by the christians and taken possession of by the Glandelinians. The assaulting columns was necessarily confused in the desperat ion of the close engagement, and the strong support which was expected to render the most important services in occupying the line was delayi delayed in coming up, thereby giving the christian troops on the right and left of the main center time to recover from the shock. A counter charge was o promptly m made by general Hindernines brother which resulted in the recapture of the christian works and lines, and with one million prisoners. Wherever the glandelinian forces had made a simultaneous advance they were whipped back by the christian troops thus tightening the stranglehold at all points of the enemy's lines rather than slackening it as was hoped by the Glandelinian generals. As prearranged the whole christian army at the point of the right was to advance immediately after this great repulse of the enemy and this effort at a serious diversion had only hastened more greater carnage, and a direct repulse of the christian troops.

After accomplishing the oj object aimed at in the vinicity of the Daninian fortifications general Robertsonia vivinia took possession of the extreme right of the christian army, while at the same time Hansonia was occupied in moving strong bodies of the second corps well to their left, with the object of turning the right flank of the glandelinian army and more considerable ground was gained in that direction during the four hours of fearful carnage that followed. Manley and Mnlet having discovered the christian maneuvers and finding out their object had then again assumed the offensive as was his way.

He concentrated all the forces available for the purpose and made a strong advance in four lines of battle against the christian line under general Daredone. This offensive movement took two divisions of the fifth corps by surprise in the thickly wooded country and was so spirited that the two divisions were forced to retreat, not so much from the destructive effects of the blow as from the audicity of the advance of the furious glandelinians. Fortunately general Daredone divisions were in a favorable position on the right of attack and while the glandelinians were advancing with their attention fixed on the fifth corps in their front, by quickly changing his line by a half left wheel he struck their four lines full upon the left flank, and rolled them up driving them from the field with their own divisions crushed to f fragments, and capturing thirty three colors, and several hundred thousand wounded prisoners.

While this was being done the two divisions of the other part, rallied on the line of the third division and made an advance, the united forces succeeding in driving the enemy back to their own position.

After this attack the other points of the christian line had been extending itself still further to the left. General Robertsonia vivinnia had occupied Failens courthouse, and Sunbeam Creek Banks, the latter being of great importance as the most available line of retreat of the glandelinian army, and so serious was the situation that the two divisions of glandelinians who had attacked Daredone was paralized. However another attack of greater violence and supported by a spasmodic artillery fire soon dislodged Daredones line and drove a part of his force back in utter confusion to the region of Failens Courthouse. Indeed this made the positions of the christian divisions completely jeopordized. General Nero and Zimmermannia were ordered to move forward to the support of the jeopordized christians and forming a junction between Failens Courthouse and the stretch of bank along Sunbeam Creek, and then added by the advance of the main cavarly ably commanded and gallently led by general Nero in conjunction with the advance of the ther cavarly forces soon resulted again in a crushing defeat of the glandelinians with the loss of many more colors a hundred guns, and nine hundred thousand killed and wounded of whom three hundred and sixty six thousand four hundred and eighty one were shot down by the forces belonging to Jacksonia Evans. He had led the van of the rushing lines, and his beautiful horse was shot within a few feet of the breastworks. Comprived with this general Nance was then ordered by Evans to move his divisions from the left of the army to Sunbeam Creek, and to report to general Hanscnia, which he did arriving there at about nine o-clock in the morning. General Hanscnia there concluded that he would not require the assistance of his division, and directed him to retrace his steps in part and attack the enemys lines near where it crossed the Child-Hood-Plant- Road. This was accomplished. The works were carried by assault at that point the enemy retreating in the direction of Beppos Courthouse, porsued by general Nances divisions. Nero with his whole cavarly forces moved to the northwest and the whole christian force under him assaulted the enemys works two miles west of the fortifications. The battle now was fearful and general Nances divisions were left entirely alone. He followed the enemy on his front to Beppo's Courthouse, where he found Gammons divisions occupying a strong position on a s coth open crest at the foot of which some nine hundred yards away ran the small stream called Sunbeam Creek.

These glandelinian troops had thrown up positions to defend their lines. The enemys right fla flank was concealed by a forest. Nothwithstanding the numbers and strength of the position Nances cavarly forces attacked in excellant order, and with impatiousity, but was repulsed with great slaughter for twenty miles in length of the whole line including major general gandling one of his under commanders who was killed by a bursting shell. A short time after a second desperate assault was made with the assistance of a powerful concentrated artillery fire, but with the same result, and the second commander general Haldemann wounded mortally. Two gallant attacks having failed, the third was successful. By making a formidable demonstration against the extreme left of the enemys lines with a cloud of skirmishers wo who charged with wild shouts strongly supported by artillery fire, the effect was to draw a considerable force from the Glandelinian right, to their extreme left, just what was desired. While this was being done a brigade was being moved under cover of the timber across Sunbeam Creek and around the extreme right flank, where it made a vigorious and sus successful assault rolling up the enemys line in confusion.

This assault was supported by the effective fire of three batteries of artillery, then with the division and by the advance of the entire command which swept the enemy from the field, leaving in the hands of the christians thirty three guns, sixty five battle-flags and some six hundred thousand wounded. Of the main force under Hanscnia and Hanscnian a line of battle ten miles in extent moved with irresistible force. Every sword rifle or cannon flashed brighter and stronger in their force and action. This fierce christian assault was met with the strongest defense. The garrison of one field fortification fought untill its force of 65,250 was reduced to three hundred men, but before it had surrendered it had placed 115,000 christians hors-de-com bat. As line after line of riflepits, intrenchments, and field fortifications were captured by the christian troops the beautiful Angelinian flags waved in triumph. The thunder f artillery from the advancing batteries broke the continued chorus of the victorious hosts as they shouted their triumph along the entire line. The big town of Jelton about five miles west of the captured glandelinian position had been partially destroyed by the Angelinian artillery fire. The cannonade had been begun as soon as the christians had pressed forward, the Angelinian gunners using every cannon and shells dropped into the streets in all parts of the town. Many of the fleeing glandelinians were killed or wounded, and scores of buildings were wrecked at one time. Early in the bombardment many of the glandelinians fled for their lives.

At other points of the battle line Glandelinian troops were massed in force under Melby and Frot Frontu respectively fifteen hundred yards from the routed lande linian columns. Heavy firing evidently of artillery had been reported from Nancy Town thirty miles from the left of the main glandelinian position. Also Angelinian forces had seized the mountian passes and had planted artillery on the heights commanding St Ann. The attempt of the poor Glandelinians to stem the christian progress by flooding the valleys of the St Ann hills with a storm of bursting shrapnell was unsuccessful. Another belief prevailed that the christian advance against the troops under Maldinia was being pushed slowly toward the left of Helmtons Turnsranndians. All of the fortifications were still holding out as only the other positions had been forced, the Angelinian troops still moving on untill the concentration of Jodo Colo, while an infantry division operating on the left flank of the Sunbeam Creek had been descriminated.

The christians who were still inactive were placing heavy batteries oc cannon north of Christinnin'S divisions of Abyssinkilians preparatory to a seige, and heavy artillery fire was heard there, the Angelinians throwing up intrenchments all the way to Christianian forces, while other intrenchments were being builded north of Dubs divisions of Dondobians. The glandelinian retreat had reached Abases line and was well carried out a report saying that the right wing of Narreds divisions of christians being completely victorious, the whole foe force in front of them having been cut to pieces and the survivors who were Guarian Gurdes being persued by Concentinian cavarly. Under this critis situation glandelinians in great numbers were massing opposite one of the christian positions believed to be weak, and the christian general staff was made fully aware of this movement, by Abyssinkilian cavarly who had made a reconnoisance of the enemys position. Hostilities were still in progress for about five miles where the glandelinian forces were still holding their own. Christianins troops had penetrated to a point within two miles of Nero which may have been their objective. The fighting at this small point was only a trifle compared to the general conflict which was raging elsewhere for the poss session of the St Dominean fortifications.

One part of the main christian line extended from Failen where the headquarters of the chief christian generals were located northward, to a point nearly touching the Angelinian frontier, then southward to a point of Formals divisions, thence westward. to Switzerininclanian at the junction of Sombriatiniorian and Sunbream creeks. In the center of the quadrangle was Lombartwithington with its stretch of great fortifications, where the Angelinian batteries were pou ding away in an attempt to desolish the glandelinian works and positions with a terrific cannonading roar heard for a hundred miles. All correspondements had been threatened with imprisonment and eben death in they attempted to send out any information of the great battles now raging.

Four thousand cannon within an hours time had been wheeled into action along a fighting front of eight miles where cartons of the Angelinian columns made a move to join Expertia and where they were engaged in a terrific encounter with some of the nearest glandelinian forces. The successful christian-advance had simultaneously brought on serious fighting with the glandelinians under laderton and Betton where heavy cavarly and infantry losses occured. At the same time a southwestern movement was well on its way where the heavy seige guns of the Angelinians tore incessantly at the glandelinian fortifications. The christian were also engaged in a serious artillery duel with general Progs glandelinian artillery while one million four hundred thousand christians were marching on.

This gave a sure sign that the christian advance could not be checked by any kind of repulses such as it had recieved under vian prander when attacking a branch of the stubborn fortifications. The christian cavarly had suffered heavy loss ses in the fighting for the possession of Helens lanes the Glandelinians checking the christian advance at this point untill general baldwin had brought up his artillery and thrown it into action. The A byssinkilian lancers the finest under general Julo Rose bore the brunt of the engagement, fighting with great valour/ charging the glandelinians in the face of heavy fire from machine guns. One charge was made by a small body of lancers against thirty three thousand glandelinians, the Abyssinkilians killing ten thousand of the enemy, but themselves ,ost more than that number and among the Abyssinkilians killed were generals Veldon and Roden grancis. Simultaneously a large body of christian s troops attacking the foe under Hania had been defeated with heavy losses and were now retreating toward the main line.. In this conflict y the glandelinian forces were aided by machine guns, and even then other attacks had been vogoriously repulsed by the glandelinians the christian attack upon the foe under Siskone and galton having been checked. But at other points the christian attack had penetrated along the entire right, a small detatch ent trying the coup-de-main with great boldness but was unsuccessful. Some of the cavarly rode through a portion of Callies glandelinian troops with the intention of seizing the commander there, who only saved himself by flight. A large section of Callies troops had been captured by the Angelinians but neverh nevertheless, the fortifications were still holding out, and the Angelinians had to retire, being exposed to the full fire of the fortifications. The higher ground in front of the zone scene of conflict was shrouded in smoke which became high and still in the wid windless air. The deep snow was trampled by many f feet and strewn with corpses of men and horses.

Thousands of the Angelinians were mowed down in front of the trenches and entanglements by the gun fire of the foe, but they were replaced by others who crawled forward like mice. In certain places in the fighting zone the ground was covered continually with dead. These Angelinian assailants however tore their way through the foe line confront ing Christianin where fighting of the most violent fury had taken place, the fre capturing twenty seven Abyssinkilian cannon and putting up the stiffest kind of a fight while retiring slowly. The Angelinians were sacrificing scores of thousands of men in the column front attacks at every point, these assaults being so extremely savage that the scores of survi ing brigades of the attacking forces had actually reached the second line of works, but these brigades were entirely wiped out. The Abyssinkilian dead were piled in most tinns, the main line of assailants being checked at one point with still more heavier losses. At the same time the ninth army corps reinforced by cavarly had crossed a zone that had been mined and which had been exploded and members of a whole christian batalion were killed while in a space of two thousand yards over 19,000 wounded were picked up. All this time many of the fortifications were still being bombarded with heavy shells but were not as yet damaged, while the glandelinian fire was working great havoc among the christians.

In the attack on the fortification of London the Glandelinians permitted the Angelinians to draw almost to the ambient of the fortresses then they let loose all their guns the slaughter being appalling, and under the annihilating fire, here and from the other fortifications the Angelinians were forced to retire all along the line, while after a still more terrible cannonade the Angelinian columns approached in columns reaching the glacis of one of the fortifications where the heavy defence guns were unable to reach them. General Hymann sent artillery to a point where the christian infantry would be shelled, and again these Angelinians were swept back from xapturing the position.

Simultaneously an immense division of Glandelinian cavarly supported by brigades of cavarly and infantry and by parks of artillery engaged and defeated near the fortification of Turtueton a big division of Angelinian cavarly also supported by infantry and artillery. The fighting was extremely fierce and at first resulted in the Angelinians being driven back. The fighting up to this time lasted for an hour, being the first considerable battle of the whole seige of Evangelinia Crania and upwards of over twenty thousand Angelinian soldiers all dead were counted in a space of ninty yards and one thousand long. Great quantitiescof booty were collected on the battlefield and many horses were also captured, the christian losses being vesy heavy three fifths of their troops being killed or wounded. The Angelinians took one hundred and twenty Glandelinian officers, but no generals and many hundreds of prisoners and also capu captured fourty pieces of artillery.

At the extreme center of the line the fighting still went on under thrilling conditions. The first phase in an attack on two Glandelinian forces by Angelinian forces greatly sjp superior in numbers. The two Glandelinian divisions fell back, but were reinforced and assumed the offensive well supported by artillery. This severe counter attack caused the christians to retreat precipitately, leaving behind them a large number of killed, wounded, and abandoning a battery of artillery, thirty machine guns, and ten wagon loads of ammition. The Glandelinian troops followed up their advantage, but an Angelinian battery surprised the dragoons which was soon destroyed.

The effect of the double success was immediately perceptible. Not only was the forwar movements of the Angelinians stopped, but their columns fell back, closely followed by tthe brave Glandelinians. ninty Angelinian officers and general Manning, and one hundred and eleven thousand wounded fell into the hands of the foe as prisoners of war. The horrible quality of the projectiles used by Angelinian heavy artillery artillery was convincingly demonstrated during the bombardment of all the fortifications.

More than one thousand shells containing ornerous charges of high explosives weighing altogether one thousand pounds or even three thousand pounds, were fired from a battery of hundreds of centimeters at a distance of about six and a lahf miles. The total result of this avalanch of iron explosives was fourty two thousand killed, and two hundred thousand wounded among the Glandelinians. The town of Evangelinia Crania and even Norma Cossinia were razed as if shaken by an earthquake. It was terrible.

Following this terrible battle the hospital falcilities proved inadequate to care for the almost incredible numbers of wounded. Not only were the all the hospitals filled, but schools, churches and hotels were crowded to their fullest capacity, even then many multitudes of wounded had to be conveyed to other towns. The Angelinian forces all the while were trying to take St Mary's passes but had been expelled to retire. The Angelinian soldiers fought gallently in their desperate efforts to storm the Glandelinian batteries which commanded the passes, but their desperate charges were futile, and whole multitudes of the Angelinians again fell dead or wounded beneath the storm of bullets, canister and shells fro rapid fire guns, cannons, and musketry. The counter attacks of the Glandelinians were not confined to one particular point, but the hostilities ranged for miles at a time, resolving at many points into fierce artillery duels between the Angelinian batteries, and Glandelinian guns, the christian guns having been dragged up on lofty hill slopes slopes with extraod-extraordinary exertions on the part of the Angelinians.

The Glandelinians indeed took many prisoners but only wounded, the christian ll losses being heavy at one point where the christian line had been weakened by the accurate and incessant artillery fire of the Glandelinian reserves which were thrown forward at a charge d uble quick, but the efforts to capture the guns with cold steel proved useless. Hundreds of thousands of horsemen even rushed against a rain of steel bullets, and horses and men fell in long massive lines or columns. The Angelinians who opposed the foe were supported by a long chain of batteries consisting of mitrailleuses and other quick firing guns which wrought exorucisting havoc among the Glandelinians. Lancers and other cavarly forces made the charge and went at it again and again, but the cavarly w'o tried to carry the works were mowed down in monsterous droves. The Angelinian infantry men kept up a steady rifle fire, but the fire of the machine guns was reserved untill the defenders could almost see the whites of their eyes. Then a stream of deadly fire ran along the long stretch of barricades. Thousands upon thousands reeled in their saddles and fell but over the prostrate bodies galloped the rear lines. With bravery which excited the admiration of the Angelinians the Glandelinians charged into the jaws of death.

but flesh and blood could not withstand the christian fire and the surviving Glandelinians were forced to dea draw off. This contest however was a keenly contested one. One big force of Angelinian cavarly men were simultaneously surprised by Glandelinians, and suffered severe losses. And then at the same time incessant booming of legions of heavy guns was audible all along the line and this was punctuated by scores of thousands of sharper detonations as the Glandelinians blew up the bridges just in the nick of time to prevent the fresh Angelinian cavarly from crossing them, and many Angelinians were lost with the destruction of the biggest bridges of steel ever seen in that world. With the bridges destroyed the fighting resolved itself mostly in artillery duels the shrapnell bursting and leaving a long trail of white smoke while large squadrons of dragoons tried to penetrate the foe lines dashing directly into a barricade of fallen trees, but the Glandelinians behind the barricades opened fire and all the dragoons were either killed or wounded. The only living things to surmount the barrior were seventeen riderless horses maddened by fear. In front of the barricade the Angelinians lay like a hedge. The Angelinian losses in this charge was three thirty three thousand in killed and onver one hundred thousand in wounded.

The Angelinian leaders apparently sacrificed their men without any scruples. during the fight the Angelinians were forced to pass several broken bridges were they were exposed to heavy firing. The retiring survivors left piles of dead and wounded at these bridges Terrible was the carnage where the Angelinian cavarly exposed to the gathling guns of the enemy fell in great droves. In an effort to revenge the blow to the cavarly general Fredrick led a division of two million eight hundred thousand Angelinian infantry, cavarly and dragoons, supported by artillery, with machine guns and as the tremendous onslaught was undertaken in which a division of dragoons was annihilated by the gun fire of the enemy, and seven regiments of Abyssinkilians torn to pieces, the entire seventh army corps took part and the whole country around quaked as if shaken by a severe earthquake. Indeed the temporal lifting of the smoke revealed thousands of Angelinian corps and also the advance of the christian forces against general Lichtenanns long gray line. This advance was as irrestible irrestible irrestible as an ocean tide. The poor Glandelinians stood hard against the terrific onset but their whole line was crushed to fragments, and the survivors fled panic stricken. Meanwhile the Angelinian artillery was concentrated upon the Bull fortifications of St Damianian and under cover of this artillery fire a large division of Abyssinkilian troops sud surrounded one of the forts when suddenly an immense cloud arose followed by a terrific explosion.

The Glandelinians having mined that fort blew it up and thousands of the Angelinians with it. The upshot of this brilliant stand made by the Glandelinians was the maintenance of all fortifications the capture of hundreds of thoiseands of fresh wounded, and seven hundred guns, the death of eighty thousand, and the disablement of many more hundreds of thousands, and the defeat of two crack corps. All the Glandelinian defenders still held the fortifications the fighting in the works being an anachronism, going back to the primitive methods of hand to hand conflict with bayonet charge, and lances, and sabre thrusts. The execution on both sides was fierce, the toll of dead and wounded growing in ridges. At nearly every point over nine hundred thousand fresh Angelinians were continually thrown against the well defended sailents in front of the fortifications it being a most desperate attempt to capture and sweep the lines, the advance and attack though repulsed again and again being resumed under a galling fire and supported by a strong fire of eighty nine extra christian batteries in a vain attempt to silence the Glandelinian guns.

The A infantry went into action under the coverof the big gunfire, and moved forward in close close order in what looked to be anirrestible tide of most determined men.... ithin a short time the leading columns had captured and overran a suburb of the Glandelinian position only a shot short distance from the main line of the fortifications. The advance by this direction explained why the Angelinian artiocry artillert y artillery fire had been centered on the fortifications, but the only effent was to dismount only three of the mortars within one of the weaker fortifications. When the Angelinian troops by theirsplinded and orderly advance had occupied the surburb of the fortifications, the other fortifications commanding at this point found that their fire would not halt the advance, and began to pour forth their own legions of troops to make a stand with small arms, and oppose a barricade of soldiers, where the fortificatio s had failed.

Ten hundred thousand infantry rushed from the Evangeline St Claire fortifications, and from the St Claire to reinforce the thirty hundred thousand thrown forward to stay the christian advance..... Thus practically the entire strength of the mobile garrison of this small point was concentrated against the overwhelming christian columns, and the fortifications on account of the proximity of the waring r troops had to turn their fire to harass the rear guard of the Angelinians and attacking columns of Abyssinkilians that would be brought up for reinforcements. On the roads between the surburbs the over advancing christian columns and the defenders came into physcial contact at scores of points at once, and the fighting was the most desperate, and savage since the starting of the seige of Evangelinia Crania.....

The Glandelinians fought not only to hold the fortifications proper but to drive the christians back from the suburb where their strategic position made the fall of the fortifications of only a matter of fi four hours if the christians could hold gthe position they had captured and bring u reinforcements. Never did a fortification hood out so stubbornly. And none of the fortifications had been silenced or captured, but the christians were in overwhelming strength in the surburb and were hurling column after column to the attack. But without success and soon the glandelinians were enabled to press them back. Though defeated with terrible loss the christians were bound to retake the suburb of the fortifications and made another charge that was successful defeating a large force of Glandelinians mostly cavarly while now the christian shell fire m became more deadly and accurate. The continual storm of bolts bombs evidently exhausted the stores of ammunition of one of the christian batteries but nevertheless all the bombs hurled upon the fortifications exploded with tremendous force and three thousand glandelinian artillery men and gunners were killed outright the bodies of many being blown to bits. Even desperate charges were made again and again but no absolute headway against the fortifications were made. The discharge of the terrible cannons caused the houses in all the nearest towns to shake to their foundations; and carcesses of horses were laying everywhere in the fields. The carnage in the woods of this battle had been terrible. One of the glandelinian brigades t wo million strong though terribly descriminated held a position untill another division came up with artillery. The glandelinian forces then advanced and pushed back the attacks; while the Shoenamician cannons immediately sent in such a thunderous accuracy of firing that in less than half a an hour a christian battery of five hundred cannon was silenced, and half of its guns demolished. The air was thick with cannon powder. Forward went more infantry; and fresh rifle fire added to the increasing boom of the bigger guns. Forests seemed on fire and still the conflict raged.

All the time the cannonading continued ren relentlessly whereupon the glandelinian troops were compelled to charge the new batteries bayonetting all the gunners, but for a time all their bravery was useless and they were compelled to withdraw before the ire fire and bristling walls of christian bayonets of the main line of Angelinian infantry. Along one part of the line of artillery the carnage had been more indescribable, the earthworks becoming so ja m jammed with dead that hundreds of the dead remained standing upright where they had been shot.

THE MAIN ACTIONS OF THE SEIGE OF THE EVANGELINIA GRANIA HORROR: STORMING THE ST. DANIEAN FORTIFICATIONS WITH REDOUBLED VIOLENCE.

While all these engagements had been going on at other points a terrible cry rang out along general Evan's lines;

''The enemy: The enemy''.

Hundreds of the officers r shed out to the lines to span the surface of the clear snow grounds outside the wokx fronting Sunbeam Creek. One of the chief officers now came out of his tent followed by general Jack Evans and he looked at the southern horizon ward the southwest.

''A snowstorm is coming and it will hold them back'' He said with a curious look. The officer once more looked at the sky. His trained eyes seemed to tell him that a wild snowstorm would soon break out, and that the glandelinians might be held back by it.

''The glandelinians are right near the works now.'' Cried one of the Angelinian officers as he pointed to an army in gray which just then appeared within three rods of the works. The Angelinian officer indeed uttered an exclamanation lf of astonishment for it seemed as if the body of men just sighted, had come up from the ground itself. Surely they were not there a few minutes before, but seemed miles away, and now here they were moving forward cautiously, and the christian officer looked curiously at general Evans.....

''Where on earth did they come from, the ground!'' The general asked his superior.

''I can't c say but there they are''.... Was the answer.

Yes indeed, there were the strange columns of glandelinians a hundred thousand or more in number and about them there was something quite uncanny. At first no flags, or banners could be seen and then they also appeared seemingly to arise from the ground as it were and indeed the Angelinians felt quite queer.....

''They may be phantoms.'' Cried the officer.

''Yes '' Exclaimed another officer with a shiver. ''I would rather meet a million Glandelinians single handed than these queer things. Look at that flag''.

And the officer handed the glasses to general Evans. ''Did you ever see it before.....;

The general put the glasses to his eyes, for the column of men now recoiling were only half a mile off now, and gazed long and closely at the flag. The flag had fluttered out its folds, and he saw upon its surface of blue and red and yellow colors a bar of crossed bones and skulls, and an image of Satan dangling from where the s swords crossed by the tail, while on the other side was a picture of a glandelinian soldier pulling out the intestines of a little girl.

''Queerest and most horrible looking flag I have ever seen'' He said. ''Maybe those Saints the Vivian Girls who had brought their firm friend santa glaus and already escaped again to our lines a few days before knows something about those queer men.''

One of the generals bounded away and had them by their guardian foldi fondling the hair of one of them.

''Who and what are those queer men out there?'' Asked the general who was standing in back of Evans who arm was clasped gently across her beautiful neck, pointing toward the uncanny glandelinians.

Violet looked serious as she answered after looking with her glass:

''Its a large force of glandelinian infantry under general Braggard; and I believe I know why they are there. See their flag! The word phantom army is printed on it.''

The officer fell back with a gasp.

''The what!'' He cried.

''There printed on the flag, Phantom Army'' Repeated violet. ''They are tricking us.''

''Fudge'' Exclaimed the officer. ''You children must not have been in the army very long. They surely must be real ghosts and))-----''

''I have been in the army as long as the war raged from Crowley, or Jennie-Wren-town at least. ''Was Violet's truthful words. ''Thuh I d not know every league of country I know the wicked glandelinian armies and their wat ways. They are no phantoms; and there are not such things. If you are a catholic you would not think such foolish ideas. The men are real flesh and blood. They may call themselves ''The Phantom army'' beuse they appear in strange places; and in strange ways. But they are just as flesh; and their muskets,)))''---''

''We will try their muskets.'' Cried the Angelinian leader. ''By neptune I will show the traitor who are leading the pre practional Ghost army that we are as ghosts too. They are now rushing forward at a charge and shortening the distance between us. I'm glad that my main forces are here alright for we can surely repulse them. A legion of them seems to be rushing on.''

''To your guns men.'' Roared the christian commanders as they stamped the ground eagerly. ''A ghost army eh! We can show them that we will blow such uncanny divisions from the earth!.'' And as Evans gunners sprang forward to help man the guns; the Angelinian leader took another look at the queer army that was now coming on with tremendous fury. All the Angelinian can oneers were stationed at their guns; and as it was still dark though early in the morning the scene was really weird for the moon cast a f ghastly light upon the snow covered land. In a few minutes the ghostly foe were within cannon shot range; and in an instant the christian guns belched forth. As the smoke cleared away the thousands of the first line were lying in iles piles the main columns being parted by many scores of large gaps; and scores of glandelinian officers lay on the ground. The Angelinians instantly saw that it was no gho t ghost army only that they had been decieved and another frightful broadside was delivered. The shot shell and canister tore many large gaps in the gray lines and mowed the men down like grass; but still the survivors utterly reckless came on at a rush though another broadside tore their main column again to fragments. A ray of weird moonlight came in from an opening of a near by forest and the distant sweep of the snow covered land was more ghostly. The moonlight indeed gave the advancing lines and land, heartfelt terrifying weirdness that almost chilled even violet and her sisters. What was the meaning ot of it? It certainly drew a shiver from the hearts of the little girls. Ms moon was now hidden bei behind a bank of dark snow clouds and the advancing; foe land, and sky became as dark as the mouth of a cavern, then the moon came out again shedding its same weirdness m ; more terrible. Violet and her sisters never understood the meaning. Indeed now the silence of the ghostly atmosphere was now broken by a well planned and executed attac upon six hundred thousand Angelinians by general Amiel Peathike. Without creating any kind of alarm except by their ghostly play or making any preliminary demonstration of active hostilities untill they had started to rush forward; the glandelinians in great numbers had advanced suddenly without skirmishers or advanced guards; and general Marcus divisions not able to withstand the onse t was scattered and routed but as the picked men of this command retired, the glandelinians reached the main christian line by a rapid and charged nearly as soon as the retreating pickets.....

It resulted in awful confusion and then the christian commander under general Watermann was driven back through the forests and across the fields in great disorder. The enemys advanc advance indeed seemed to be made with great success; or started to but generals Saul and David Anchutz were ordered to suport support watermanns divisions, while general Henry Ablaon was ordered t o to move to the left into a dense wood and meet the advance of the enemy moving in that direction.

David met marcus who reported that the enemy was advancing upon Watermann in a solid body, and that one of his cavarly leaders was being borne to the rear and the cavarly division in a retreat under heavy fire.

David rallied a good part of the cavalry and checked the advance of the Glandelinians in that direction; though he got wounded and his horse to crp crippled by the enemys heavy and continuous fire. General Waterman lost his right arm and many thousands of gallant had fallen within those few minutes. After the enemys vigorious assault was in full progress and a desperate conflict raging parids right wing was overthrown despite the enemy fighting overwhelming numbers, and the Angelinians driven from their strong position with terrible losses and seriously disabled but not entirely demorilized. An effort to reinforce parids division was made by drawing a portion of the second corps and some of the seventh under general Irwin Pirkshire but a terrible massacre was the result and Pirkshire was captured. Terrible was the series of charges made upon the christians. The forces under general Angelic, Bel Bellona Giacomo Nelsion, and Goodchilds stood against one of the most heavy onslaughts, but these whole entire forces were soon withdrawn the enemy making too vigorious an attack to be withstood.

At another point the glandelinians had been at first repulsed with disasterious loss but again their columns debouched from the cover of the woods to which they had retreated and as they rushed forward with frightful yells they had to cross a wide open lane sloping down to Sunbeam Creek and the moment they appeared their main lines were subjected to a very heavy artillery fire from the christian cannon; under general Baldwin Henry arranged thickly on the field in front of the nearest christian positions. Yet despite the large gaps in their lines the enemy maintained excellent order but screaming with their storm of yells and curses and blasphemies in a perfect devilish cadence. Coming up where they met a well directed steady fire they attacked with great ferocity and savagerty, and also with desperation and enthusiasm and fought the christian veterans with awful energy, but finally their lines were broken and thrown back in disorder. Repeated assaults were made with the same results and then again division after division were moved forward meild the dreadful carnage only to be hurled back crushed and torn to pieces.

The glandelinians suffered severely from the artillery fire each time they charged, and large brigades had been decimated. At all points of the line the christians under general Evans were successful. General Johnsons brigades moved onto the fierce fields in the second line and met one of these series of assaults made by general Hicksonin sandfords glandelinians.

While this was going on general Richard later and Rickson Gallion suddenly fell upon Hinderninks whole command of Abyssinkilians with a heavy force of men. The conflict was fearful raging desperately, and resulting in still heavier losses, and as it went on general Hans franklin himself came riding up in a few minutes with a number of his divisions, and said excitedly to Hansonin who also arived;

"Your excellency the enemy are coming in great numbers from another quarter. This is a trick to catch us at an disadvantage." Then

Then other brigades came up under Gallis and they with other christian divisions now held the enemy at bay while the main body of Hin derninks men made their retreat. Two hundred and twenty cannon were now brought forward and these played awful havoc among the gray lines until the coming of more and more of these forced the brave defenders to retreat. A glandelinian officer angry because a line of christians took defense behind a board fence dashed up to within a short distance of the guns and with a volume of wicked oaths and blasphemies defied the Angelinians to charge. In another moment a musket volley laid the rash fellow low. General Bob hearing of the desperate attack divided one half of his cavarly force, sending half along the road and the other throw through a partly open wood where they could strike the enemys flank, and throw them into confusion.

Their coming would not be noticed, and they could surprise the enemy on account of some hills which would hide them until the last moment so that while Bob was attacking the rear and taking all the attention, the others could approach. On dashed general Bob and his squadrons. General Clybourn who had returned to Bob with his force, having command of the other detatchment and eager to do something. The christian cavarly rushed on with the greatest exciitement, and a sudden was the counter attack, the christians having come on in whirlwind fashion that the glandelinians were taken by surprise and for a time there was great confusion. They presently rallied however and were about to attack Bobs force when general Clybourn and his detatchment created a diversion and caused more confusion among the enemy, the glandelinians evidently thinking the entire christian army was upon them. The rear guard dashed ahead in the wildest confusion and dismay, and Bob had the opportunity to join his forces and then hurl them on after the enemy with a shout. A part of the main body now came to the aid of the rear guard and the christians realized they would have to retreat very shortly or be overwhelmed by mere force of numbers. They held a position in the road where it was difficult difficult for the enemy to get at them, and sent in a murderous fire, showing the utmost bravery, but soon a larger body of the enemy came rushing on with incredible fury driving Bobs forces from their position.

The left wing of the glandelinians assailed again the christian lines under the various commanders, and again fell upon their position in heavy masses driving them back crushed and mangled and causing the survivors to become panic stricken.....

Never was an assault delivered with more gallant grandeur enthusiasm. Across a large plain the rout progressed in a stampede. On the Chalton Lillian Run a portion of the christian troops near Hannonins main line made a stand but were soon driven again in the same hopeless rout leaving dead and wounded everywhere. The gray lines pressed forward now broken and disorganized by the density of brush and deep snow, the briars tearing their uniforms away, now halting to le deliver a volley upon some regiment, or fragment of the Angelinian troops that would not move as fast as the others.

In the meantime the most of general Irvines command having rallied after their defeat in the morning and having recieved his reserves had held his own enemies at bay bit despite his own successes which caused the seige of Evangelinia Granis to be more tighter, general Irvin was almost heartbroken over general Hansonins failure to take the St Dan Danielian fortifications and decided to advance his own forces himself to relieve the attack on Evans, and to also capture the fortifications himself.

He had long before vowed vengeance on the glandelinians for their butcherins of the innocent children and all prisoners who would not give up their parolos were shot or hung without trial. He had no heart for the condemned glandelinian prisoner s and many a glandelinian had failed to yeild and were dragged away and shot.

"I'll fix all you child butchers." He had said with a pitiless scowl. "You have no mercy on poor little hel-less c ildren, so neither will I show you any mercy."

General was through with all mercy for glandelinians and no prisoners who would not turn back to God and desist in their rebellion were spared. General Irvin was already sitting by his table in his headquarters looking at the plans or maps of the fortifications, and having given it a full examination he went outside and hailed one of his officers who came galloping up on his horse, and drawing in his reign dismounted, and ran up to general Irvin saluting.

"I have here a map of the fortifications of St Danielson." The great christian general said saluting in return. "We have been waiting long enough to get there to relieve the attack on general Evans and Hansonia, and we will have to assail the fortifications right away. By my plans I intend to attack all the smaller fortifications first. Then to surrounds the St Danielson fortifications. I t wished to see general Hanson my brother about my plans and general Baldwin too. It is reported that general Hinderninks has repulsed the attacks of the enemy upon him, and I intend to immediately follow up the advan ge of the great conflict and support Evans before his lines are forced."

GENERAL VIVIAN AGAIN PUTS HIS OWN FORCES INTO THE ACTION DURING THE LATTER MORNINGS CONFLICT AT SUNBEAM CREEK.....

While general Irvin Vivian had sent the plans to general Hanson who was reported reforming his own fresh beaten divisions general Irvin heard queer sounds like children suffering from croup, and to his amazement he saw a perfect tidal wave of glandelinians approaching swiftly.

"The enemy are advancing" cried all his nearest officers rushing rushing up to general Irvin. "Kinderninks army is already driven from its position."

"Prepare the divisions before they strike here." Ordered general Vivian. He at once made a dash for a new portion of the line and soon had a good portion of these commands in line of battle and resisting the attack of the enemy with all their might, blowing up all the creeks around the region of the Sunbeam stream; until the water was swirling in wrecks wreckage from the awful gun fires. It indeed was a most terrific attack, and as the glandelinians had at first struck general Kinderninks they had taken the christians by surprise, so furiously had the ass assault been d delivered that within a few minutes after the Angelinians under Kinderninks had been driven into indescribable confusion multudes of the Angelinians being hurled back crushed and mangled. Kinderninks had strove with might and main to rally his panic stricken columns by supporting it with his main forces and heavy parks of artillery, and did succeed in rallying them, but not without the most terrific slaughter he had ever seen among his own lines in any battle ever fought before. The glandelinians had struck against other portions of general Irvins pos tion a few minutes after and with a full sweep and a most fearful storm of battle that he had ever seen raged and for a time a good part of his first divisions were literally carried away by the force of the impact of the glandelinians. It seemed as if hell itself had risen among the christian lines for general Vivian had managed to get most of his line prepared before the main assault of the enemy extended alongthis lines, and here the attack though repulsed with frightful slaughter at last was gradually resumed and with redoubled fury and slowly but surely everything seemed to fade away into the murk of powder smoke. General Irvin thought to himself that he had seen never seen the a enemy attack so furiously since the battles before and a continuous booming of thousands of cannon made him understand that also Baldwin was having his own hands full.

Along general vivians left grand division the Glandelinians assaulted with the greatest fury than ever at any other part of the line and general vivians officers kept racing back and forth among the men encouraging them and now little Gertrude Angeline the child rebel came within sight of the terrible scene having been attracted by the scrapplitting din and when she saw what was going on she was horrified. It was Johnston Jackson Stanley who was throwing the assault upon general vivians lines.

She wondered if the great general had any sons&daughters besides the ones she had seen but she did not care to mention anything now as she saw the general was too busy. She also wondered if heaven was very far, and wondered if she would get there if she would summon up the nerve to help the poor general by her presence. She wished very badly to go there as could be seen by the pleading look in her face; and whose dark blue eyes were filled with tears and she str steadily watched the terrible scene.She indeed wished she could go there where she was sure her father and sister was and see her friend Jesus as she loved Him and wished to be folded in His arms. indeed the poor child was about to cry her yearning was so great. She had remembered when general vivian had decided to adopt her, and had told her that she may go to heaven some day, and then had shown her the pictures of his daughters, when they were very young . General vivian had them wrapped up in his coat pocket, and having taken them out and unfolding the paper had handed the pictures to the child, who had looked at them carefully .Oh how she wished that they were her own sisters and how she had wished to see them once again. She had remembered when general vivian had asked her how she would have liked him to be her step father, and she remembered when he had asked the question he had lifted her and embraced her and laid his head fondly against hers. She remembered when she answered that she would like to have a good step father, and not a cruel one, and that she pleased her arms around his neck and hugged him closely. But she had known that he would not be mean, and had answered that she would like to have him for a ste father, but that she had asked him if he had a lady who could be a mama to her. He had answered yes, but s she was war far away, and as he said this she remembered that he had placed a pair of pretty bands around her neck As he had then asked her what Church she belonged to, and she answered that she was a catholic, and then she had asked him if she could go to heaven now. Poor general vivian had been touched to the heart by the childs yearnings to see god. He knew that it was a sin to kill the child no matter why, and he did Not know what to do. He asked the little girl if she would like to do, and if she was afraid to die. "No no "the child had answered shaking her pretty head. "I'm not a fraid to die, nd I'm not wishing to die, but I don' t want to be killed, for then my slayer will be a murderer. I don't mind dying other ways but it breaks my heart to see any one commit a murder."

Little Gertrude Angeline had remembered yj that the great general had said: "And you will not be killed by the Glandelinians as long as I have you" and then he had ordered his orderly to bring her a glass of milk and a ni ce piece of kade cake. He then asked her if she was afraid to be killed in accidents, but little Angeline looking innocently into his face had answered:

that she was not afraid to die in any way if she was in the State of grace. He had to then heard general vivian tell her that it was the only way to get to heaven by dying, and then he told her to pray to god to take her to Heaven, and that he would be sure that He would. He had told her that god loves little children best of all, and will grant her any wish in time. He had then lifted the child up and pleased her plant against his n and he could feel her heart beating as he asked:

"Who would you let let into your little heart! Christ or the devil!"

"I'd shut it and look it on the devil" Gertrude had answered." But I would l always leave it open for Dear Jesus Christ."

"What an innocent little girl she is" she had heard general vivian murmur to himself "And she yearns for heaven." Then he had asked her:

"did you ever see a big fight between the armies of Glandelinia and Angelinia and how they made the charges!" And as he had asked this question he had again embraced her and stroked her beautiful long hair. The little girl had answered that she had never seen such big fights but she had asked if the gray coats were Glandelinians especially those who were the green uniforms. General vivian had answered that they were the Guarian curdes who were the green, and that those wearing the deep blue were the Mc-Hollastinians and he had said this that these very Glandelinians would cut all beautiful littls children to pieces. But they will not do it because you are under my care now." In what he said. H then asked her if the glandelinians had ever chk checked her when she was in their power in the island prisons. The little girl had answered that one man did and he hard as he could, while an officer came tward her with an ugly knife in his hand intending to cut her open. but she said that several officers who had a little pity for her ordered them to leave her alone. She remembered that just at this moment that the orderly had come with a pitcher of milk and a large piece of strawberry shortcake, and handed it to the general, who gave it to the hungry child, who had gasped with her wide blue eyes ups opened wide in surprise:

"Oh is that for me!"

She remembered that the general had said that she could drink all the milk she wanted, and eat asmuch cake as she could. She could drink all the milk she threw her arms around He neck and kissed him)

"Oh you are a kind man I did not ask for it though I'm hungry, but you had it brought to me anyway. Could I please have some strawberries and ice cream some time!"

She had remembered that the general had answered:

Anything you wish my little angel."

Then he had given orders to the soldiers to bring a dish of strawberries and the dish of the best kind of ice cream. Then she found herself c ensted on a chair nearest to him and as she started to eat the cake he began to write in a very busy manner. Little Gertrude who had been happy now watched him with wide open eyes as she ate the cake and drank the glass of milk. She had wondered what he was writing, but curiousity could not yet get the best of her, and she did not ask him. She had noticed his handsome uniform and the beautiful shoulder strappings, and then the religious medals on his coat and by the gold scabbard he wore that he was a great supreme supreme general. She had then wondered if he was ever going to get through with the writing, and she now rose up and glanced over his shoulder at it. He was writing very fast, but neatly also, and she discovered that it was to the other supreme christian general as the same general Gordon was signed on top of the note. It was also about her as he had wrote about her wish of going to heaven. At last she had seen him write his own name at the bottom and as she glanced in more closer he had looked up at her inquiringly. Then he also asked her her full name which she told him was Evangeline St clare 2 Aronburg. At the answer the general had given a surprise of astonishment, and stood up from his seat.

"Your full name is what!" He gasped.

She had again answered the truth.

He had then asked her what her father was and his name and was still more amazed when she answered that it was Augustine Aronburg. General vivian had read the story of "Uncle Tom's Cabin" so much that he knew it by heart, and he had remembered the little Evangeline St clare and her father Augustine St clare who was a tall stout man. He had then asked her again what his full name was or how many he had, but the little girl had answered that it was all, and at the same time her eyes brimed with tears. He had been killed in trying to save her sister from the assassins. The general then asked her if he had ever been a soldier, but while she was trying to keep back the tears, the child had answered that he was no soldier; or never had been but that she had an uncle, but that she had given him up as dead, for she had not recieved any more letters from him, and then she had asked him that if he was still alive yet would he try to have him located and general vivian had not the courage to tell her that he did not know where her uncle was, but still it was impossible to conceal it. So he had told her that he had never seen her uncle declaring that he had already lost an untold number of men during the past battles; but had never seen any man who was her uncle, not knowing that the one who went by the name of Whilliamsburger Zimmermann was the very man.

"Then he is not here!" The poor child had asked with a sob. "If he is dead I hope he died like a hero and is in heaven."

And when she had these experiences she had been considerably younger. Now all these thoughts passed through her mind as she w watched the great contest and now several officers were seen to be galloping up to general vivian who handed them each a roll of paper.

"I'm glad you came" she heard the general say as the roar of battle was slackening somewhat. "See that this reaches general Baldwin These messan messages are very important and it must reach him as soon as possible"

As the little girl daringly crept closer as she feared no bullets or any danger, she heard one of the generals say:

"Your excellency general vivian" Do you know a certain man a general by the name of Concentinian Aronburg whose middle name is Alfred St clare?"

"His name is what?" Gasped the general. "Alfred St Clare?" Why he is——"

"Cutting the Glandelinian army to pieces and if the enemy cannot force him the battle for the three Monleys is lost. This general by that name is the one called Whilliamsburger zimmermann and there is another general by the name of Augustine St clare standing outside also waiting for you to send him orders. His own forces have arrived to reinforce you only an hour ago and also has cut to pieces an enemy assault and now he has confidence of victory and declares that if you send more men to you we can easily hold our position. He has on a Gray Universitian uniform and you could even easily recognise general Whilliamsburger zimmermann ."

"Cutting the glandelinian army that attacks him to pieces!" General vivian gasped.

"Well let general Augustine St clare in and I'll do for him what I can."

He motioned to the soldier who had just come up to advance forward.

"I wish you to go and tell general Baldwin to commonade kinderinnes assailants, and then to scout on the enemy." Said general vivian "I would like to know if they have any child captives and the strength of the enemy forces who are attacking us, and who their main general is. But do you think you could do it? It's quite risky, especially during a battle of this character."

''I have just come back from that trip.''Answered the soldier saluting.
''Yes.''
''Yes sir, and Baldwin is heavily assaulted himself and is unable to aid Kinderwine with his guns. How great a number the child slave and captives are I cannot tell but the nearest stockades in the fortifications are jammed with them. They got over three hundred thousand cannon also in their position, and have sixty batteries of the heaviest cannons guarding the plains of Sunbeam Run. And the main commander of the assailants as I believe is Mc-Hollester Johnston who is planning to concentrate one half of his forces to resume the attack on our main center, and try to break your lines as well as Hansons, and as for Hanson he is still inactive. But Crews assailants have been descriminated . The well planned attack has already gone into execution as I believe from the severity of the battle now raging, and I thought I would tell you of the danger that is threatening before it is too late, for though the foe is repulsed along our lines they will only go at it again, and with redoubled fury.''
''This is important news.''Said general Vivian, patting the Angelinian officer fondly on the shoulder. ''Reace to general Hansons lines as fast as you can and warn him. If the attack really proves too heavy despite our overwhelming numbers I'll be on hand to take in the proceedings.''
After saluting the Angelinian soldier left and soon a another general came up followed by a man who was dressed in the full uniform of a Calverinian general. Gertrude shrank back in great fear and gazed at him curiously from a very safe distance. Fifteen other Angelinian officers now arived and general Vivian dismissed the man who had brought the general who was no other than general Augustine St Clare. He had recognized the man and now indeed as the christians were progressing better in the battle they were bringing up prisoners by the thousands and soon there was a volume of cursing and swearing, and three Angelinians came staggering up through the smoke haze dragging a real and furious Glandelinian by the two arms and coat collar.
''This is an infernal outrage.''Fairly screamed the glandelinian officer his eyes fairly blazing with rage''You are nothing but impudent christian dogs hi which will get the same kind of a death as the christian children, if you don't let me go.''
''This glandelinian officer has been caught trying to injure little fugiti ve children whom he persued to our lines ''said one of the men coming up at this moment. ''I and my three men while your lines were pressing back the assailants sprurpsed and captured this murderer just as he was trying to beat a three year old go girl to death, though he did succeed in wounding her severely.''
General Vivian recognized the glandelinian as one of the old time child slave masters is one of the plantations in Calverinia. quick as lightning one of the Angelinians drew his sabre and threatening to pierce the glandelinian ordered him to rise. The officer got to his feet and attempted to spring at general Vivian, but the Angelinians held him firmly despite his volume of wicked words and imprecations.
''I told you I would make you eat your lying words.''Roared general Vivian in a rage himself.''That rascal called me a blasphemious name when I raided his child slave plantation two years ago and I'm going to have him put to death for massacring the soldiers who passed through the town of O'Neil . He induced the glandelinian noncombatants to carry arms against us and shot thousands of my men down as we were passing through, and compelled me to abandon my intentions.''
As One of the soldiers again attempted to strike the glandelinian officer but another Angelinian soldier caught his uplifted hand and said;
''Don't strike, oh don't you see that he is unarmed.''''
After then submitted but scowled fiercely at the glandelinian as he sat on the log of a tree. A small little girl was now carried in her whole body swathed in na bandages, and as she was laid on a cot tossed fretfully. Her face was hot with fever, and her big wide open eyes were open with great fear.
''No, no go away''he screamed when several kind Angelinian soldiers bent over her. General Vivians rage knew no bounds. He was also filled with overpowering emotions over the pitiful conditions of the helpless child, and felt like kicking the Glandelinian in the face. This was the worse thing that could have happened, and within his very lines..
''Is it nothing else that you glandelinians can do to slaughter helpless children, and right within my very lines?''He asked quietly. ''I can tell you one thing, that us Angelinians are getting just as brutal as you glandelinians, and that we are getting so used to these massacres of little children that we like to commit some massacres of our own in a way that would make you glandelinians tremble to understand the meaning. And what had you done to my dear daughters who had been prisoners under your command during the child slave horrors?''
''I'll not tell you.''Thundered back the glandelinian struggling to get free from his captors so that he could rush at general Vivian. ''It's none of your buisness whether I kill o[illegible] children within your lines or not, and if I once get away I'll do you up next...''

''It's a whole lot of my buisness.''A Snapped General Vivian. ''And I indeed would like to see you do me up you great big coward. You ought to be put in the Dell-Well-Fell prisons in the Glonglglumonean Islands for life as a criminal and not a prisoner of war and made to break stones. Yet this would be too good for you. Anyhow it won't prevent your going as there is no other punih punishement more terrible.''
''You have no right to bring me into this old shed.''Cried the enraged glandelinian to his captors.''You are a whole bunch of purple coated devils that is what you are. It's an outrage I tell you and I won't stand for it.''
''This place is not as bad as the prisons you put the little children you make slaves of.''Answered general vivian with a sneer.''I expect you have lots of feelings for yourselves, but not for helpless children.''
The glandelinian was still doing his best to tear away from his powerful enemies, and make a rush at general Vivian, but the Angelinians only held t him the tighter.
''If you don't behave yourself I'll have you bound hand and foot''Said general Vivian.''You ought to be shamshamed of yourself, a general as you are cutting up just like this because you are a prisoner. What did you do to my daughters, whils you had them in your power!''
''I'll not tell it to dogs''Cried the glandelinian general furiously. ''If you do nog not let me go I'll butcher more children, and you too....''
''This is an important Capture Captian Hansel Evans''Said general Vivian shaking him by the hand. ''I know this wicked glandelinian officer well. This is Major General James Baldon of the Ninth Corps who used to have charge of the Dell-Well-Fell Penentantary at Calverina. As he is still cutting up bind him boys.We'll attend to the rebel as soon as we can''.
''You have no right to bind me you impudent young devils incarnate''Stormed the general. I''''I'll tell you I'll have you all butchered within an hour if you do not instantly release me''.
''Bind him boys and hustle him off to the rear.''Snapped general Vivian, and the order was promptly obeyed despite the struggles the glandelinian made, and carried outside.
''He has been spoiled when a child.''Muttered general Vivian tohimself. And he turned his attention then to a new comer general E.F Evans and the little girl now standing beside him.
''So you have made a new movement against the glandelinians eh!''He asked.
''I have and also important news to tell you, but I must tell it y to you when you are alone.''
The general dismissed the soldier and the captian, but then asked;
''You don't mind if Gertrude Angeline stays here do you!''
''No I do not''Answered general Evans as he lifted the little girl and embraced her fondly as a mother would.''I know this little girl alright and she is such a sweet brave little thing and the glandelinians fear her. By the way I found four dear little girls among our lines with the features of four of your daughters. They looked so much like them, and had the same clothes on.''
''A ''They are the little girls alright''Answwred general Vivian so don't be alarmed. Violet and her sisters are still alive and with general Jack Evans command as I had found them persued tward our lines and brought them through and from general Zimmermanns army. I know that they are the prettiest little girls known but they are just as pretty in their souls also.''
''The glandelinians have attempted several times to butcher your daughters, but have been saved by God's mercy, and even by Bicknell, ghostmannia, and other good Glandelinian generals such as Adolo-De-garbe, Accountants, Smash-In-The-Head, and Break-In-The-Neck as well.''''Said the other general.
''This indeed fairly filled general Vivian with amazement and coming emotions. He knew how the little girls had suffered during their lives, even what they had suffered before the war opened, but never knew that they had friends among the furious glandelinians.
''It may be possible that some of the glandelinian generals who befriended them were men of better nature than the other kind of glandelinians''Said General Vivian.
''They must have been''Said M.F.Evans.''Otherwise they would not have befriended them at all.''

CHAPTER XXXTEEN.

THE MAIN FURY OF THE BATTLE OF SUNBEAM CREEK, AND THE FIERCE BATTLE-CRIES OF THE GLANDELINIAN ASSAILANTS.
THE EXCOMMUNICATION OF MANLEY FROM THE CATHOLIC CHURCH, THE FIERCE STRUGGLE AT OPHELIA RUN, AND THE ALMOST PRETERNATURAL CARNAGE AT THE ST DAMINEAN FORTIFICATIONS, AND ALSO THE BATTERY LINE
RVER AND IT'S RESULTS.....

It was during the conduct of the Glandelinian general in general Vivians command, when Violet and her sisters who were within general Jack Evans lines had a most trying experience. General Evans had the little girls out with him on a slight scouting tour near the christian lines which for a few minutes were inactive, and he had suddenly turned his head toward a thicket, and then bent his eyes suspiciously in the direction of the enemys thundering cannon chains and active lines moving against he know general Vivians command, and at the same time hearing heavy and wild firing to his right, and left. Violet who was sitting on her horse upright smiled to herself, for she believed that the great general had mistaken some green leaves of the woods for the glistening green uniform of a prowling Omarian Curds, and then continued her own investigation. Evans had not long passed before the branches of bushes were cautiously moved asunder, and a Glandelinian as fiercely wild looking as savage art and unbridled passions could make it peered out on the pacing sentry, and again disappeared. His body was all clothed in a hell green presenting a terrific emblem of death drawn in many skulls and bones of little children. Evans in his awakened imagination deluded by the deceptive light converted each waving brush of or the fragment of some fallen trees into human forms and twenty times fancied he can could distinguish the horrid visage of his foes peering from their hiding places in never ceasing watchfulness of his own movements and those of the Vivian Girls.

Getting more suspicious he was about to tell the Vivian girls when rising in the outward air far in the distance to his left was a distinct cry or series of million cuteries that seemed indeed like a frightful storm of screams from as many crazed demons but which also sounded very unearthly, penetrating not only the recess of the christian lines and the woods, but to the innermost hearts of all the Angelinians who heard it. It continued for a long time, then was followed by a stillness apparently as deep as if all the winds, the rush of water and other noises of distant battle also deafening or dull had been checked in their furious progress at such a horrid and unusual interruption.

"For heavens sake what was it!" Murmured Violet after a few moments of terrific suspense.

"What is it!" Repeated Joice blind.

Neither her sisters, general Evans or the nearest soldiers made any reply. They listened as if expecting that the awful unearthly sound would be repeated, with a manner that expressed their own astonishment. At length the Angelinian soldier nearest spoke, while general Evans cautiously examined the bushes, but he found nothing suspicious. When he disappeared into the other thicket making a close search the Angelinian soldier said to Violet as he rode up beside her;

"What it is, or what it was, none of us here can tell. I did believe there was no outcry that Glandelinian or beast could make that my ears had not heard, not ever from mad-dogs, which I heard from many, but this is certainly an unearthly sound."

"Maybe it was a signal yell of the Omarian Curdes, or some glandelinian of that short in the direction of general Hansons lines, for I have heard they can emit the sound of the most unearthly kind, when yelling a derision." Said Jennie.

"No, no this was too bad and shocking, and had both a childish and inhuman sound, but when you hear a glandelinian warwhoop you will never mistake it for anything else" Said Angelina.

"Well dear Evans" Said violet speaking to the great general as he came back. "did you see anything? Are there any signs of the enemy!"

"There is nothing to be seen without" Said general Evans shaking his head. in discontent. "And no pr pro po prowlers seem to be near."

"But I feel creepy with that storm of horrid cries still ringing in my ears" Said Catherine.

"So do we" Added the other Vivian Girls.

"Well my little angels it was probably-------"

Evans ceased speaking for while his eyes were riveted on those of Violet and her sisters who had turned toward him with eagerness of felinl affection to catch his words; the same strong storm of horrid outs cuteries as before filled the air, in the same direction as before. It continued this time more longer, sounding now near, now distant, seemed to increase, to threaten, to recede, and keeping up for nearly fifteen minutes and rendering all the listeners mute. A long breathless silence followed during w which each looked at the other in fearful expectation of hearing the sound rp repeated. At length Evans drew up his horse and assumed a countenance whose firmness evidently began to give way before a mystery that seemed to threaten some danger against which all his cunnin and experience might prove of no avail.

"It would be negligence a warning that is given for our good." Said Evans. "When such sounds are raised in the forest I'm afraid I'll have to sound the call to arms."

"Is then our danger pressing!" Asked Joice.

"Those who make such strange unearthly sounds, and gives them out for mans information, alone knows our danger. I should think myself wicked unto rebellion against his Will was I to borrow withmuch warnings in the air, for I have heard thatwhen such shrieks are between heaven and earth it betokens a resumanation of the conflict along my lines. We therefore believe that it is a sign given for our good."

As Violet and her sisters now proceeded toward the lines and occasionally looked back in apparent fear toward the woods, once more the same horrid sound arose as if from the depths of the forest far to their right and left and was heard undulating through the forest a distant and dying cadiences only to repeat again and again, and this time failed to even slacken but became more louder, and threatening and more incessan and wilder. It had seemed at times very near and was becoming at times fairly irapilitting and heartrending.

"Can no one here give a name to such a storm of cuteries!" Demanded a christ cross general riding up while the far woods seemed to be filled with a million earth, though "So let him speak for himself. I n judge it not to belong in it or like

, nas something like the screams of ch and lowers of le cuteries of lost souls."

While he had just finished speaking spontaneously and while the strange cuteir cuteries still continued, there suddenly arose a frightful burst of the same blood curdling and earsplitting yells and cris right in front of the christian lines as serve to drive the swift currents of their blood back from its bounding course into the fountains of their hearts. It seemed as if the very thrillions of demons and lost souls of hell, all and all its horrors, had possessed themselves of the air about them and were venting their savage humors in the most barbarious sound. The cries came from no particulnr direction though it was evident that it filled the woods, and as the appalled listeners imagined the very christian line itself. Violet and her sisters who had dismounted from their horses stood still in the midst of the infernal din with a hand on d either ear while Evans exclaimed;

"Whence comes this discord! Han hell broke loose that man should utter such sounds as these."!

Then the bright flashes and the simultaneous reports of more than scores of thousands of muskets blazed out with a deafening roar mowing down hundreds of the Angelinians who had rushed up at hearing the yells. The surviving Angelinians returned the fire and the flash of many scores of thousands of firearms was quick and close between them, and now the roaring of the reports was something awful. At that moment the terrific devil yells of the Glandelinians increasedto an unearthly sound, and masses of ugly looking Glandelinians ermerged from the woods and approached at a run. When their foes who leaped over several stone walls that divided them with long bounds uttering the wildest yells, were within a few rods the Angelinians opened a fearful withering fire and tore the whole gray line to pieces! As they still came on whole ranks of the Glandelinians bounded like stricken deer, and fell headlong to the ground.

But the survivors came on with a rush reaching the works and swarming over, and Evans said to the terror of the Vivian Girls;

"Now Joe" Drawing his sabre while his quick e es began to flash with ardor, "Take the nearest of the screeching imps with your troops, of the rest let the other Angelinian commanders attend to."

Together they rushed their reserves into the twisting squirming writhing lines, while more Angelinian troops arriving rushed into the fray causing greater carnage.

"Come on you bloody minded hellhounds. You meet a man yourse size you damn rebel" Yelled an Angelinian lieutenant.

The words were barely uttered when he encountered a Glandelinian of gigantic d size and of the fiercest mein. At the same moment Joe found his troops engaged heavily and soon himself with a Glandelinian in a similar hand to hand contest. With ready skill the lieutenant and his antagonist each grasped that uplifted arm which held the dangerous sabre. For nearly a minute they stood looking one another in the eye and gradually exerting the power of their sne muscles for the mastery. At length the tightened sinews of the Angelinian prevailed over the less practised limbs of the Glandelinian. The arms of the latter slowly gave way before the increasing force of the Angelinian who suddenly wrsted his armed hand from his foe, and drove the sharp weapon through his bosom to the heart. In the meantime Joe and had been pressed in a more deadly atrg struggle. Both their sabres had been snapped in the first encounter, and as they were destitude of any other means of defence, their safty now depended entirely on bodily strength and resolution.

Though deficient in neither of their qualities Joe had met an enemy every way his equal. Happily he soon succeeded in disarming his adversary whose pistol fell on a rock at their feet, and from that moment it became a fierce struggle who should cast the other over the dizzy height into a neighboring black gulf. Every successive struggle brought them nearer to the verge where Joe perceived the final and conquering effort must be made. Each of the combatants threw all their energy into that effort, and the result was that both tottered on the brink of the precipice. Joe felt the grasp of the other about his throat, and saw the grim smile the Glandelinian gave under the revengeful hope that he hurled his enemy to a fate similar to his own, as he felt his body yeilding to a resistless power; and the Angelinian experienced the passing agony at such a moment in all its horrors. At that moment of extreme danger a white hand and a glancing sabre appeared before him, the glandelinian released his hold as the blood flowed freely from a wound and around the severed tendons of his wrist, and while Joe was drawn backwards by the saving arms of one of his officers, his charmed eyes was still on the fierce and disappointed countenance of his foe who fell sullenly and disappointed down the awful gulf.

"To cover to cover" Was the cry of many of Evans officers.

"Then up came riding Evans. "To cover to cover for your lives little girls for the glandelinians are attacking in too strong a numbers and are pressing the christians back."

Another series of storming yells arose with redoubled fury as fierce and as sav savage and wild as revengeful passions could throw into the air. It was again followed by the swift flashes of many scores of thousands of rifles which sent their leaden messengers across the walls in terrible volleys as though the assailants would pour out their impatient fury on the inv insensible scene of the conflict. A steady but deliberate return was made by the Angelinians who still maintained their post against the fierce and handlong assault. In this manner many minutes flew with the swiftness of thought the muskets of the assailants speaking in rattling drum drum volleys, and at others in withering discharges all along the line. The rocks, the trees, and shrubbery were cut and torn in thousands of places and the snow covered ground was being ra a rapidly strewn with the dead and wounded. Bullets flew like snow and bullet after bullet whizzed by general Evans who was hurrying away with his pistol, reloading them as quickly as they were emptied having a goodly supply of ammunition. Each volley was answered by the glandelinians with a fierce series of yells and a laugh as tauntingly exulting as if hundreds of thousands of demons were uttering their blasphemies at the fall of some Christian soul.

"Well may you laugh, you children of the devil." Cried general Evans amid the din of the crashing volleys as he fired his pistols continuously. The air continued full of horrid outcries and screams such as man alone can utter, and he only when in the state of fierce barbarity. The sounds quickly seemed to spread on all sides of them seemingly in every direction. Some called to g their fellows in the edge of the woods, and were answered by those who were still discharging volleys by the hundred per minute, cries were heard in the startling vinicity of the chasm which mingled with the hoarser yells that arose out of the abysses of the deep and extensive ravines.

In short, so rapid had the savage sounds diffused themselves over the stretch of woods woodland for miles that it was not difficult for the Angelinians to imagine they could be heard beneath as in truth of this story they seemed to be above and seemingly everywhere a/ong the front and there was now so much smoke of firing that it seemed as if a forest fire gas burning, giving general utterances to their rage in the most frantic cries the glandelinians rushed again and again upon the Angelinians who fired so furiously that their lines were again torn in pieces and the dead and wounded paved the ground.

But on they came once more and masses swarmed over the line of works only to be mowed down. Others came on and the multitudes of Angelinians too eager to reload their guns rushed forward upon the foe brandishing their clubbed weapons, and cutting the air with wild and powerful sweeps. Bold and rapid as was the progress of the glandelinians it was succeeded by that of another larger and vigorous multitude which bounding past the other rushed in and leaped with incredible rapidity activity and great daring into the very center of the christians where they halted hurling musket butts, fighting bayonet and sabre duels, pistol duels, flurishing glittering daggers with fearful menaces and using pikes quicker than thought could fol ow these unexpected and audacious movements, and then a whole christian division armed crashed into the fray with terrible ferocity. The glandelinians overwhelmed recoiled before these warlike christian intruders but wary and villagent the leaders of these glandelinians were not so easily disconcerted.

One of the Angelinians rushed upon a glandelinian officer, and they encountered, grappled, and fell to the ground together. The naked body of his antog antagonist for the glandelinian was parti partly undressed afforded the christian soldier no means to hold his adversary who glided from his grasp, and rose again with one knee on his chest pressing him down with the weight of a giant. The Angelinian soldier saw the sabre glancing in the air, when a whistling sound swept past him, accompanied by the sharp crack of a rifle. He felt his breast relieved from the load it endured he saw the savage expression of his enemys countenance countenance change to a look of vacant wildness, when the glandelinian fell dead on the snow on his side.

The christian generals in the meantime casting their keen eyes around the sloping plains - comprehended the nature of the savage assault at a glance, and encouraging their men by voice as well as by example they unsheated their long and dangerous sabres, and rushed with a loud yell toward the enemy followed by their troops to relieve the pressure of the christian line that was being assaulted. It was now a signal for a general counter charge. The other Angelinians answered the yells and rushed toward the enemy and gave their enemies well directed blows with musket butts or sabres, or thrusts with their bayonets and pikes, cleft many to the brain, or tore open many a body. The other masses fired a series of deafening volleys and rushed directly toward the fray. As the combatants were not equal in number each singled an opponent from each other. The rush and blows, and sabre, pike, and bayonet thrusts passed with the fury of a whirlwind, and the swiftness of lightning. As same Angelinian soldier after killing his enemy soon got another glandelinian within easy reach of his arm and with one sweep of his formable weapon he beat down the slight and inartificial defense of his antagonist, crushing him to earth with the blow. Then he ventured to hurl his gun at another onrushing foe to ardent to await the moment of clashing. It struck the glandelinian he had picked out on the chest and checked for an instant his onward rush.

Encouraged by this slight advantage the impetious young leader continued his onset and sprang upo upon his enemy. A single instant was sufficient in to insure him of the rashness of the attack, for he fully found himself engaged with all his activity and courage and endeavoring to ward off the desperate thrusts made with the dagger of the glandelinian. Unable any longer to foil an enemy so eriert and vigilant he threw his arms about him and succeeded in pinning the arms of the other to his side with an iron grasp, but one that was too far exhausting to himself to continue long. In this extremity he heard a voice near him shouting:

"Exterminate the demons in human form. No quarter for the enemies of God/ Down with the glandelinian rebellion."

At the next instant the breach of an Angelinian rifle fell on the head of the glandelinian whose muscles appeared to wither under the shock, as he sank from his Angelinian adversary flexible and motionless. When the soldier had trained the next antagonist he turned like a hungry lion to see, seek another, and saw an ugly and furious officer tri trying to kill one of his comrades who was fighting desperately with a broken sabre. Bounding from his footsteps through the air, and descending in a ball, he fell on the chest of his enemy driving him many yards from the Angelinian headlong and prostrate. The violence of the exertion cast the young christian at his side. As they rose, they fought, and bled each in his turn. But the conflict was quickly decided for the muskets of Rollen and Angel another Angelinian descended on the skull of the desperate glandelinian, at the same moment that the foes first assailant ran his sabre through his heart. All this while there was such a storm of glandelinian "Devil Devil Tails" all along the battle line, along the plains, and through the arches of the woods as seldom burst from human lips before. They who heard it listened with bloodcurdling horror at the heart, little inferior to that dread which may be expected at the blasts of the last summons.

More than three million six hundred thousand glandelinians had broken from the forest at the signal and threw themselves across the plains with fierce alacrity thus the reason of such a desperate attack upon the christian lines. Violet and her sisters could not stand the sights of revolting horror that proceeded so long already. Death still was everywhere in his most terrifying and disgusting effects. The trained body of christian troops threw themselves into solid columns endeavoring to awe their assailants by the opposing appearance of a strong military front and keeping up a most destructive fire all along the line.

In the big melee general Kabbibles glandelinians had threatened the fourth corps of the Angelinians with annihilation but they were also still making a stubborn resistance and only when they were threatened with annihilation and when the little Bunbeam Creek was chocked at that location with dead and wounded of both sides, did they finally fall back.

The glandelinians with a series of wilder yells that far exceeded the others pressed on with a tremendous rush the seventy fifth corps being next attacked, the enemy turning their left flank and driving the whole line back in confusion, and then still pressing on like a hurricane. General guerre divisions of landelinians at another section of the long line of assault had succeeded in breaking a part of Evans line under Folio though meeting the greatest resistance, but it finally resulted in a severe repulse. Another section of the assault bended a part of general Evans left wing twrd the rear, but the glandelinians at this point crowded in a solid a mile long and four deep encountered a withering artillery fire which not only tore the line into a hundred gaps, but swept down the surviving regiments that still came on, and demoralizing whole companies.

At the same time fourteen batteries were massed upon the advancing glandelinians and put into action, but the foe had rallied as the tremendous resistance of Hinderminss troops was in vain and so the assault was renewed and became more furious and formidable and the Angelinians under gaxter were compelled to abandon their works and thus many scores of thousands of the glandelinians with heartrending yells, dashed among the guns just as they opened a destructive fire dealing terrible havoc and confusion among their already shattered gray lines. At the same time general Liebermanns christian line a section of Evans force were assaulted but a fierce resistance from Haldens arriving forces managed to check the onward rush of the glandelinians at this section, and the cannon fire mowed them down as fast as they showed themselves. general Hindernine learning of the fierce assault upon his main line had in the meantime with Zimmer ann and Arch Aronburg rushed them to the aid of his own torn and bleeding lines, and general Hindernine was the next to arive and take command in person. The enemy had been repulsed but again was attacking, and soon the gray and purple lines came together in a desperate hand to hand fight. Dead and wounded again lay piled up in heaps, but the surviving glandelinians still pressed on with d great determination the Angelinians now fighting with the fury of desperation all along the lines.

For a time it did seem as if the glandelinians could not be checked in their onward rush despite the increasing artillery fire of fresh guns, and yet again it seemed as if the christians had never been so stubborn before, and general Hindernine now threw to Evans support large forces, and more batteries which were massed upon the assailants, and then adding to this pressure up with his forces, then jennings, and now the enemy being fearfully overwhelmed as Zimmermans gandors, and Aronburg Richardson also arived with their forces, the enemy slowly began to give way abandoning the cannon they had captured in their desperate efforts to regain their main lines.

The enemy fairly retreated in confusion. Along the central grand division of the main center the carnage was more severe as the enemy rallying after their severe repulses came ag at the charge anew, and heavier and heavier rolled the long lines of musketry in their discharge a and incessantly thundered the uproar of eighty hundred cannons. The glandelinians under general Hogood, Pugnose, and goodhead Lawson moved on in a new charge of tremendous wilting in fury teard the christian line once more and after a terrific conflict, and after suffering excruciating losses the enemy soon abandoned the attempts on the left of general Evans center, while other forces of the foe with merciless fury concentrated a number of most desperate assaults on the right grand division. Augustines divisions soon came to the aid of this part of the christian line driving Beebleads forces back crushed and dashed to smitteresns, but at other points the enemy still renewed their attacks with terrible fury making charge after charge, and driving back the ninth corps with smangling losses.

Jim Semilon under orders to keep close to the left moved in to fill the places of the defeated infantry, and his 1x Iresense brigades were struck by Xharles divisions who with a column brigade in front, and seven lines deep, and two miles long assaulted that part of the christian line with the fury of demons, and a serious break was made. Other brigades however were ordered to the break, but had only force enough to break two or three lines of the enemy and were obliged to withdraw. The enemy however was repulsed, but again they rallied and came on at another terrific onslaught, but as no part of Evans main line did not yeild the enemy were again compelled to give up the assault and a force of reserved cavarly then made a terrific counter charge, with the aid of a terrific artillery fire and again the enemy retreated in confusion.

General Zimmermann had been separated from general Vivians command and had put in his utmost strength to oppose the fierce headlong attacks of the glandelinians throughout the theatre of operations, and every step was for f hours won by the most desperate fighting Whillimsburger Zimmermann had ever seen in a one days battle along his own lines. At the starting of the battle the Angelinian twentieth corps were unable to hold and their retreat had become a stampede while on the right flank under general Hoecher the fighting was particularly severe, and prolonged, fiftson corps of Angelinians making determined efforts to drive back the attacking glandelinians i and in the four hours desperate fighting, had been gradually decimated to fragments, and though finally the glandelinians broke the defensive lines and secured four hundred pieces of artillery, and made good their own right and left, they left fields of dead and wounded all along the line for miles.

The glandelinians temporarly victorious as they were, were not satisfied, and assumed the offensive once more capturing many more guns, and driving the Angelinians beyond the territoy territory in which the general plans of the chief commander required for the devolpment of future tatics. Reinforcements arived in a hurry however and these corps of the Angelinians tried to envelope the right wing of the assaulting divisions, and now the fighting became intensely fierce.

The result now was for a time indecisive until a large force swept around the left flank of the christian line, and attacked in the rear resulting in temporary success until other forces of christians reached the scene, and then the fighting became very extremely chronic. The attacks of the glandelinians indeed seemed to be filled with some success for many of the christian divisions were in full retreat, but the main line along this point held with the desperation of millions of wild maniacs, and fighting of extraordinary violence and fierceness continued for the distance of ten miles, the forces on both sides grand gradually increasing, though parts of the purple lines were wavering.

Godfreys glandelinians had to on a line of works at the least sign of wavering along the chris christian lines, the christian columns at this pot t having been struck in the flank and rear and were totally routed. The tide of battle everywhere along the main line had ebbed and flowed for four hours without intermission that after noon the long line of works ding Nicholis ns from front being taken and retaking six times before the Angelinians finally withdrew. The glandelinians along this point were the first to occu e occupy these works after f orce hand to hand fighting, but they were gradually dl driven back by a fierce counter charge and by a spasmodic bombardment of Angelinian artillery, but as the glandelinians resumed the attack the fury of the battle was redoubled. Reinforcements from the main army steadily arived for the christians already driven back, but to dislodge the glandelinians just now seemed impossible, and their own lines were continually swept by a storm of fire from the glandelinian artillery and the wooden barricades fronting the breastworks were soon in flames, the contesting lines surging back and forth fighting desperately for victory; and the dead lay thick when the other columns of Angelinians were forced to withdraw, and all the other near by towns not filled yet were now overflowing with wounded to their fullest point. All along the line for hours the glandelinians had continued their fierce and determined attacks, the christian guns hurling a hurricane of steel and steel into the gray lines, but the survivors only continued to push forward, with their loud battle shouts, rank after rank going down, and it seemed as if the slaughter would never cease.

Straight into that jaw of destruction rushin rushed the advancing troops men falling on every hand, whole platoons melting away every minute, but over the bodies of the dead and wounded pushed the rear line of assailants rushing with fixed bayonets upon the smoking muzzles of the christian artillery. This fierce fighting raged incessantly the Angelinians resisting steadily and storming back at the steadily increasing forces of Shoemanician glandelinians . An hour passed this way and over one hundred n and sixteen thousand glandelinians had been killed this way, and the brunt of the fighting in the offensive movement was borne by the Abyssinkili n troops of fourty brigades which hurled themselves against the centralline of the assailants, while the poor glandelinians themselves were being swept by fresh artillery and infantry fire that mowed down thousands. The Abyssinkilians confident of their great numbers fought doggedly, and though the landelinians were finally driven back by a counter charge on the flank of the assailants which was delivered with the violence of an avalanch the main glandelinian strategy coupled with the immense strength of the Abyssinkilians, and as the landelinians soon came on again they swept the Abyssinkilians back with the crushing of nine brigades.

General French was killed during this attack on the Abyssinkilians, and as his heavy glandelinian forces moved forward against the defenders, and as the thunders of cannons be came deafening and the ground shook as whole chains of batteries miles long let go in unison general Hanson Bris of the glandelinians who delivered a series of terrific assaults against overwhelming numbers against an untenable line he was mortally wounded. Indeed it looked as though the wings of the wicked glandelinian forces were going to overlap everything, but while the battle was raging at it's worse the Angelinians suddenly heard the roar of artillery to the north, this coming from Nero's Abyssinkilians, and the Glandelinians were unable to press any further at this point, though their advance had been like a great river overflowing its banks. The Abyssin,kilians strove with the fury of desperation to hold the forces of the foe in check along the Sunbeam creek, while the other forces were rapidly repeating a new line of attack ten miles long but in spite of the elaborate preparations with wire entag entanglements through which was passed a electrical current of eleven thouds thousand five hunr hundred volts and the use of piles of broken glass and tins and iron and other stuff, and even gigantic bonfires and materials of every description one christian battery fell into the hands of the foe.

All this while the Angelinian artillery had maintained a terrific artillery fire of exceeding violence pouring their storm of shells and hurgi cane of high explosives and solid shot into the assulting glandelinian columns, the landelinian brigades advancing slowly on however in the face of a very stubborn resistance. In the face of the withering fire from the Angelinian mitrailleuses the glandelinians swept past the main intrenched line swarming everywhere, and driving the christians in confusion across the Sunbeam Creek.

The Glandelinians entered the captured works littered with dead, battered by shell fire and devastated by every instrument of war. The glandelinians had n ow gained a front which they had occupied after more harder fighting, but the christians along the main line were holding their adversaries and sharply checking their attacks which were as frequent as the rushing of the waves in a storm, regaining some of their original positions after assuming the counter offensive and driving back the assailants by a vigorous counter assault the Abyssin,i Abyssinkilians hurling themselves with inbridled fury on general Boyds solid gray lines and in the attack which became a hand to hand fight, and in which the Angelinian guns on the heights denominated the Glandelinian columns with impartial carnar carnage a terrible panic ensued.

ALMOST PRETERNATURAL CARNAGE AT THE ST DAMIRAN FORTIFICATIONS. CONCLUSION OF THE BATTLE OF SUNBEAM CREEK. THE BLOODY BATTLE OF THE BATTERY LINE RIVER.

Despite all this the glandelinians at all points made seventeen more successive attacks more violent than the former on the Abyssinkilian troops in their efforts to cut their lines of communications but the assaults were repulsed with the crushing to fragments of seven big divisions and as the glandelinians retreated, a large detatchment of christians dashed across a wide and long burning railway bridge and fell upon the glandelinians with such fury that many graycoats were cut in two by their sabres. Up to this time with the attacks on general Hanson and vivian the day before the christian officers estimated that the glandelinians had made over one thousand seven hundred repeated assaults, all big and sanguinary in scattered attacks, like the angry waves of a stormy sea front during a hurricane, and which sweepts upon the sh only to go back like fragments of dashed spray. The leader of the Angelinian detatchment received eighteen wounds but he had put a cut two hundred and eleven graycoats bu before he fell. The result of Evans, and Zimmermans successes of the battle of Sunbeam Creek was the greater menance of the St Damirean fortifications, and the glandelinians seeing that their assaults were unsuccessful withdrew, their leaders planning to remain on the defensive for the remainder of the battle, and de defied the Angelininns to take the fortic fortifications.

Early on the afternoon of the same day general Manley sent general Mac Meldorf with five million men to prevent any movements on the part of general Hanson, as his main main line was in grave danger on account of the successes of the other christian forces. Meldorf soon advanced to the attack and soon engaged Kindernines s new forces consisting mostly of Abyssinkilians. Violet and her sisters happened to be at general Vivians headquarters when the new part of the battle began yet they could hear it all, and what a cannonading. The noise was frightful the Abyssinkilian guns firing without a break. The region along general Kindernines front was largely covered with woods from which came forth at a stretch column after column of glandelinians. The Abysan Abyssinkilian troops were hard by and their cannon and machine guns fired without respites. It was a vertible hurricane of iron and fire. which mowed down the attacking hordes pitilessly. But in vain did the Abyssinkilian artillery decimate the divisions as they emerged from the woods, for as fast as the men fell fresh forces came forward to take their places. The Abyssinkilian artillery made unheard of ravages in the lines of the enemy but nevertheless the glandelinians cut up Kinder nines army and drove them back in confusion. Bodies lay in piles everywhere many of them horribly mangled. New and more sweeping attacks were made upon the other Angelinian forces added by Abyssinkilians, but through all the terrific slaughter they managed to hold their ground cutting up the divisions of the assailants time and again. Then seeing that these efforts were useless and that Kindernine had checked the attack on him with reserves Manley sent shoemannia to engage general Hansons center and now the battle resumed with redoubled fury. I cannot describe the fury with which the immense glandelinian columns attacked, but benoral general Hanson managed to hold his own ground, untill other parts of his own forces came to his aid. These armies were thrown in full force up upon Shoemannias divisions but could not drive them back. The slaughter was terrible, hundreds of thousands having fallen on both sides within a quarter of an hour. However as he was soon repulsed, general Manley again sent fresh forces to aid Shoemannia, at the same tim sending a large division to engage the Abyssinkilians at general Hansons right, and one Abbiennian division at his left. The fury of the battle grew with more intense fury and within four hours the roar of nearly eighty thousand cannon became indescribable. The divisions engaging the Abyssinkilians were decimated the purple coats descending upon them like a valanches, cutting down even their officers mercilessly. Furious resistance was encountered along general Hansons whole line. Though his own right was threatened with annihilation general Hans Hanoson managed to throw general Colliess cavarly of Abbiennians and Concentinians upon ge Swearingtons cavarly of glandelinians which was cut to pieces in an hell on l of infernal din, and sent flying in disorder. The glandelinian advance was now checked along this point, but at other points the attack continued with unabated fury, and general Kindernine fearing danger to his new divisions was already riding with all haste to take command. General hanson vivian also fearing for his center sent general Hollencollar with his Abbiennians to the support of his right grand division the assailants along this point being cut up and thrown back in awful confusion. Manley saw this and launched forward his heaviest columns upon Hansons superior and supreme main lines.

Twenty of the columns were decimated, but nevertheless Hansons whole left suffering excruciating losses had to give way.

Manley followed this up with a swooping cavarly charge and soon general Hansons whole entire left threatened to give way in confusion. However general Delarney came to the rescue with his Abyssinkilians and with these general hansons left rallied and managed to hold its own though the Angelinians suffer from the most terrific volt violent onslaughts. Manley seeing that he was not making much success along general Hansons left sent in great forces to attack general Vivian central and left grand divisions at other points. The glandelinians then attacked this solid line in general but met a withering storm of cannon and musketry fire that cut their most biggest columns to pieces time and again. Other divisions struck against general Hanson Vivians right in an effort to force it back but general Zimmermanns guiders Abyssinkilians and Angelinians rushed to the aid and the glandelinians meeting a force too superior to their own gave way in confusion, the Abbiennians pursuing them and capturing three hundred thousand prisoners. A sea of dead and wounded was exposed to view. Simultaneously large bodies of glandelinians also attacked the Abyssinkilians under generals Jefferis Griffiths and Albert Handon. Here the carnage was more terrific. Column after column was mowed down, division after division was cut to pieces and routed pell mell after every time they went forward, and whole brigades were threatened with annihilation, but the survivors among the glandelinian surgen only resumed the attack, the christians being supported by artillery which enabled them to stand the terrible punishment inflicted by these terrible sledge hammer onslaughts. It was already a worse scene than the part of the battle along Ophelia creek with general Evans lines, so fierce that no one could perfectly describe it.

General Shoemannia seemed to be advancing with his whole force across the Sunbeam plains in the direction of general hansons center the object being to divide the christian forces and cut them up. Shoemannia struck and struck with amazing quickness and hundreds of thousands of glandelinians crossed the Sunbeam Creek at the point of the bayonet encountering general Schumanns army of Abbiennians and Angelinians. This long christian line blazed with the most destructive fire ever seen but Shoemannias main divisions coming up were thrown with the most terrible fury upon this ght christian line. For an hour they held with the most indescribable and savage ferocity, then the glandelinians being overwhelmed and almost cut up they retreated in great confusion. At the same time large bodies of Shoemannias men advanced on general Augustine St Clare attacking his own forces which held with all their might and main driving the assailants back again and again with excruciating losses.

But the glandelinians though being inferior in numbers soon drove St Clares forces back. Another wing of Koemannias army had reached the Evangeline St clare railroad bridge which at that moment was blown up by the Abyssinkilians. The glandelinians however knowing that the little river was not deep charged across but met an annihilating fire and were compelled to retire. In the meantime Shoemannia planned to throw his main center and right on Schumans line, while his left under general Hanson would assail the Abbiennians and guard against any aid from Abyssinkilians or any other Abbiennian forces. Meanwhile general Hanson vivian had learned of the terrific attack made by the glandelinians and rode over to Parobecks army of Abyssinkilians were eight million troops lay in readiness under general Francis H sumy, Ronsa Thonton, and Augustine Ophellin. A big glandelinian force of six million supported by parks of artillery began the most fearful attacks ever seen in the battle. Parobeck had really double the number of eight million which were drawn off from Evans and thrown upon the glandelinians. The carnage was heartrending, but outnumbered as they were the glandelinians kept up the attack with unabated fury. Even more divisions came to the support of the Glandelinians but were overwhelmed still though they did commit awful havoc among the christian lines. Seventeen generals had been killed on both sides, and the Abyssinkilians were being mowed down in such frightful numbers that they recoiled, the glandelinians persuing swiftly.

The Abyssinkilians retreated for only a quarter of a mile, when reinforcements of Abbiennians, and the fierce Tripoligonlians arrived. The glandelinians though checked retained the works they had captured cutting the whole Abbiennian line to pieces with their fire killing the christian generals Crawford Cliftons and Wild wilson and also Wilcox Smith, and then still more reinforcements arrived for the glandelinians with artillery support as well as for the Angelinians, but still more terrible was the slaughter among the christians who were again compelled to withdraw in confusion, the glandelinians pressing on although they were falling in great multitudes.

The christians hard pressed retreated tward general Kodzios Angelinian command but this rest did not last long. Evenes forces of Angelinians and Abbiennians advanced to the aid and forming a long solid battle line opened a fire that was too severe for the glandelinians who melted away again in whole columns, but the survivors halted and returned as fierce a fire, and then started to assault the new forces. Every division or brigade that threw themselves upon the Abbiennian line was torn and mangled. The glandelinian losses were too frightful to relate in detail and they were compelled to withdraw to the works they had captured before, the Abbiennian forces following and attacking with seemingly preternatrual fury.

The whole gray line for the length of nearly five miles st ormed with a withering fire that seemed to terrifying heaven and earth but the Abbiennians though repulsed again and again returned to the assault with redoubledvfury. Indeed so fierce was the carnage that the world seemed afire. One hundred thousand Abbiennians fell in every onslaught, there being twenty altogether. Nevertheless despite all this terrific carnage in contesting the bloody field the Abbiennians regained the bloody field and lost ground driving the Glandelinian forces back. While this was going on Shoemannia and Schuman were still trying out each other in oje of the bloodiest conflicts of the whole battle. This frightful carnage raged for four hours with unabated savageness before the Glandelinians were finally outnumbered too heavily, but nevertheless they gave battle with the greatest bravery and skill ever seen in warefare. Heavy columns were thrown against Schumenans line of infantry but for a long while no impression could be made. Schuman was constantly expecting the arival of his Abyssinkilians but they did not come. Already his center was giving way before the fierce onslaught and Schuman realized that Hanson or Gladernine must have all they could do themselves, and that he himself would have to fight without Angelinian aid.

The assaults of the Glandelinians was fearful and most terrific and Schuerman finding himself forced back all along the line sent a messenger to have his artillery brought up. This arived and dominated the Glandelinian columns but he could not check them, so he retreated in good order tward general Hansons line. When the latter learned this and of the condition of Schumans army he decided to give all battle along the whole portion of the Sunbeam creek while the leader of the big Abyssinkilian army a approaching sent word that he would dispatch aid to him. About five o-clock while persistent attacks were still being made upon Hansons lines general Vangeline St Glare with his Abyssinkilian army was between Opeheilia and the enemy coming up under general Diebiemann struck general Vangeline but without success and general Fay was sent with twenty million to Hanson this being a portion of the main body of the Abyssinkilians under general Gallic and Angelo which was quite fresh, and new had come that the other big Abyssinkilian army was on the way.

These columns were thrown again and again on general Vengelines right, the left grand division being crushed to fragments by overwhelming numbers of christians. The left center of the Glandelinian forces was then cute out, torn and crumpled up, the whole Glandelinian surge giving way in the most alarming confusion.

General Pyroabarings Abyssinkilians ariving at this moment saved general Vengelines center from being rolled up by another desperate assault, rallying them as quickly as possible. The Glandelininns again attacked with alarming fury, thinking to drive back the christian armies before they could reform. The christians waited untill the Glandelinians came to within fifty yards, then let loose thier fire full sway all along the line.

The whole l line of the assailents almost withered, the purple columns counter charging like an avalanch of humanity driving the surviving Glandelinians back in disorde disorder cutting them to pieces. Many unamed christian generals fell, but the christian divisions went on with tremendous fury, and being supported by an immense division of cavarly they fell upon the enemy capturing over two hundred and eighty thousand, then charged their heavy battery with all their most greatest enger energy mowing and cutting down all the artillery men and killing all the horses render ing the guns useless. On they went tward the foe lines then gradually as their lines were being torn to pieces by ten thousand cannon, they withdrew.

A large force of Glandelinian cavarly, dragoons, and battalions which had come to general Shoemannias aid were met by an annihilating fire along the Abbiennian line, and also being cut up and broken to pieces were also forced to retire, many of their brigades being completely annihilated..... At the same time another Glandelinian cavarly were met and completely beaten by the Abbiennian horsemen along the Sunbeam creek which ran red with blood and overflowed with the dead bodies of the slain in the great cavarly enge engagements. Hanley seeing this opened a heavy artillery fire upon Hansons lines, the eighty thousand guns mowing down while divisions within twenty minutes. This artillery fire was kept up with unabated fury despite the terrific cannonading of Baldwins main chain of christian batteries w ich made a din which rivalled any artillery duel ever seen in the war before.

General Hellengers divisions attacked general Hansons Vivians left center anew, while agi again the other bodies engaged the right grand division making assault after assault.

Nine million Glandelinians under general Joseph Haley assailed Baldwins batteries, hile the remainder of the surge of Glandelinians assailed the gunners on general Hansons main left and right. The latter by sheer bravery gained the heights and took the five thousand cannon driving in at the strongest infantry lines with all their might making charge after charge in the face of a cannonading that seemed to split the earth with its horrifying uproar, the cannon fire cutting them down in as many numbers as got within range, but the horsemen could not penetrate the solid squares of infantry and being mowed down in multitudes during ten desperate assaults against a long line of musketry fire were soon driven back to the batteries they had taken. These though they cut up the christian brigades in scores they could not hold either, and having suffered indescribible losses, remnants only being left/ the Glandelinian cavarly retreated in utter rout being persued by the christians who shot and cut them down in ruthless numbers.

Manlats main infantry columns under general Earl Crawford fared better capturing the main line of works along the Sunbeam Creek but not with out indescribable losses both in officers and privates. His right wing now was beginning to retire before the forces under Hanson and general Gladernine and fairly who were sent to its aid had his right and left wing turned by the Abbiennians. The struggle now centered on the whole left wing of general Hanson vivians armies, one terrific att ack after another being made with relentless fury, and the wing was inflicted with a terrible punishment as so many fell. The Glandelinians this time suffered untold loss es in every onslaught, the christian lines desperatedly resisting the repeated blows of Manleys right wing. However Manleys losses had been more terrible than he realised and though the attack on the right wing and on the left was succeeding, the big Abyssinkilian force at last came up and engaged the glandelinians for two hours, and drove them, crushed, torn and mangled tward their main line.

The division attacking Baldwins batteries met the fiercest artillery fire ever known. Solid forces of infantry attacked Baldwins left pressing it back, but could not advance far under such a ravaging fire, and finally gave upthe attempt fleeing down the sides of the slopes leaving their dead and wounded every everywhere in their mad flight. Baldwins immense columns now assumed the offensive, and attacked the forces still contending with Schuman . For four more hours to cover Manleys withdrawel tward the St Dominean fortifications Shoemannias main center recieving reinforcements made a gallent stand though many of his brigades were cut up and thrown into confusion. Baldwins infantry made terrific onl onslaughts upon Shoemannias lines, t which though badly cut up held for four hours untill the arival of Abyssinkilians, and then Shoemannia recieved a large force of Omarian-Gurdes and Zimmermannians a d and he managed to hold the combined christian forces in check. Meanwhile other fierce attacks were in progress on the Dominean fortifications and though the christians with the support of Baldwins guns managed to carry the long line of fortifications, their line was breached at one point, the enemy making an irrestible counter charge, which drove back the Angelinians with heavy losses and with many of their officers slain or wounded. At Theosame time general Hanson Vivian from his ambulance was direct ing terrific on l o nslaughts on the long positions manned by batteries along the Sunbeam Creek which was afterwards called battery Line River.

Two hours passed, then four hours, the batteries were carried but only retaken the assaulting columns being driven back, and through the fortifications, and across the St Dominean crossroads. Amid the frightful storm of carnage general Shoemannia had fallen wounded but his lines held firm. Manley himself was trying to move irrestibly upon the christian lines which had retaken the line of batteries, the Angelinians being forced to yeild with the loss of these guns and then their own general Baldwin himself was wounded. His acting assistant general Barclay Coyne had been killed during the height of Manleys counter charge, and his whole purple line being unable to hold out any longer retired slowly. In the meantime general Evans with one hundred and twenty thousand men was moving on at Hoosas Crossroads mirat and met a large body of the enemy and learning it was a trick to flank general Hanson Vivian withdrew his forces onto a thick snow covered plain covered also with high grass boarded by woods, and forming three batteries each of fifty guns h gave the enemy a hot reception and for a time the terrible contest rolled back and forth without any advantage to any side.

General Evans deployed for the fight and the Glandelinians antiop anticipating an easy victory rushed forward with a howl of derision and vengeance. For a moment the Angelinians were taken off their guard and large columns of them were swept from the field like chaff before the wind. The main columns of general Evans forces held firm however and soon the Glandelinians were driven again ot into on confusion. General Wooden rallied them and fought with savage fury having an immense host of graycoats and expecting to overwhelm the christians. Wooden fought like a demon, urging his men forward against the christians only once more to be hurled back with terrible loss. The unbroken christian line swept everything before te them driving the Glandelinians back tward their own lines. Descipline and good organization carried the field. One of the Angelinian commanders dashed forward with a brigade to capture general Warden another Glandelinian officer but the savage ad Glandelinian saw him coming and turned on him with the fury of a demon.

They met face to face and in a moment old Warde had run him through the body with his sabre. When the young leader fell the consternation was so great among his followers that the Angelinians were in danger of being beaten t to pieces. for the glandelinians being reinforced once more were rushing forward with the same savage furyy but general Evans had organized his men so that squares could be instantly formed and these stood firm and repulsed the agaailants with the greatest ease, and then charged with fierce yells, and again the glandelinians retreated in dire confud f confusion. Their leader angry at seeing them fall b back even from a superior force headed his men for a desperate charge. One of his officers rushed on a square was overwhelmed and made a prisoner whereupon his followers broke and fled in the wildest dismay, being utterly routed and scattered to the winds, by a force twi ce the size of his own.

Rallying the main parts of his forces Warden and Wooden again rushed forward. The shock was terrible and a fiercer struggled raged without either side giving way. The Glandelinians made desperate effortxs to force the purplecoats back, but at no point was the christian christian line bended, and every Angelinian did his duty and a line of dead and injured glandelinians around the squares told how well t hey fought. Minute after minute of terrible fighting covered the ground with windrows & dead and wounded around the squares, and general Joicelinia discovered where the enemys lines was the weakest, and led a brigade on his flank, lapped over and bersed a part of Woodens forces in. There now came a terrible hand to hand struggle in which two quarters of the glandelinians fell pierced by bayonets, and thousands upon thousands were shot down. The glandelinians despite this stood their own ground repelling charge after charge, but overwhelmed by heavy numbers the glandelinians were forced to flee each time. Warden having been captured but for a time would not accept himself as prisoner and howled and rav raved like a mad man. But when he saw so many bayonets pointing at him he ceased his actions and submitted to be taken like a lamb!

In the struggle with the Angelinians under Evans and Woodens glandelinians both sides had lost over five hundred and fifty thousand in killed and wounded, the struggle inseperated ones having lasted six hours along this point, while general Hanson vivian was resisting the assaults of the glandelinians under general Shoemamdin and Manley. And Evans held while the enemy attacked against fearful odds as was their wont all the time.

In the meantime general Hanson vivian had ordered general gladerlinia to surrender the fortifications for that it would be bombarded immediately but general gladerlinias glandelinians forced a withdrawal of strong christian troops as an answer, and though these christians made a gallent stand against gladerlinins fierce onslaughts, many of their brigades were literally torn up and thrown into disorder, while simultaneously the infantry under general Goemmin who tried to stand before general gladerlinins solid infantry assault were also badly thinned, but they managed to hold their ground against the desperate assault of the glandelinians, untill their leader was killed, and then they were routed.

All along the other points the glandelinians under gladerlinia made a progressive onslaught being supported by the batteries under Alexandrias gostellio and they soon managed to carry the long line of christian works at this point, but general Sinderlinia did not fare this good opportunity long for ashe was directing further successive assaults along the battery line river, other christian batteries were trained upon his columns, and other big forces were simultaneously hurled upon him, and his whole force cut to pieces was driven before the Angelinians like a breaking wave before the hurricane, and gladerlinia having been borne off the field threw the glandelinians into greater confusion. Broken by his wound, and his bitter defeat gladerlinia was enraged, and if he still retained any hopes of making another assault despite his wound, he it must have vanished when he discovered that more than two quarters of his force was down in killed and wounded on the bloody field, and that his surviving columns had turned sourly against any ideas of further assaults in their terrible condition, and so he had lost his power to win victories: though he had boasted that within an hour he would have the christians begging for mercy.

He knew that the christians were moving upon him everywhere and his whole army was cla ori clamoring for reinforcements. For a time he attained the idea to at least ade make a desperate stand but no hope in this way could be attained in the right sense for while thecstand was made his remaining forces were again cut up, and routed and he himself wounded a second time. General ganco Manleys army of turneranians had now drawn up in battle formation on the Sunbeam Creek, but for a while so many white flags were seen that general Hanson vivian inquired by wireless to general Robert vivian his brother, Manleys intention! A messenger came in response to general Hanson with a roll of paper and read aloud;

""His Excesleney general johnston gance manley, brother of general John Manley seeing the columns of Angelinians has agreed with his main leaders to force the christi lines or die in the attempt. This is the meaning of the display of the white flags..."

Ge era general vivian realizing this decided to destroy this new commander, declaring that he was bound t o make the glandelinian commander turn over two million of their child slaves to place those butchered during the early part of the war, and to make the Glandelinians pay fifteen million dollars for causing the outbreak of the war, being confident of victory pretty soon. He als intended to make the glandelinian ruler and his great generals prisoners at once for their persecutions and abuses of his daughters, to repay the thousands and millions of insults committed to the Holy Churches of galvarinia, to i atone their insults to ganson, and to force them under any and conditions t o give up their child slave trade, and to never allow them to renew it. T win an accomplished victory which he hoped would soon terminate the war he decided to crush Manleys whole army to mere pieces, and destroy their leaders if they did not u yeild to surrender.

While the battle was still raging with terrible fury a,o along every point of the christian line general vivian held a council about this, and all his generals agreed in the annihilation of Manleys army on the banks of the gunbeam creek before it could fully concentrate . The day of the fierce battle was very cold and calm. Violet and her sisters were on the summit of a very high rise of ground where they could see the whle whole line of battle.

"I wonder what general gancoe Manleys intentions are!"Violet asked sadly."I wish wish papa would hurry up with his own intentions and have it over with."

"Maybe he will - "Said general Jack Evans. "If not the conflict will end anyway and in the wrong way too. General gancoe Manley are overwhelmed by us ten to five, but nevertheless general Vivian intends to massacre general Manleys army but I have doubts if It will succeed. General vivian h w however won't wait. He knows how to carry out threats when planned."

"And the glandelinians have many poor little children in their power."Sobbed Jennie. "We may never see them again and it is impossible to rescue them."

In the meantime what appeared to be general gancoe Manleys army was in realtiy the concentration of newly arived reinforcements under the very main commander himself, but who ordered general gancoe manley his brother to take command of the center himself. Indeed Gancoe Manley was thinking hard of his own intentions, and even now he had raised during his recent services five hundred million dollars in Glandelinian money, and with this he was able to promish rewards to his men if they prevented his army from annihilat ion which threatened. Poor violet and her sisters were indeed impatient for the advance of general vivian to start. Oh how they hoped that general Manley would be crushed and have it over it . Evans knew full well the yearnings of their little hearts. And what joy th there would be if Manley was crushed, but he had a feeling alright that it was the main body of the main glandelinian general, for he could see one of the generals banners fluttering along the already blazing lines of musketry.

"If Manley succeeds in repulsing papa too often the poor general will never be able to repair the damage done to his lines in time to resume another battle at this pint point."Said violet beginning to realize her papas folly. "Probably papa is going to hard into this awful battle and I do fear for his safty. You know poor Uncle got wounded...."

"Violet"Said Evans((I do believe your father is too rash for look at those most terrific Masonic gray lines now. SS See how they are in a blaze of fire and smoke from cannons and musketry. I tried during the whole council to persuad him to leave off the fighting untill to morrow but he would not ren relent. He is angry clean through ab ut thep past butcheries of children and that is the intention he thinks of massacring the glandelinians under that one commander. I do aprove of the plan because he is justified but its rash for I absol absolutely know that it is the army of the main glandelinian general and not that of Gancoe alone. What I'm wortyi worrying about isthat it might happen that general vivians assults assaults will be cut down like grass!"

Violet made no reply to this but she did some deep thinking. When the roar of the conflict seemed to increase in the far distance the atmosphere seemed to grow hazy and fearing trouble at new quarets quarters Evans decided to return to his now inactive lines untill his command should be called to do their part again in the probable futile actions. They managed to reach a slope of a bigger rise of ground and though the haze increased, and was moving though there seemed to be no wind general Jack Evans became suspicious.

"Maybe its the fog of smoke from the battle"I Said Jennie.

"Yes but the color of the haze ix is of a peculiar----"

"It smells like smoke of burning wood"Said violet suddenly."Like burning wood and powder together."

"So it does said general Evans sniffing."I wonder what is burning!"

"Or maybe it is caused by the fury of the battle for hear how they are firing"Said Joice.

"The battle has probably set the forest on fire in several places."Sai d Angeline.

"I hope not"Said Catherine.

"There has been reported that a furious fire was advancing tward us that at least Evangelinia Crania and Norma Rossinia are burning"Said Hettie."It may be these big fires."

''But there is no glow''Said Daisy.''It's dark enough now to see the fires if there are any.''

''It may be a treacherious smudge.''Said General Evans.''Otherwise we would see the glow...''''A s u smudge does not move very fast though it makes a lot of smoke''Said Angeline''Or maybe the fire ain't near enough toygive forth the glow.''

''I believe there is so much smoke from the distant battle line that it hides the glow.'' Said general Evans.''The base of smoke is thickening every minute now.''

''We had better warn generalHanson or our father.''Said Violet.''If there is any fire approaching it might be tward his army.''

''Yes it think it is the best thing''Said Evans ''It is best to tell him before it is too late for it will be all off if he is hemmed in both by theenemy and the forest fire though I don't see how it can burn with all this snow on the ground.''

They quickly str started tward general Hanson's lines where the ur uproar of battle was too terrible for any one to hear, a dragonic roar but here the atmosphere was only full of powder smoke. Why? „hich was then was the fire advancing if it really was a fire, and what was burning? Without hesitation Evans and the little girls went up to general Hanson who was sitting on his hothorse with his arm bandaged and at their approach he got down stood behind a tree and dispatched orders to his own commanding officers. He looked up as they came on and on seeing who they were stood up more straight.

''E Well my darling heroines what brings you here at this dangerous time, and so near near the firing lines?''He inquired as Violet threw herself into his arms.

''We fear that a forest fire is advancing tward y your rear.''Spoke general Evans saluting.''We cannot see any glow but in that direction the air is full of smoke from burning wood. We at first thought it was smoke from the firing lines.''

General Hanson „ivian slowly set violet down and mounting his horse rode into the direction where general Evans and the little girls led him and then applied his field glasses to his eyes. From where he was he could not see anything like smoke, but he smelt it plainly, and was suspicious, and this made him apply his glasses.

''A forest fire cannot be advancing he''Explained but the two cities must be on fireThat is the reason everything here is clear of smoke an as there is not the slightest vestage of smoke in any direction. No forest fire can burn in all this snow in on the ground and the trees bared of leaves. When did you discover this Evans an and where?''

''On a hill facing tward general Sancoes Manleys lines, and only about an hour ago.''

''Strange''Said general Hanson.' What direction is the wind? Did you notice?''

''Southeast''Answered Violet.''But there is no strong breese of any kind. The atmosphere is almost still.''

''I'll have to investigate into this''Said general Hanson''It is strange that we cannot see the glow or any signs of fire anyway or anywhere, though now I'm firmly in the belief that it is the two cities that are burning.''

''Maybe the smoke of the opposing sides and from the battle line and general „ivians hides it''Said Jennie.

''That may be so too''Exclaimed Angeline.''The smoke of battle is thick awful thick, so thick that you cannot see the flashes of the guns at all.''

''We could see the glow despite the thickest smoke''Said general Hanson''I fear it is too far away and it is not dark enough yet anyway.''

He ordered one of the officers to go and locate the cause of all the smoke. The officer obeyed, general „anson himself going back to the lines, while general Evans looked in his own field glasses trying in vain to locate the faintest glow. It was tward darkness when the moon was peso peeping through the smoke when Violet looking tward the south east exclaimed excitedly:

''It is from the southwest. I can see a long faint sheet of carmine reflection.''

All turned to look in that direction and were indeed awed at what they saw. The sky was lighted up along the horizon of the far distant treetops and between them by a long streamer of ruddy light even to be too fight for a forest fire. It seemed still but nevertheless growing faintly brighter as it grew darker minute by minute. Evans climbed one of the tallest trees and looked in the direction of one of the wooded hills covered with evergreen pines and hemlocks and was appalled at what he saw. A long sea of fire was moving straight tward the right rear of that great hill advancing in squares like the enemy during a charge. The fire was burning on the top of the trees.

He had never seen such a sea of fire in all his life. Mountians of various clouds of smoke were banked against the sky, clouds of various colors and pierced by flames rising swiftly into the air. Evans hastily realized that it was a large stretch of turpentine trees or forests that were burning and the conflagration was moving tward the pine forest for the oder of pine and turpenine was in the air. He quickly decended to the ground all excited.

''We are in danger from a big sea of fire''Said general Evans''It is indeed advancing from the southwest.'' as As luck would have it a l the other christian officers had seen the approaching destruction and hastily summoned up thousands of men not active with the enemy to fight the flames back if possible. General „anson Hanson himself saw forhimself the approach of the firestorm. A large sea of roaring flames burning all before it was overlapping the right section of the pine covered ridge which a l the officers in that vinicity were already out with many thousands of men trying to fight back the flames before it overlapped general „ivians right wing. Hundreds of thousands all along the line indeed were giving serious resistance to the approaching conflargration blasting down trees by the thousand, and making a small counter fire, but in vain the troops in the region of the pine forest alone were compelled to flee before the intense parching heat the scene itself resembling an earthly hell. Only in the region of the hemlock and pine forests was the danger threatening.Other trees all devoid of leaves were in no danger.

When general „anson reached the extreme point of observation he saw that the fire ocean was moving from the southwest tward general „ivians right flank thickly wooded with evergreen threatening to overlap his whole line. If the fire would burn tward the leafles forests all would be well and the fire could but chec be checked. But not so. The fire was moving upon the evert evergreen forests instead. He watched the approaching conflargration for only a minute and then decided to act.

''General „ivians lines is in considerable peril and we will have a lot of excitement to save him from being ousted.''He said to those who he selected for the work of over coming the conflargration. ''This must be a branch of the great conflaraction in the two cities for the enemy have fired the evergreen forests and the two cities in order to get away from our armies in case they are worsted by us in the battle raging. The fire was reported by telegraph to be moving tward my brothers right wing.''

General Evans came up at this moment with general Henrique.

One tenth of the army who is not fighting the enemy are preparing for flight for they cannot battle the flames with success.''Said Henriwe.''This darn fire might now give the Manleys a good chance to esp escape from Evangelinia Crania.''

''Is that so!''Exclaimed general Hanson.''Not much for I'll see that he does not, for fire or no fire those men retreating have got to stand their ground against both flames and the enemy. General yivians right is also harassed by the ravaging firestorm and y probably by the enemys assault also. General „ivians armies are in danger of being hemmed in by both foes, and they have got to stand their ground against both or surely the Manleys will escape. If they escape the war is lost. We can ourselves retreat or even advance any direction we please, but general Vivian cannot advance or retreat unless the enemy is hurled back.''

''Can't we manage to stop the conflargration some way then!''Asked general Evans, who by no means had any intentions of giving up serious as the situation was, and knowing by general Hanson's white face that indeed a good portion of general „ivians army was being threatened seriously.

''We have got to do something''Said General Hanson.''Henrique get your artillery men to bring up all the explosives they can get not used on the enemy and mine all the trees not burning yet in the path of the forest fire.''

Henrique was off like a flash. About twenty minutes later thousands of Angelinians Abbisannians, and Abyssinkilians were trying all their energy on the work of getting the wagon loads of explosivesto the scene, and within two hours they arived to the pint and the explosions were as constant asmakstry fire.But on and on came the consuming enemy driving the long line of firefighters before it.Dosmdg the long lines of men who were standing their ground against the desperate assailants to try in all their power to push forward, general Hanson „ivian ordered all the men retreating to stand firm at all costs as the fire must be checked or all would be lost. Henrique soon came up his uniform coat almost burned off.

''My men can't check the confounded conflargration though at some parts the enemy are giving way.''He blurted out. ''The fire is leaping the biggest gaps we make, and is coming on withthe speed of a race horse driven forward by a high southwester. Where ever my thousands of firefighters tried with might and main to make a desperate stand the fierce heat routs them.''

It indeed seemed to the little Vivian Girls and the generals that it would be impossible to remain in the dense atmosphere more than a minute and live. Their eye balls were smarting, their ear drums seemed about to burst, an iron hand seemed to be clutching at their lungs and c hocking the breath out of them. They staggered sputteringly and coughing like victims in the last stages of Consum ption for the clearing ahead. Thousands of Angelinians though picked off by scores of „landelinian sharpshooters were fighting the fire, Evans sticking to his post as the other generals were even if they dropped dead.

One third of general „ivians whole right wing was giving terrific battle, to both the foe and fire, though forced backward by a yard, scores of men dropping dead from over exertion or by shots from enemy bushwackers. but the survivors fought on. The officers ever ordered the fire fighters to advance on the flames as now they seemed s checked along the portion to the left. Evans himself could not expect them to advance a step for now a fierce hurricane of hot wind was blowing like a screaming gale through the burning woods, and to „iolet and her sisters it seemed inhuman to 178 expect any man to stay near the inferno and live in the face of such parching heat. They heard the hiss of water from somewhere striking hot metal and wood, and causing clouds of steam to add to the horror of the smoke and singing heat. Seemingly from everywhere there was a terrible uproar of fire and elements a d far ahead of them to the right they could see through the thick haze another angry red glow which showed that the fire was not checked, but tricking them, and it was against this spot that the thousands of Abbisannians with explosives were desperately fighting though hard pressed.

If it had been a ground fire it would not have been so bad, but a crown fire was worse.

''Surely they must drop before the intense heat!''Thought Violet.

The smart in their eyes, ears and throat, the deadly grip on their lungs, the singing in their earns was increasing all the time and now they were pressed back step by step by new fires started by the sparks among the fallen trees a new ang agnoy was felt. They could feel their skin blistering from the intense heat. Were they to be burned alive before they were suffocated?

Evans felt like ordering a retreat but no, he would not quit as y yet. He would stay y untill he dropped. Soon something within general Henriques head seemed to snap. He felt himself falling, and held on to a tree with the desperation of a dr wing man.

''Retreat boys, retreat''He gasped.''It's getting at us from another direction.''

Violet and her sisters seeing the men recoiling followed them. The singing in Evans ears seemed to suddenly stop, the smart in his eyes left him, the iron hand relaxed its merciless grasp upon his lungs, a sweet sensation of peace swept over him he abandoned his own head vhold on the tree and fell heavily to the ground. When he opened his eyes again he was lying on the bank on to top of heavy blankets close to the Sunbeam Creek. He could still hear the appalling roar of the forestfire, hundreds of mighty explosions, and the shouts of f officers giving shouts to the men.

''Blast as many of the trees on both sides as fast as you can.It's our only chance to check the fire.(''

Bythese sounds he knew that thevfight was still being waged.

''Here drink this''Cried a musical voice and he saw an anfelic child bending of over him with a can of hot milk the best restoravice for any one overcome by smoke. Evans chocked as he sat up and drank it, but after it was down he felt better, and was able to get to his feet. He discovered that it was his little friend Violet who had given him the milk.

''Do you feel alright now general or shall I get some of the soldiers to help you to a safer place?''Violet inquired as she and her sisters helped him t o a stump of a tree where he sat down.....

''No angel I'm alright I guess.''Answered Evans weakly.''Who brought me out of that inferno?''

''I and my sisters did. The fire is advancing on us. Are you going back, or will you stay and fight?''

''No I don't think so ''Replied Evans.''I'm going to stick and check this conflargration even if it kills me.''

''But you must not and shall not stay on this side.''Protested Violet.''We can't check it here by tno means. The christian generals mean to retreat across to the other side and stem it there. They themselves are just as determined as you and declare that it has got to be checked, though I believe it will not no matter how hard wevfifht fight it just now.''

Violet and her sisters helpled general Evans across, and here he and his men fought the fire untill it was checked for a few minutes at this spot, then retreated and swam across the quiet and brautiful stream. General vivians right wing assaulted fiercely by the enemy on the front and assaulted by forest fires on the rear put up such a stong strong fight against either one that soon they managed to at least check the advancing fire stopping it's onward rush tward the east, and compel ed it to slightly change its s direction. Thousands upon thousands of trees at once had been mined and blown up and to bits and such gaps were made now that the fire could make little progress. Men Evans and the little girls reached the bank on the other side they saw that the fire had already burned the trestops on the western banks leaping across the sky in long singing tongues of flame. The very fire wall fanned by the gale roared like artillery, showers of burning brands and branches falling into the melting slug slush of the still half fron frozen river amid a pandemonium of sounds. The men were vworking frantically on the other side blasting trees by the hundred per minute Evans now directing the fierce fight, and soon nearly every tree along those banks on the eastern side were down.

The heat from the roaring fire sea beyond became so parching now that the fighters were forced to recoil and the deep snow was melting on the ground like on a redhot stove and filling the icy stream with water. General Kinderninss fire fighters made better success, even many landelinians who were prisoners being forced to help in the desperate fight against the advancing destruction, but one af after another they dropped like flies before the terrific heat.

I403.

Already two thousand men had lost their lives on account of landelinian snipers, and many more were overcome by heat and smoke. Fortunately this fight seemed to be on the win winning side of the christians. The fire meeting with such stern resistance and so desperately chocked along the river wasseeming to be changing its course, the Angelinians making good success, and the wind was now also blowing against the roaring screaming conflargration, having changed to the northwest and blowing briskly.

''My but that was a narrow escape''Said violet to general Evans.''It's fortunate that the wind is changing. I thought the fire would not be checked at all..''

Suddenly violet saw a little boy in the uniform of a landelinian scout running tward them and when he reached them he halted stared at Evans and the little girls, who drew rein and gasped.

''You cannot escape us yet!''Said Evans.''You of course are only a boy, but a Glandelinian scout, and even though you be a child and you make the slightest break these dashing little girls will easily catch you.''

I'm no glandelinian and have only escaped the glandelinians and have come to warn you before it is too late.''Said the lad.''Honest I'm not k joking.''

''How can we tell if you are not joking?''Said Jennie repo reproachfully.

''It may be an excuse on your part.''

''No,no, cross my heart. The fire is tricking you at the north, and has leaped across the river there. It's a regular fire ocean going forward at the rate of a windstorm.''

''Good God is that so!''Gasped general Evans.Then fearing yet that the lad was fooling he looked in that direction with his glasses.

''We can't check it here at all''He said almost crying.''It has indeed tricked us.It's leaped across the Sunbea Creek at the north and moving with irrestible fury tward general vivians main rear. We have got to warn general Hanson. Violet, you are a good runner, warn him.''

Violet went off like a shot reaching general Hanson who was directing a fierce fight at the south bend of the stream trying in vain to check the advancing fire enemy.

''The fire has leaped the stream and is burning its way to ha hem father in on all sides.' Cried violet.''You are tricked uncle. You are not conquering the fire at all, but running your whole force of fire fighters into the very jaws of death.''

General Hanson's heart sank at this news. He took his glasses and glanced northward where he saw a regular seething ocean of fire pouring through forest after forest of pine trees across his side of the stream and advancing down upon the whole rear of the direction of the forests on his brothers rear with indescribable fury.

''We have got to warn general Zimmermann.''Said general Hanson.''Violet find the crew of the signal s station at Jennie vivian and tell them to flash a quick warning. Then hasten to the battle line where your sisters and general Evans are and tell him to order a retreat....''

General Hanson saw through his glasses that this was true but to his horror many of his own fighters who were retreating were persued by a roaring red hell a thousand feet high and rubbish under the snow was even smoking like a smudge of the infernal region. The scene was like a volcano in eruptio,n eruption. violet rushed off finding the signal men, and telling them of general Hansons orders.

The men had their signals going in a moment, and Kindernines signals ..en were soon answering them. Ten minutes ,n later general Zimmermann goththe warning and none too soon. Zimmermann noticed that tward his lines clouds of white smoke already hung in immense wreaths. The very sky in the direction of his head quarters was becoming gradually red as a sheen of light could make it, the atmosphere was becoming dry and burni ng, while a thick fog smoke filled with the oder of burning evergreen foliage hid everything from view. Zimmermann getting the warning had realized that there had been a sudden increase in the forest fire, for terrifying floods of fire roaring like the battle itself, had leaped the Sunbeam creek to half its length in the battle region andwas overlapping the right wing of general ivians army burning all before it, and routing the fire fighters all the while giving them no further chance to shot resistance whatever. Zimmermanns army was thirty five iles away from the advancing fire, but the glare could be seen a hundred miles from here.

A rain of red hot cinders was decending among his lines, or crashing into the icy stream with the hissing of mulitudes of fire brands, while great sheets of flame rose from the distant forests of pine trees to a great height. It was at t he same time dark a d red as blood, the fire making an awful roar as it approached and a sea of fire rushing up a mountian side was seen to form into two huge walls of flame the biggest with its ensanguined tongues sweeping tward the valley of Opholia Run threaten ing to consume towns and villiages. Clouds of the blackest smoke hung over the advancing conflargration the glowing torrents of flame advancing nearer and nearer every moment, moving forward with a hissing roar and burning tward Zimmermannians lines like the fire adalanches of hell....

Hot gaseious winds swept through the smoke filled woods not burning and at other wpots in the forests turpentine trees catching fire would explode with a continual series of muffled roarings and detonations, while fiery clouds in the form of millions of sponges arose in front of one of the conflargrations, and above the whole retreating line of fire fighters the clouds hung like a stupendous pall and continued to spread mingled with sparks and embers carre carried by the windstorm....

180 For a long while his whole army was being covered by a crebus pall which was gradually but faintly broken by the great glow of the ever increasing fire storm. The clouds were of the blackest kind and a fearful sight now seeming to be in the form of two gigantic wings spreading miles overhead the threatened christian line under general ivian and zimmermann, and the lower extremity was filled with piercing tongues of flame.
The whole surface seemed agated in glowing tumultious convus convulsions and the red darkness which it cast was more seemingly supernatrural and fearful than words can say, more worse than the eclipse of the sun. The higher clouds in the sky spread outward in the most appalling manner expending swiftly as it was united by other glowing clouds of smoke and in those few hours the whole surrounding country was enshrouded in a weird ruddy glow At certain times the intense glow of the conflargration became hidden by sackcloth like clouds of smoke that arose in front of it, the most dreadful unearthly darkness overshadowing the surrounding country. Many fearful detonatiions could be heard, and immense sheafs of sparks could be seen occasionally. At times the black pillar of smoke in front of the conflargration would become so intense that the darkness would blot everything from view, while far to the north an angry bright red glare as if it were the whole world afire, beca e more visible.

Everything would have been obscured by the pall if it had not been for the fearful shine of the conflargration which at times glowed fearfully and fiercely through the rolling clouds of sm-k smoke, and a new and more distant ridge amid the universal gloom shone line a long mountian of fire. Two long and awful hours more the s stupendous scene had continued since first discovered. Showers of brands fell like lances of brimestone seemingly from the whole vast cloud the approaching fire at times seeming to fairly blast the air amid the fearful tempest of sparks. For a time now the fearful darkness now see ed to concentrate and gather about the glare so that it became invisible. This was caused by c, clouds upon clouds that arose from a treacherious sude among the rubbish under the snow ignited by the fierce heat of the conflargration in the tree tops. Then all of a sudden despite the snow it tried to burst into a sea of flames, while all around the conflargration the very skies seemed to disolve in fire, the surrounding hills were mountians of fire, while here and there appeared whilr ing clouds of yellow and red smoke. At all points where the smudges had not broken into flame there had been observed f various smoke clouds which had now formed into one terrible spongy pilliar spreading and forming at times a c, cloud of snowy whiteness against the dark sky, the sheen of light from the main conflargration being now so bright that the whole world seemed to become like a real red hell.

One of the biggest and nearest ridges was all on fire, and then suddenly it was seen that another mountian side and top was bursting into a sea of flame. Even hundreds of thousands of trees were falling in every direction, the fire was fairly screaming, and the wind roaring like a terrific hurricane. Blazing brands, of all kinds of fiery debris pelted the valleys as thick as the worse blizzard, and the whole region seemed to be a pit of hedious hellstorms of fire. Over all the hill sides, across all the wide pine forests the conflargration had streamed in an unbroken roaring hissing fire sea and nothing could be heard the roar of destruction was so great .
Already the very air among the retreating fire fighters was so hot that it cut the lungs like the fumes of acid, while the smoke and gases was becoming stifling. sheets of heaming flames were advancing upon the retreating fighters under general Jack Ambrose Evans, the heavens seemed to rain fire, and trees far ahead of the fugitives even caught afis.Blood they were persued by a roaring wall of fire, the fugitives rush ing on before the howling, browling blistering heat, through stifling smoke, over the beds of smouldering embers, through deep snow slush, under the swinging menceance of burning branches, or tottering tree trunks.
"My gracious I never knew that a forest fire could gurn so fast and play such a trick on us in such a terrible way."Gasped violet as the fire roared on sending up darker clouds and greater volumes of flames."Yet this forest fire is the worse I have ever seen."
"See"Exclaimed Jennie."One of those fire seas has already struck the clearings, and the very skies seem to be covered with fire seas."
guddenly violet stole a frightened ge glance tward the big wall of fire, and saw that it was advancing straight tward them . They were more than five thousand yards away yet the heat could be felt from there. This fire advanced with a roar as if the heavens were bursting, and the little girls saw that the group of fire fighters were being overtaken.
One big line of fire occupying the width of the Mississippi River was pouring across the southern part of the Sunbeam Creek with indescribible fury sweeping away w everything that was in its path. Other s all lakes of fire had swelled it to an immense sea roaring and crackling with an e ame tward the heinestic christian lines with seemingly irresistible fury or entering many burns a bodies in its path.Another terrible sea of fire at the same time moving like a swift current and throwing a glare seen for a hundred miles threw itself across a large ravine being driven all by the christian center, and threatening their flanks, rushing on tremendous charge, and thundering its way through all the opposing obstructions, moving in great seas seperately, the flames riding bodily hi into the air.This immense sea of fire burned madly on, though nearly all of the fire fighters in the christian center was doing all their utmost to check its destructive course, and the roaring was indeed most frightful..... It was at this time when a large wing of the ad ancing fire advancing fire was seen to change its course, when a strange sound in the direction of the northeast was distinctly heard above the roar of the gigantic conflargration.The men unde Jack Evans had escaped their pursuers and noticed that at different places, the fire was changing its course and moving northeastward again.Suddenly as they managed to chse o seek refuge in a cavern there was a tremendous shrieking roar of flames far in their advance, they saw trees already bursting in a torch of flame and borne down in immense masses as they were burned through, while now the fire seemed to be coming on in a perfect sheet across the sky, and eva sweeping over the ground in immense longues of tongues.

"Hurry for the furthest inlet of the cavern."Gasped Evans."The main fire hurricane has struck us, and is driving the fire back to its former course again."

They had no sooner reac al the inner part of the cavern when the storm fire broke followed by sheets of flame that seemed to envelope everything.The terrible windstorm of the firestorm itself had taken taken the christians by surprise, and the first sign they saw was the thousand thousands of trees disappearing in a moment in a sea of fire amid a deafe ning deafening uproar.Everything was carried away by the furious wind, and burned by the fire and there was indeed indescribible confusion everywhere as myriads of big trees were torn by the roots and thrown and scattered about. Clouds of burning embers were also scattered in all directions and even multitudes of the Angolinians were hurled against their comrades and rolled about in acrobatic stunts by the force of the hot fire gale which was swelling to the strength of a gigantic cyclone though the wind was only the fierce denaght of the dreadful sea of flames which were leaping thousands of feet into the sky. With a fearful roar the flames were advanc ing upon Hannon lines with a full sweep of everything, and a most fearful firestorm that general Hannon or his men had e or seen was raging, carrin ora carrying away all the trees not burned yet, hurling thousands of the bigger ones about the ground only to envelope them into a sea of roaring flames. It seemed as if hell with all its fire had descended among the forest and not a tree could resist the fury of the hot winds, and many of the swaying blazing trees struck each other with a great rattling, and all of the soldiers who did not reach a place of safty clung to the fallen trunks of trees in deep ravines, but many of these were burned to death as the shrieking roaring fire storm overwhelmed them.General vivian had however succeded succeeded in getting out of his own army by a most clever ruse out of the main fire zone before the full blast of the fire hurricane reached them, and by sternest f work had blasted down hundreds of thousands of trees, hauled them away, and made wide breaches with the intention of preventing the hell of flames from progressing onward altogether. The fires became like the infernos of hell here too, the fury of the conflar gration soothing clear up the forests on the mountian sides which at once became an a will ocean of fire lashed horror, the wind fairly becoming a screaming tempest, screaming like hundreds of thousands of fiends bent upon their destr- destruction, and many witnesses declared afterwards that the sea of glowing flames could be seen plainly on hills two hundred miles away from the conflargration while the glow along the sky could be seen at a distance of eight hundred miles to two thousand.

Nothing along this stretch of hills could resist the fierce conflargration, and fire typhoon, and millions of trees were thrown down only the second pair to be it edintely enveloped in tirgues of soothing flame that at once leaped to the height of three hundred feet. General vivian himself thought that he had never seen the wind blow so hard during a fire storm before, and not a continual prolonged howling roar rude him understand that our divisions of christians were still a trying to stand their ground, and blasting trees by thousands per minute. It appeared to be a fire storm of a sixty mile an hour velocity by the way it swept the trees do down in so great number, the wind coming straight from the southwest raging with the most terrible fury.By the dint of courage and very clever tatics general vivian a had in a weak time managed to get his lines miles away from the dronded conflargration, and then the seige had to be continued for a while at a most safe distance, and the enemy thought that the forest fire they themselves had started had drove away the besiegers when in atead the christians were only opposing the forest fires with such fury that finally it could not hardly progress an any further in that location and another final change in the direction of the wind also changed the status of affairs and the christian generals considered themselves exceedingly lucky. General vivian continued his concentration against the effects of Manley to dislodge him and of the remainder forest fires for another week while Hanson and the other christian generals were only tightening the siege all the more, and when hard pressed general Manley threatened to give battle again, as the enemy now alm longer to put down the ragin forest fires, and stop the closing of the christian seige, as general Hanson or vivian wished again to get a chance to strike the foe lines at the St Dominican fortifications. Everything was smouldering trees and ashes for miles, a scene of great desolation being exposed for hundreds of miles. fter the terrible forest fires had been overthrown in his own location general vivian army also beca ing becoming heavily reinforced again by an army of Abyssinkilians under general Here fell upon a small division of glandelinians concentrated in front of the Fort Dominican pallasades near porrinto porrington creek, captured the division, and the larger columns of glandelinians finding themselves followed closely by the forces of christians decided to op e oppose gus'mum Manley and Federals intentions of remaining on the fedensive, and start attacking the christians be fore gushum Manley and Federal should arive with their forces. Indeed general vivian became in dire dread of Manleys intentions, and started forceful concentration ans answ as soon as he secured his new position which he had captured. Hanson was stretching his reinforcements along a portion of the Mc-Hollester Run, and placing the others into position in the Mc-Hollester woods, and started himself to renew his own concentration under cover. Balw Baldwins batteries took up their positions on the crowning hills known as Alicios ridges where he saw the entire force of the enemy moving south of the town called porrington fronting the fortifications of Eva Crania. It seemed evident that Manley was intending to try and force the christian generals to raise the seige once more and that a more horrible battle of the seige was coming as this time by his movements it did seem that Manley was meaning buisness.

Over the threatening movements of the enemy Hanson vivian was compelled to change his positions, and learning that gushum Manley had succeeded in ariving to the help of his son through some trick he ordered Zimmermann to concentrate his forces in front of the region of Beldon Gallion and under no conditions to allow general gushum Hnley should he abandon the attempt to raise the seige to retreat again by way of Madge Evans or Jennie Turner. Hanson also decided to clos close in the glandelinian army that was opposing general vivian at Torrington orsek and if possible to force the surrender of the whole army by threatening it with an annihilition. This would of course finish the intentions of general gushum Manley.

The seige of Eva Crania had already raged since October and now it was Feburary and snow lay on the ground several feet deep, and the weather was so terribly cold that the enemy suffered exceedingly. They had the best of the enemy in everything the christians did. The whole of Angelinia is almost tropical but never e xced exceedingly hoty. Calverinia is es exceedingly cold in winter, and extremely hot in summer. The glandelinians had never been in such a climate and so were never used to it at all, and so suffered terribly. While the Angelinians enjoyed the cold and keen in air the deep snow and sometimes did like s to see a blizzard come sweeping on. But here in the region of Eva Crania the temperture of the climate was also tropical as this region was close to Angelinia or right on the boundary line, and though here it was Fenuary the temperture even now registered [illegible] and the enemy who were besieged here suffered severely from the cold while the Angelinians did not mind it in the least. The enemy had to attack the christians at T orrington orsek and assails a impregnable position and Manley that is John Manley did not like to do this but gushum Manley did not recieve any orders from general Manley his brother and superior to remain on the defensive and so decided to attack the christians themselves as soon as he could do so.

CHAPTER EIGHTEEN.

HOW O'ROF THE VIVIAN GIRLS WAS ALMOSTBURNED TO DEATH.

violet vivian one of the Angelinian or Abbiscinian Princesses had a narrow escape from death, nd during sscene which almostturned into a most distressing tragedy. Indeed it almost turned out as one of the most dramatic tragedies that had ever happened to any prince or Princess. And after a while complete investigation revealed the fact that no matter where the vivian girls were, far outside the christian lines or inside,, and even under strong guard they were not safe from glandelinian vandalls or spies and the like. Some ohers had at first believed that she had through some accident set the house on fire herself. she had been alone in her headquarters at the time and wore only her own customary clothines and no uniform. The vivian girl Princess was siting in her bed room at the very centre of th the house, and where at the time some commotion had been going on recently.

gus and her sisters had completed their own work for the day, and had left their own uniforms off for the next day and she herself had settled herself comfortably on her bed and then laid down to take a nap. Two officers of the guard, had come in to inv inspect the building and see that no secret foes were lurking around and as they passed the room they peered in at her with much awesome curiousity as they had never before seen a little girl so beautiful in their whole lives. hey noticed that the vivian girls was lying o down on her bed, and appeared sound asleep as they passed. hey observed as they supposed that there was no one else in the room but herself and they here fore passed on without looking further. About ten feet from the room the two officers stopped to watch some soldiers who were cleaning out one of the halls.

Two ohor soldiers who were commissioned officers were standing some four feet from them, and almost on a straight line with the room occupied tby the vivian Girls. here were other soldiers also standing wit with their backs to the room, about seventeen feet away from the room. They were all in earnest conversation. Suddenly one of the officers saw some of the soldiers run swiftly tward the room occupied by the vivian girls. Turning to find out why the soldiers were so excited as they ran, hey saw the hallway or the ceiling roofted inbsmoke and clouds of it were pouring out from the room. Calling to some more of the soldiers, the officers followed the soldiers, and raced tward the room, one of them tearing off his coat as he ran. moke was pouring ever thicker from the room, whose door was open. As the foremost of the soldier reached the door he saw violet run around to the front end of it with her clothing on fire from the waist down, and the whole bed also was on fire. She looked to them like a blazing torch. T The two nearest soldiers were in their shirt sleeves but they caught the burning vivian girl Princess and wih desperation attempted to beat out the fa flames with their bare hands, or stripping off burned shreds of her clothing. he poor unfortunate little girl semed very much dazed, and with piercing screams would have broken away from the two soldiers. had another one seized her, and throw his coat around her to smother the flames. But soon the terrified girl struggled and finally broke from their grasp, her burned clothing falling off as she slipped from their grasp.

Realizing that the young girl must be captured if her life was to be saved two of the other soldiers raced after her and succeeded in covering her lower body as she ran into the open arms of a captian who managed to head her off. This young officer held the screaming child heroine for an instant while another soldier smothered the flames. However she was frantic with pain and almost crazed by fright and she again broke from their grasp. The flames were again fanjed into life by her swift motion through the air and were now shooting upward tward her shoulders and faces. This time the captian caught her again and covered her shoulders and face with his coat.

"get her on the ground." he shouted.

They succeeded in throwing her down on the floor, and holding her after a considerable struggle, while they pressed out the flames with the coat. Crazed still by her fright the poor little girl fought them s desperately for a while, and then remained still as they succeeded in smothering the flames. By this time the screams of the vivian Girl Princess had attracted nearly every soldier outside within hearing as well as general Evans and her sisters, who rushed up and her own sisters stripped the hot charred clothing from violets flesh. General Evans, her guardian had at this moment just returned from a scouting tour. He now broke through the cordon of hapers and tore frantically at the smouldering clothing while one of the others ran to get a pail of water.

His hands were badly burned but he struggled on untill some one cut the string which held the clothing in place. As the clothing fell from her scarred flesh violet gave a moan in her intense agony, and Evans sobbed aloud.

As he p bent over her prostrate form she lookedup at his streaming eyes, and wih a feeble smile caught his burned hands in hers saying bravely;

"It's all right Evans dear "Don't worry.I'll be all right soon."
And then the most famious of little children realising that while her life may have been spared yet her future may have been ruined said anxiously;
"Oh I hope my poor face is not burned.Is it?"
Evans pressed his face close to hers and assured her truthfully that her most exquissite beauty had not been marred and she answered her loving guardian with a brave attempt at a smile.Putting her hand behind her back and touching the swollen charred flesh she said;
"Oh , Evans dear, it stings so awfully."
He turned her partly over and found she was still lying on a pile of half smoulder ing clothing a veritble bed of coals which had almost burned into her backs Lifting the unfortunate vivian girl they rem had under her and pulled out the smouldering clothes.Part of the skin adherring to the clothes left the raw flesh partly exposed and a look of most intense an agony overspe over spread her sosbeautiful features.As gently as possibly they could they wrapped her in coats and laid her on a cot in another room.Then two of the soldiers lifted the cot and she was carried to another room and placed on the floor while a doctor was called.Then a rapid drive to the main army base hospital for the highest generals and others was made for treatment.General Darger rode on the back sent of the sleigh, and Evans drove.All that was needed was done.Yet a report issued later that she was resting comfortably and that her injuries were slight.However as it was feared her conditions may become aggravated an army specialiest in burns was called in to assist the other army doctors.Her mother and Father the Empress and emperor and others persides Hanson ,vivian and his own wife and many other high generals were called but a wireless was sent to her.It was feared that Violet would grow rapidly worse, and as all feared she would succumb to her injuries nothing was left that could be done for her, while $2,000 of the Caminis on the investigation that some one had set fire to her bed while she lay in it were scouring the whole neighborhood and the rebel encampments in disguise on the outlook for vivians

The reason of the search came thus;
One of the soldiers had seen from inside the window and was a witness to the whole thing.He had been the one to raise the alarm and who had been the cause her of her being saved.He told his story as thus;
"I was an eye witness to the whole scene, and was the first to reach her and snother the flames.I had been on guard just outside the window of her room, and looking in to see if she was alright, saw her bed on fire and a strange gray figure run out of the room.As I saw the fire I quickly ran a side, raised the alarm.As I ran twrd the room smoke was pouring out of the door, but at first I could not see po r poor violet in it.However in another moment she came running around the front end of the room with her clothing ablaze.She had come out from another door.Her poor little face was dreadful to see, the fright, horror, and pain written plainly thereon, and the fierce flames were spreading upward.She looked to me like a blazing torch.She also seemed to be completely dazed by her an ngony, but I caught her wrapping my heavy overcoat around her shoulders and sheilding her face from the flames that were rapisly spreading upward.After some difficulty and after she escape fro me and the other rescuers we finally got her down on the floor and finally extinguished the fmales flames.She then lay there on the floor, and let us tear the burned clothing off of her, to which the skin frequently adherred without a moan.Only when we carried her on a cot to another room and surmoned a doctor did she show any sign of breaking down.Then she sobbed a little.
Governor only had she nearly been burned to death but even while she was being rushed to the best hospital the Army firemen had a very difficult time, indeed the most difficult time of their lives to save the building from burning down.But they were at last successful, but half of the structure was gutted.Fortunately Violet had not been burned half as badly as at first feared, and the doctors finally reported that the burns would even heal without leaving a single scar

A trying experience. Adventure of child slaves.

It was no doubt that through the whole war so far battle hand of Providence had swiftly and unexpectedly, and also many times led the young vivian girl Princesses to perform many great exploits, which the rl best motion picture directors would have gladly paid them fifty thousand dollars a day to perform, but unfortunately when ever they made their daring exploits no movie picture camera were present to film their hair breadth adventures or experiences and their deeds, and therefore it was seldom that very many even among the Angelinians or the best friends of the vivian girls had ever beheld the most extraordinary thrillers done by them.Violets recent ex escape from deaf from fire, and the other experiences she and her sisters had had throughout the war so far again and again demonstrated the the assertion of the old proverb that usually truth is much more stranger and extraordinary than fiction, for during many of their exploits throughout the entire war, before and after its final stage the brave girls achieved many a miracle which the most daring movie director or actor would never have dreamed of daring to accomplish.

It was the night after Violet had been almost severely burned in her room, when her sisters, a large party of officers, and her three girl friends Jennie urmes, Angeline Richee, and Angelinia Aronburg mounted their horses to go to Emperor vivians headquarters to notify him that Violet was not half so severely burned as had been at first feared.

The vivian girls were riding in front of the column, while the others rode in the rear as a sort of body guard.It was indeed a very cold night, with the temperature around twenty eight below zero and snowing so beautifully hard that only objects fifty feet away could be seen very dimply.The whole partly however were bundled up warmly and every heart beat merrily over the fact that Violet had not been so seriously inmured as had been at first feared.And while the whole party galloped slowly and carefully through the deep snow,a gigantic column of fierce Gargoylian Kurds aided by Scoodlers and Whimsies and Growleywogs, accompanied by a sec column of still fiercer troops the Mic-Hollestinians on their way through to the rebel lines spre sped over the same road and twrd their rear.At first neither was conscious of the presence of he other as neither could see anything on account of the dense snow murks.

Nobody o in the column of rebels although they were close enough saw the column of christians and the girl ..ssiones, and for some unaccountable reason none of the party of christians saw t he onrushing glandelinian column.At the curve of a road the bloody crash came, and then the miracle happened.The column of Gargoylians reinforced by the fierce momentum of the heavy column of Mic-Hollestinians behind hurled the christian column before them and out of their path and raced on af if as if nothing had happened.It was a terrific and bloody fray however in that blinding snowstorm and though the Angelinian column was practically annihilated only the children surviving the glandelinian loss was terrific.Yet before the last of the column of glandelinians had passed and thundered over that crossroad, three of the vivian girls had leaped into a deep snow bank unharmed, fifty feet away from the scene of the terrible squabble, and h their other sisters and vans vanished completely.The rebel leader had been injured fatally and fourty of his men were killed and thirty mortally wounded, and as many more disabled.The christian force of thirty men had been wiped out.Jennie Joice and her other sisters had been in front of the Angelinian column at the time when the advancing column of rebels struck.

Instead of attacking the fighting the rebels also the vivian girls not knowing who could insue had made for it efforts to get away.At this po point was the railroad tracks of the Mic-Hollester and Pandora and things happened which probably no one could ever explain.Despite the speed of the locomotive that was approaching, an express train loaded with t soldiers the horses with the vivian girls looked into its path, they were struck, the locomotive killed the horses and tossed the Vivian girls all of them into the air straight in its path and then as they fell picked them up again and carried them off on its black nose into the frosty snowy night, unhurt and still conscious.

Indeed to think of save little girls to be struck by that terrific weight of unyielding steel at a speed of about sixty five miles an hour, should have been at least caused their instant death, or at least the breaking of at least several internal injuries.What cushioned the shocks that these beautiful and delicate young girl bodies, did not even faint, but were able to cling to the cold steel engine, while the icy blast of the snow storm drove to pull them under the wheels was a mystery indeed.

What happened at this point is best perhaps told in graphic words told by Jolie herself later.

"We had started over the crossing of a plank road and were close to the railroad, when the rebels attacked and annihilated our column of escort ing parties.Our horses mad with fear raced right in front of an oncoming express.None of us girls saw the train coming, of or if so the crash n knocked the memory ouf of it out of my mind.I myself don'y have seemed to have felt the blow and neither did my sisters, but I knew I and they were high in t he air, with the feeling that I was falling, not of going up as I was probably doing.I c lutched at the darkness with both hands, but there was nothing for me to c hatch.When something lumped against my body and I grabbed it and held.I then saw my sisters were with me but at e different points.not suspecting at first where I or they could really be, I waited almost impatiently for the thing which ever it was to stop its tremendous shaking, so I could look down to see if it was safe t o let myself drop.But it kept on shaking, there was a strange noise as of the frenzied motion of some vast engine, n and an in sy hurricane of wind driving clouds of snow at me cut right through my heavy clothes, and I could see nothing whatever ahead.Turning my head to face that snow laden wind, I looked down a long sha shaft of light whitened still more by the thick curtain of falling snow, and saw something like two shining lines running off toget her into a strip of brightly illumijated snow.On each side was a dense white pall of snow and whitish darkness.Telegraph pi poles appearing through the snow mark only faintly were rushing down that lane of light apparently at me and w vanishing into the snow pall on each side. For a moment I thought I was hanging to the outside or on the top of my horse, and therefore I yelled;''weak''.''

Then suddenly I realized I and my sisters were on the front of some immense railroad engine, and at first I was so frightened that I almost let go.But for the moment I was suddenly comforted by the thought that if I or my sisters could only hold on for another moment or minute, the engineer would stop the fast train, and I would be all right.so I held and the fierce wind whipped at me, and them, and the snow was driven at us in perfect rushing clouds so dense you could see nothing even in front of your face.Indeed that awfully cold wind went through my cothes clothes as if I had nothing on.

''I thought to myself''I cannot stand this another minute. when in the name of heaven are they going to stop.''I turned my head and looked forward again wondering what my sisters were thinking and do ing. Now I could see nothing but fancied just the same that tepep telephone poles, t rees and banks and things like great white grotesque ghosts were flying at me and them, just as fast as ever.I thought the wind was hurling a mountain of snow at me.And they indeed were not stopping the train.they were not going to stop.This made it seem to me and then also like some horrible night mare, for how could I guess that the engineer had not felt and heard that crash when his engine struck and killed our horses.I could not see him, but the engine only seemed to go faster and the wind to grow more stronger.I began to wonder if he had gone mad on account of the accident, or if he was dead in the engine--I h had read of such things many times.I and my sisters kept on screaming and hollering in a perfect chorus, the fierce wind however tearing the s sound out of our mouths and burying them in the rear of the locomotive untill we grew o hoarse and finally gave it up, and tried to think what else to do.One thing I and they too felt sure, was that we would freeze to death if this kept up much longer.The wind was almost sweeping me and my sisters to one side, and we managed to pull ourselves around so that our feet rested on something, it was probably the cow catcher.This for my part and also theirs eased the strain on our hands somewha t but made the cold blast even worse, and gave us a very good and magnificent chance to have more and more of those beautiful clothes of snow hurling into our faces.It was twenty five below zero weather too, and it appeared that our bodies were splitting the wind for that whole onrushing train.I myself looked sideways, hoping for some sign of a big town or city that would force this terrible engine to stop on its made run, but only those thick clouds of snow flitted by.sometimes I could see lights in the windows of something either distant b rracks or houses or farm houses but could see nothing else.Two lights were so close that I saw some people or soldiers or at least their murky forms gathered together but could not see the outlines of the houses.It appeared to us that everybody in the world were happy and safe but I and my sisters.We were in danger of going to a horrible death and nobody seemed to pay any attention.several times I had wondered about Gertrude, Jennie and Angeline lches, but now I took time to really think. were they all killed.It seemed probable or someone would have missed us and telegraphed ahead to stop the train instead of letting it goi go on so fast forever.I thought of them all, but most of my three girl friends and my poor sisters violet , lying in the hospital burned by a fire set by a rascally murderer.Then my hat started to blow off, and some how with one hand I managedvto ko move the muffler up around my ne neck so that it held that hat and made it stay with me to the end.I saw my sisters on the same spot and their faces were filled with the looks of terror and distress.Of course it seemed to me to be a foolish thing to think of a hat when I might have used the muffler to tie myself ontosomething, if there was something to tie to, which I doubted very much.

By this time I felt I was ready to make a try at my voice again, and resolved to put everything into one good ll loud scream. gain the wind tore at it , and even when my sisters joined again it seemed to start more like a squeak, then grew into a deafeni ng howl that filled our ears and astonished me.I felt sure that the engineer must have heard our scream that time. I felt sure he could ,and felt sure he did, but he paid no attent ion, because we soon realized it was not our screams that made that loud noise, but the steam whistle of his own locomotive.still we felt sure that the whistle might mean that the train was going to slow down orsevon sti stop.I and no doubt my sisters also prayed begging god and h gis blessed mother to give me and my sisters strength to hold on just a few minutes ,o longe r. ut the tain did not slow down, it actually gathered speed, and that wind and torrent of snow grew worse, it becamenbeyond endurance.My hands were numb now, and I felt sure the next sharp lurch would mean our end.I cried bitterly with my face pressed against that cold plate and tward the end thought of most foolish things.I prayed again that if my life, or that of my sisters with me was to be taken that God might spare the others, at least violet.It was not fair for her.We soon sped through a small station. A group of soldiers stood on a large platform, and looked right at us.It was evident they saw us, but nobody appeared surprised or moved .What not any one going to do something? Did not any one care?Yes they did for I saw men running tward the train and waving their a arms excitedly and shouting.Many times before that I had thought of jumping, but kept waiting for that engine to slow its speed, even a little, a time that we felt sure would never come.All at once while the shouting of men grw louder I felt myself slipping.My hands freezing had lost their grip without my knowing it, and now I felt myself slowly sinking down hoeld only by the pressure of that terrific wind forcing me against that iron plate and driving tons of snow at me.When I suddenly noticed that the rails on the opposite tracks were visible, and as my body turned I saw the reason--another train was coming swiftly to pass us. he engine of mine was now slowing down but had given a sudden lurch and in spite of all I could do, I sank tward that side tward those rails, glittering in the glare of the oncoming headlight.

I felt sure now it was to be my end.I had hung on and so did my sisters all these long miles, only now to fall under the wheels of another train. I shut my eyes and gave up. o doubt I fainted as I fell, for the next thing I knew I must have been lying in a ditch surrounded and almost covered by a snow drift, and nothing could be seen in sight.I could not move an arm or leg.I felt sure they had been cut off.I had just strength enough to give one long cry before everything went black.

Indeed it was a miracle that the four or five or six of the vivian girls had landed unhurt on the breast of that hurtling locomotive, another miracle that one of them had fallen off unhurt, the others taken off when the train was broad brought to a stop all uninsured, and another miracle to save oice from freezing to death in a very short time.That also came to pass.Those who had been on the platform on the station who had seen them, and having counted six knew that one of them was missing.so a number of them with lantrens went down the crossing and continued along the railroad right of way untill they found the little girl.They carried her into the station where her sisters were being cared for,and where she was put on a cot, and an army doctor signalled for. All of these little girls were quickly taken to the Prinsesses hospital were they were treated only for exposure.Not a bone was broken not any ligament strained.Except for the exposure and a few slight bruises violet's sisters were none the worse for their harrowing experiences. Even their nerves were not hurt.From far and near after this curious minded people and soldiers had come to study the scene of the engagement, and to also pull puzzle out how six little girls on horseback can be struck by an engine of a fast army express going to porothy Gale, at sixty five miles an hour without injury.From the mangled corpses of the horses it was evident that the horses had almost gotten across and was hit in the extreme rear.This accounts for the escape of the three others girls, and why some of the others landed unscathed in the deep snow and above all what mysterious force tempered the terrific blow of that engines front to the vivian girls, no one has yet been able to explain.

ONE of the assistant rulers, and best beloved friend of Emperor Vivian of Abbicannia was Gaunon Procile. At the time Emperor Vivian left his ordinary palace in Abbicannia to take charge of things at Angolinia, Amithia city ,, when trouble with Landolinia states and provinces threatened,,, Gaunon was asked by the Emperor to go forth and take charge and rule the state of Abbicannia, h who while the Emperor Hanson Vivian his brother was asked to to take charge of matters in the loyal parts of the Angolinian country and her states.

The new ruler of the Abbicannian Prohince had a very Excellent Wife. Not only did she excel most other women in beauty, but she was also,,, a very righteous woman, kind and good natured and well fit to be the wife of the highest of all good rulers. But because of her excellent goodness which even exceeded her excellent beauty the people of the loyal section of the mighty Abbicannian nation adored her as much as any queen might be honored. She was a tall and stately woman and the way she usually dressed in the most costly clothing those who did not know her would never have suspected her true character.

Her husband used to say that in her manners, goodness,, and beauty and all other good qqualities she reminded reminded him of the Blessed Virgin Herself..... he had the usual dark complexions as all Abbicannians mostly have and was despite all her holy and good qualities a firm woman and to those who incurred her anger and displeasure it was step from under.

Her little daughter whose name was Henrietta Gaco Gaunon was also a sweet little sprite and though some what high spirited in nature was exactly like her mother in character. she had not a single enemy among the grown ups or among any of the most unruly boys and girls and never quarreled with any t of them, or theywith her. she made stea staunch friends with every one but was specially liked by Emperor Vivian, and the Emperor's daughters the vivian girl Princesses or what we know as violet and her sisters.

She was ten years,, had her mothers complexion and the same black brown hair. Also these two couples had a beautiful boy with long bobbed hair exactly like her his sisters in color but shorter. He was a good boy also likewas he was expected to be but he had a fiery independent nature and he was fully determined that everything should come his way or he'd knowthe reason why. He was four years olderthan his sister and usually tall for his age. He loved his sister dearly and did everything he could for the dear little girl. For the time that they were either residing in Abbicannia or the Abbicannian province, and also Calverinia they had been constant companions of the Vivian girlprincesses. The first time they had ever known the vivian girl Princesses it came through a chance outing. Little Henriette had been out side playing with some of her dearest of friends, boys and girls while her brother was standing beside the gate of Emperor Vivians Palace just looking on the two children with their father and mother having arived to visit the Emperor.

At this time he heard the sound of slowly trotting horses coming down the steeet and glancing in that direction the sight that methis eyes made him jump. For a moment he watched the approach of the riders in silent amazement and wondered who they were. He then called the attention of his sister andthe other children to them and to his surprise the others suddenly arose and stood at attention The beautiful girls on horseback approached swiftly now and seeing the group of children on the side walk and the two royal children, halted and dismounted. The other children happened to know them and sp spoke to them for a while telling them who the boy and girl were. The little girl , Henrietta, was a little shy of the extraordinarily beautiful kindly visitors and would have run into the gate yard and closed the gate on them in fear if her brother who had no shyness about him had not intervened. He had never seen them before until till now but nevertheless he knew from their dignified bearing that they were the vivian girl Princesses returning home. Therefore he encouraged his sister telling her that she should not be afraid of Emperor Vivians daughters after all she has heard about them. He then slowly led his sister out to them and their friendly manner, and courteous ways soon brought back her courage and both she and her brother had a long chat with them. The boy to i told them who he and his sister was and then after a few moments more they asked the two if they would like to go horse back riding with them for a time.

The boy and girl were very willing and quickly had their horses brought to them. When the butler reported to their father t that the boy and girl had gone out riding with the vivian girls Princesses they were dumbfounded.

The trip though not too long distant was one the two children would never forget as as long as they ever lived.They were only gone for a few hours spy an hour and a half and during that short time they saw three t l things which impressed their minds very much.The boy and the girl of course having heard about the sadness and horrors of child slavery and having seen much of it knew what it really was.They had gone for the first part to a moving picture show and here had been displayed the conditions of child slavery and all its wicked and horrible results.The two as well as the Vivian girls were greatly impressed by this and after they had left the show they talked a good deal about it.Then Violet and Her sisters told them that it was apparent that the great conflict was thruqtoning to grow in intensity that their own surrhorities at their own requests were endeavoring to put an ondto all the child slave trade of the glandelinian states and because of that reason the wicked Glandelinian powers were rising up and clamoring for bloody war and that if the conflict now really ever did become more general they being the Princesses of Abdiennia would have to go out in the battle fields more often and do whatever work for their cause that should be necessary.

The two others did not like this plan however but when they thought it over to themselves for a while they finally did not see any reason whatever to disapprove of it, especially when the Princesses would do it any way and no one could say nay.When they left the show, they approached to where they had left their horses and mounting the started off off down the street.Indeed they had not ridden very far when they observed walking on the side walk four children one of which was a boy.They all had long bobbed hair, their girls having black, glody, and brown and the boy auburn.The appearance of their clothes was what attracted the party of children on horseback.Each girl wore clothes alike, being of a very dark gray color, while the boy himself wore long baggy trousers which once belonged to some man but cut off short to fit the lad, and the boy had on his head a hat that almost completely hid his eyes under it.The three girls were nothing on their heads, but the four very were very dirty and their clothing was in rags.They appeared forlorn and frightened and one of the girls kept looking constantly in every direction.

The party halted their horses and Joice the oldest of the Vivian Girls looked to the four children to come over.The urchins ,who ever they were however seeing the dignified appearance of those on horse back were now somewhat scared, and instead of obeying stood stock still, and the smallest of the girls started to cry.It seemed evident that the four were in distress, but the Vivian Girls Princesses, that is Violet and her sisters and the two others, rode slowly over to the side walk and then Joice dismounted and taking the weeping child by the hand, showed her a penny.This cheered the child up a little though of course she had never saw a penny before and looked a at it w n wonderingly.
The peculiarly dressed boy was the older of the four and observing that the girls looked too pretty and dignified to be persons to do them any harm, and that their f faces showed them to be girls of a holy and loving nature took up more courage, and he therefore said between sobs;;;
"We are child sl slaves.We have runned away.Oh I plez pleass don't send us back,they work us and beat us dreadfully."
Violet and her sisters felt great compassion for these little slaves, which they really were. and despite their peculiar clothes, and dirty hands and faces were fairly beautiful little sprites.From questioning the boy they learned that the four children had ran away from the child slave mill far outside the little city and had been roaming around through the streets, for three days, and had slept on door steps and dark alleys and under railroad viaducts at night.The only food they had secured to eat was what they had either picked up, or what some good people had occasionally give them.Violet herself looking at the ; bare parts of their arms easily observed the brands which the child slave masters put there to identify child slaves by.Violet herself proposed to call some soldiers to take or have the children sent to some home, but the little children slaves were afraid the soldiers would give them back to their masters and therefor would not submit and only started to wail.For a moment violet and her sisters did not know what they should do.Then Joice suggested taking them to the nearest orphan asylum where they would be taken care of by the kind Sisters.
This they all decided to do.The Princess boy Henry Gannon lifted the timid children onto the backs of four of the horses, and then they slowly rode off toward the nearest orphan asylum which was only six blocks away.

They reached it in just a few minutes and then halting before the gate entrance, Violet dismounted and was admitted by one of the sisters sisters.Violet then as shortly as possible told the reason of her mission, and the sisters gladly accepted the poor little orphans thanking the Vivian girls most warmly for bringing them to the home where they would be safe so far from recapture.On their return from the orphan asylum they met with the third adventure.This one was of course somewhat exciting, and one they will never forget.While they had been bringing the four children to the orphan asylum several strange men had secretly followed them all the way.They were glandelinian spli soldiers and spies in disguise either agents or spy detectives sent to trace the slaves who had run away from the slave plantation.They were enraged when the party brought the child slaves to the asylum and yet knowing now they could not recover them unless the town was captured(which could not then be done) decided to be a have revenge if possible.They laid in wait for the party of girls and boy in an ally and as they rode past fired pistols shots at them with the purpose of assassination.Then or twenty shots were fired which the girls returned, but fortunately none of the shots fired by the rascals took effect; but nevertheless created some great excitement, and drew a large crowd.
For a few minutes violet and her sisters did not know what had happened or why they should be fired on right in the streets of Angelinia Agathia where no glandelinian enemies of any kind sh were expected to be hidden.

Of course since the war began the Vivian _irls had been so often under fire, and been attacked by glandelinians so frequently that they were used to such thrilling incidents, but the two others the children of King Gannon Procile were terribly frightened, and deep excitement almost overcame them.
Violet and her sisters of course being armed had returned the fire of their assailants briskly and though Jennie a shot and seriously wounded one of the rebels the both of them managed to escape down a side alley.Of course the police came as if there had been a riot call and a vigorous search was started for the two would be assassins.Not wishing to increase the scene the nine children returned to their own homes, and l later on Violet and her sisters after bidding their two new friends good bye set on their return journey to general Vivians army.However they did not relate their adventure to any one as is usual their way for they did not think anything of it as unusual.
Sometime later they had invited their boy friend Penrod with his friend called the "rattlesnake to come to their headquarters and to have a game of cards with them as everything was slack just then.Though shi shy in the presence of these beautiful little girls , Penrod and his friend were only too happy to obey, and hurried to the place as swiftly as possible.After Penrod had won and lost some of the games he asked a question which surprised the little girls!!
"What was the real cause of this great war now going on!" he asked.
For a moment violet and her sisters were silent.Then Jennie herself after looking at him searchingly asked him a question!
"What do you supposed caused it!"
"That is not for me to say"he answered;"I've heard so many rumors about the originating of this great war that is it is very doubtful.But there is one thing which I have heard, but which I cannot hardly believe, which seems impossible to be true."
"And what is that Penrod my dear friend!"asked Violet.
"About the sinking of a ship with the drowning of all on board including King Gannons wife and daughter in the year of 1911."
"In what year did you say!"asked Joice looking puzzled.
"In the year of eighteen fourty one."
"I believe you must be dreaming those things"said Angeline seriously.
"that did not happen so far back as all that.It just happened about a month or so before this war broke out.The ship had a number like that on its flag but that is all.In eighteen fourty one there were no such l things as submarines.We were witnesses to the whole scenes of which ourselves.But as the tragedy is, it is not the general cause of the war.At least not to our view, as our side did not begin the war.
As we know Penrod dear that you are a stranger in this country and do not know all the incidents that originated this war, I'll tell you the whole story if you wish to hear it, and my sisters will chip in wherever I make a mistake, or leave something out.It will be very interesting for you and increase your desire to serve our cause."
So Jennie put the cards away neatly, while her sisters rearranged the chairs, and then as Jennie was seated again, Angeline who agreed to tell the story began thus!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!

"It was all brought about because King Gannons poor old mother was doing her level best to bring about the end of the child slave horrors and of her constantly aiding the slaves when the opportunity presented itself. Her husband then formely King acting under Emperor Vivian our father and his dearest friends though in favor of her work of aid did her nevertheless on the grounds that she was making exceed dangerous move and would bring terrible disaster upon herself and the nation in general.

Every one knew her four children, three girls and a lovely little boy besides the elder son then twenty one years old, and their uncle now the Ruler of Abbie annia State. The three girls were beautiful, and so very good, their mother at that time was known as the most beautiful woman in the world then living and as good as she was beautiful. We girls knew them all and often paid them long visits, and had lovely times there when togathers. Father, mother, Uncle and also my aunt often visited them, and the King and Queen and every visit made them more friendly than ever.

Poor old King Gannon and our father were absolute pals, and he had known and loved my father since he was a boy, never have quarreled, and even when at that time loved each other like father and son. King Gannon besides his brother had a beautiful sister, who loved her other brothers little boy and girl as if they were her own children. of my sisters cannot forget the good happy times we had at King Gannons Palace when we used to visit him and play with his children. The shock which + me to tell happened exactly-----"

"Two months and three weeks before the war broke out in the year of 1911." said little pattie.

"Well" continued Angelina "two months before the war there were beginning to grow pretty lively. Glandelinia was on the verge of war and every thing was exciting and hot. both sections of the nations was aroused to fever heats. What I am driving at is this leaving others out about the war. One day we desired very much to visit King Gannon and his dear children and we fairly longed for them felt home sick for them and often begged our father to go or sent us there. It was just a little before the approach of the beautiful Christmas day and not only did our parents agree to give us full passage to Abbiannia by train but decided to accompany us also, to get away from the stirring scenes and forget for a while the impending civil war that was on the very verge of breaking out.

Over the prospects of going we were very happy. Indeed we had every thing ready and had shipped our trunks to the railway station of the Abbiannia, Glandinia Calverinia road with the purpose to board the Aronburgo limited and had our finest clothe on when we were startled by unusual extras being hawked in the streets by news boys and great excitement in the streets among the crowds over the news. We ran to the door and opened it. We were shocked at what we heard. One boy close to our palace was about to shouting!!! "EXTRA. ALL ABOUT THE HORRIBLE TRAGEDY. KING GANNONS WIFE AND CHILDREN DROWNED. KING FRUSTRATED WITH GRIEF. GLANDELINIAN TORPEDO BOAT SINKS SHIP WITH ALL ONBOARD' EXTRA. EXTRA. EXTRA.."

We girls were all excited and felt heart broken. At first we did n t know what to do and could hardly believe it. then recovering ourselves we ran to the gate shouting to the boy!

"Here, here, is the money. Give us a paper quick."

the boy gave a paper to Daisy who handed him the money and right there at the very gate we read the details. A horrible tragedy had happened which startled and aroused the whole of Abbiannia. It happened to be that King Pradins wife and daughter had secured a large excursion steamer and took about fifteen hundred orphans including three hundred freed child slaves on board with the purpose of a short moonlight cruise along the beautiful shore not far from the great Kauffman benches. She accompanied them with her daughter and a part of her retainers with the purpose of entertaining them and had brought a large military band on board and a large number of performers to amuse the children. however great as the cruise was and amusing as the entertainment was it was short lived.

In the midst of all the fun and entertainment a Glandelinian torpedo boat a long sun sub submarine said to be flying the flags of the Angelinia state let go a torpedo which struck the ship in the centre.

The force of the explosion not only ripped the ship asunder but killed many on board the s ship including the captian and his first mate. the ship sunk with all on board and only one man survived to terribl tell the horrible tale. He stated that many could have been saved but that those in the torpedo boat prevented that.

Attempts were made by life saving stations and war craft to save some lives but that proved of no avail and at the same time a heavy sea was on. The submarine was pursued for a long distance and fired on vigorously but it escaped. such news as this greatly upset us and we immediately brought the paper to father, who when he read it could not hardly believe his eyes. However the news startling as it was did not prevent us from going there. We caught the Aronburg limited just in time and arrived at our destination in two days and three hours. every where at every town the train had to stop on account of there was much excited talk about the awful horrible tragedy but the main excitement prevailed in the town that we reached where King Gannons palace is situated. Here the streets were full of excited angry people but however we were not much noticed most of them when they saw our parents and us too. However they seemed too depressed and excited to greet us as usual as we made our way for the palace and we could not blame them. Once inside we found the truth of the details. The King had been prostrated at his loss and the shock had killed his before we arrived. His eldest son was grief stricken, his sister had gone insane from sorrow, and was laughing hysterically while doctors and attendants were be having a hard fight to keep her in bed, and the whole Court was in an uproar. Father was also very grief stricken but also terribly angry in the main though he did not say anything about the matter and did not act as if he cared much about it. But I and my sister sisters could see in his face the fierce fury that was in his heart. Then came the funeral. We alone did not attend and neither did father. It was too much for us and mother fainted and aunty was hysterical. Three da s days later we returned to our own palace grief stricken and forlorn. We could not eat. As soon as we arrived father directed the Abbiannian government to sent in a curt declaration of war to the aurthorities of the Glandelinian government also demanding the reason for the destruction of the ship / loaded with helpless children by a one of a torpedo and also a satisfactory explanation as to what had become of the surb sub arine which had done the deed. He also instructed the Abbiannian governments to sent in orders to what we left our our strong navies to at once blockade every seaport of Glandelinia and instructed general Hanson vivian by telegraph to sele seize Crowley town or seat Aronburg to do it, and he himself march on Jennie Wren Town and beat it and also sent in arms into Glandelinia to crush the rebell on rebellion before it got under head way.

However from the Glandelinian government the answer did not come immediately and when it arived it was only a short curt reply. I remember all the words of that note by heart. I can say it this way!

To the Emperor of Abbiannia.
Angelinia Acathia.
In reply of your message will say the submarine torpeding the ship on which King Gannons wife and daughter were on was one belonging to your own navy and not ours, and if members of my troops or crew were operating the submarine it is your own lookout and not ours. As to your declaration of war we will some accept it very readily and will meet your armies any time to wish for a conflict.

Robert Glandelina.
President of Glandelinia."

Father on recieving this message investimated this and found out about a week later that all the Angelinian and Abbiannn war craft of all kind had not been out at sea during the awful hour of the tragedy. Also the sub marine that destroyed the excursion ship was really of Abbiannian make but that it had been stolen by and operated by an Al Glandelinian crew and was in a commanded by captian Hochorts. He was a Boodler, and his crew were Mungabows. It was also found that the Glandelinian author ities had caused all the Glandelinian and southern Angelinian states to vote for secession and therefore father realized that a big intercene war was about to begin and immediately issued calls for as many volunteers as would come to the service of the nation, and they answered the call immediately by scores of millions. Now you may know what one of the causes of the war is. We have also spied a whole lot and discovered the true facts about the horrors of child slavery and its sad and awful results. The children the majority of them, have been stolen from foreign parents of foriegn nations conquered in recent wars by the wicked Glandelinians. All the child slaves do is work, eat, and sleep and very little of the latter two do they get and the food is very poor.
They are deprived of all pleasure, never allowed to play or enjoy anything and even such a sound as music is not a 'lowed to reach their ears.If any of them because sick they die for it.They ain't supposed to be sick.It is hard for them to escape their masters because each child has a branded child slave mark on him or her, showing the name of the owner owner, the address, the name and identification of the slave and what work she is compelled to do.

If one is sold to a new owner the branding is done all over again.What way the child is branded deep depends on the nature and humanity of the w owner.Some child slaves are fortunate enough to have only tatoo identification marks on them.Others are branded with red hot implements and that is torture indeed.It would take years to explain all about the child slaves.Their lives as a are as miserable as the lost souls in a way of telling.Most of them such as those working in factories, and public houses and all other industrial mills and plantations have to rise at three thirty in the morning, work till six, and eat breakfast.Then at six thirty they resume labors sometimes work that is almost more than they can endure and many are overcome every day.The labors continue without respite untill past noon, then they have what a may be called dinner and then repeat the work untill supper time.Then afte r su p p supper work continues till nig nine thirty at night, when they are sent back to their masters and owners under attendantsand to bed, to repeat the same thing all over again the next day.They don't recieve any recreation, no rewards, no holidays no christmas joys and the like only the lash and ugly tasting medicines to keep them from breaking down under their ed extreme hardships.The masters recieve the money for the service of ea h each child slave he submits to the mills and industrial plants and the more slaves he has the more money he makes.The slaves to prevent them from running away either boys or girls, while in mills, or at their masters homes are allowed hardly any clothing whatever; summer or winter only enough as underwear.All the child slaves so they are known easily by their masters and owners and agents operating for them wear long bobbed hair, boys and girls exactly alike. and when wearing little clothing for outside occasions are dressed somewhat in the appearance of stripped prison garb wearing the same as boys but in their own fashion.But even then the children are not allowed shoes and the boys and girls wear their pants loose without belts or suspenders and have to hold them up with their hands when they p march through the streets in the sad procession.None of the child slaves are ever seen to smile and usually from their hardships though forcibly submissive to the rules are sullen and morose and rebellious.Not knowing really the mistake they do make the child sl v slavor in most cases are enragingly vicious toard children whom they see have parents and are free from slavery, and its all the masters and overseers can do to prevent the more ''fortunate''child from being set upon and killed or injured by the enraged slaves.
Nothing is done by the Clandelinian surthorities to see that means are taken to save the souls of the slaves, and mostly all the slaves do not know about god, and what thouse who do know him know about Him is that he is He is not able to set them free.They are not allowed to have enjoyment of any kind and even if sick have to continue working untill they drop.They can be bought from one master to another, but never ransomed, and to attempt to ransom a slave is the penalty of death or life imprison ment.
It however does happen quite often that a child slave takes the chances of a dark and stormy night to run awy providing they can secure some clothing and what little food they find.Fortunately the child slaves usually reach places of strung refuge and it is very fortunate too because if one is retaken again it would be too dreadful to relate the awful death in store for the slave providing the master is a cruel heartless beast.On some occasions however the child slave may have a good master but that is rare.
One of the meanest things the masters and owners do is to take advantage of the childish fears of the little slaves.such as the fears of dark places, fears of painful treatments and so on.If a child fears the dark, she or he is locked in a dark place for days.A little girls who fear mice and rats is securely locked in a room swarming with them.Of all things that go on it takes too much time for me to tell.I have seen child slaves murdered just because they were too sick or homesick to work and so have my sisters.To know about child slavery in all its sad incidents you must see it for yourself.''
''Have you or your dear sisters ever observed m ch of it?''
'' Yes ''she answered and then as graphically as possible told him of her's and her sisters experiences while spying about child slave places.

''That child slave driver or manager whose name was Frank Aronburg must have have been a man of two chac characters to act that way.''said Penrod.
''But fortunately he was not too bad''said the princess''or otherwise we would not have succeeded in getting out of that place''
''But why do you take all these awful chances with the enemy as you do when you do not have to?''h asked Penrod.''Would it not make your lives more happier by staying out of this al awful National storm!''
''It is our du ty''said violet.''And also we go whereever we are asked. It is not too dangerous.Anything that is really too risky we avoid.And also we do it for the sake of adventure and thrills.I believe we inhirted from Mother.She was said to be the most daring and greatest adventerus living.We are surprised that she does not accompany us or father on the great adventures of this war.Father just now stays at the Vivian Wickey seige while mother remains at home.We sometimes believe she is scared since her almost fatal adventure at Julio Callio.We all nearly escaped death there and yet we even to this day do not regret the adventure.My Aunt was there too and shared the same experience.She had according to what we have heard kept away from the territories of the enemy ever since.''
''Maybe it is probable that your mother and Aunt have lots of work to do at the Palaces because of the w war''said Penrod''I do not think they are afraid of the enemy a single bit.But I hear my bugler calling me and I'll have to go''h he added regretfully.''I'm wanted for some important mission I presume.''

THE TRIAL OF THE COWARDLY ENGLISHMAN.

AFTER general vivian had recieved the message from general Greatheart concerning the cowardly conduct of the Englishman, he went direct to general Greatheart for a consultation about it.Learning that the english man was being held a pr prisoner general vivian immediately went to general Jack Evans and both held a conference alone.
As soon as they had pulled down the shades general as general vivian seating himself at general Evans desk asked;
''Now my friend tell me all and don't leave anything ho out.How did your division fare at the recent battle?''
''It was awful, I lost three quarters of my men. .''answered Evans with a sullen look.
''Why was it that my signals from Delight's junction was not immediately answered.Why did not je oral Cosmoes signal corps give answer.''
''The officer in chief charge of the signal corps was killed and his crews was wounded.''An answered Evans.But it has been disgraceful the scenes that ensued.''E vans thundered bringing his fist down on the table so hard that the table was cracked.''I've been imposed upon.Is this what I get for ren dering my services to the cause and in behalf of my friends the vivian Girl Princesses?To throw a dam cowardly yellow egged English foriegner into my own ranks?''
' But how did it happen? ''asked general vivian i wishing to get into the details.''
''I vannot explain for sure as I was not a witness to it but I have heard enough to cinvict the man or cause his facing the firing squad.''answered evans.Many of my officers and men have told me again and again that the battle ended in such a disastrous defeat at Delight's junction because of the delay in the answer to your signals.The main signal corps being wiped out, and as general cosmo does not understand the usue of a signal flag he called upon the corward to answer but he failed and Penrod had to do it himself.Think of it we who are supposed to be christians being forced to send a little boy into the peril we soldiers must face because of the coward.General Greatheart is raving mad about the whole affair.By his cowardly disobedience that englishman is fully responsible for the misfortunate of the national army at the battle of Delight's junction.And we all demand that he be punished.''
''I'll see to that.''said the general.
Then general Evans told all the details as far as he had heard them.
evans men held the man a prisoner and he was immediately sent for while Evans at general vivians request summoned some of the other generals and Great heart and many other officers to hold a Court Marshall.
As soon as the jury was found and the judge placed the judge being general vivian the trial began.
Greatheart showed the letter to the generals which he had writ e written to general vivian and accused the man of being a coward in the first degree.
''what part of Englis' england did you come from.''general Greatheart asked when the defendand was calledupon to sa take the chair.
''From London.''
''What brought you here and how did you come to get here?''he thundered.
''I arived here a year before the war.''
''Are you an Abbiennian citizen.Did you recieve your citizenship papers?''
''no sir.''
''No?''
''No sir.''
''Don't you know then that if under such conditions unless you were drafted you had no right to enve even enter the army.'
''I dic did not know anything about that.I was told I could do it as long as I was serving the cause.''
''Oh is that the way you look at it.Why did you fail to a answer general vivians signal.?''
''The enemy's fire was too severe.''
''That is not answering the question.You are accused of being a coward and coward you are.You were responsible for the almost destruction of our armies at Delight's junction and fr for the devastation of so many camps.As you are a coward something should be done to you which you ought to expect but as you say you are not a citizens of this country it is probable without Englands consent we cannot place you before a firing squad.But that punishment you deserve.Jury give your decision and let us have this trial over with.''

The jury filed out and was gone ten mumutes.
Then they returned and took their seats.At the request for the verdict one of them rose and said;
''He is guilty of cowardice in the first degree.As we do not see it lawful to have him shot at sun rise we degree he shall be deported back to England as soon as possible and in the greatest disgrace.''
The trial over the prisoner was taken back to the guard house and propar ations were made to have him sent off.First however a written notice was sent to the English Ambassador concerning the conduct of the englashman stating he had not recieved any citizenship papers in Abbieannia therefore making him still a foriegner and that it seemed not justified to shoot a man therefore under such circumstances even though he be a coward.The latter sent the answer as follows; .

''TO the Government of Abbieannia;
To the Emperor of Abbieannia;
Robert Vivian;
Your Gracious Majesty;
Have recieved the message stating the conduct of a said engl s englishman who had doub double crossed your armies t at said battle near Delight's junction through cowardice and therefore it will not do you any good to send the yellow dog back to England because learning of his cowardice he will not be allowed to return.We do not want any cowards sent into our nation so please for God's sake keep him there and do with him as he richly deserves.''
King of England.''

This letter caused another council g held by the generals and therefore the general in chief sent a letter to one of the vivian girls stating gh the case of the coward what the proposition was, how it had been turned down and that the matter left all the generals in a quadrangle as you may call it.The letter was as follows;
''

TO THE VIVIAN GIRL PRICESS.
DEAR PRINCISS VIOLET;
General Jack Ambrose Evans ,you r best friend has a certain English man a prisoner in his hands who through his cowardice, has caused a dasist disasterous defeat of our armies near Delight's Junction.He had been tried by us generals but when he was sentencee to be deported back to England the king of said nation refused to accept his return as also there the people have no place for a coward.This matter has left us in a situat ion which we alone can not alter.Therefore we have to leave the coward to you.
General Roberstonia Vivian.''

Violet looked the letter over twice and at once her heart was burning with a fiery rage a rage which she had never felt in her life before. A cowardly foriegner in the christian lines..she went direct to general vivian on her swiftest horses followed by her sisters. owever general vivian left it to general Great heart to place the matter before them and he referred to general Cosmo who was the main sufferer.
Therefore finding out the whole affair they decided to hold a Court Marshall of their own and try him themselves and give him speedy justice. Violet and her sisters are as the reader knows, very good, gentle and loving little girls.But Cowardice they hate as something dragging their very hearts in the dust and once any man or person whether man woman or child ge t's on the wrong side of them for some very serious and wicked reason it's stand from under.Make an enemy of one of the vivian girls and God help you.Joice, Jennie, and her sisters except violet voted to act as jury.Violet was selected by her sisters to be the judge because she had recieved general Vivians letter and heard the testimony from general Cosmo who is known as Count De Biffe.Therefore Evans, Count De Biffe and Greatheart as well as Penrod and the Rattlesnake boy were to be the witnesse against the coward.Yet no one was found who would act as a defense councoil and therefore some one was drafted for that occasion. Every effort had been made to find some defender but to no avail and therefore one was selected by the passing of an immediate conscription.This showed great evidence that the foriegn coward was shunned by all.The trial was short swift and final. Evans was asked to give his statement first.Evans first told of the disaster to his own division, how it had been cut to pieces, and then told what he had heard from general Cosmo or Count De Biffe and of the disaster of the whole battle in as few words as possible.Then general Great heart was called upon to testify and he too told of the great disaster and of the english man failing to answer the signal.

When general Vivian himself was asked to make a somewhat lengthy description of his own share of the trouble.He began thus.
'' ''It was at about twelve thirty oclock in the morning, when though my own lines were still holding against the reinforcing Glandelinians under Stanley my signal corps observed that generals Evans forces and also that of Greathearts and my brothers were retreating as swiftly as possible and that Isner Mylette was carrying all before them. They notified me of the danger and I immediately went up to the signal tower myself and signaled that they must hold their ground or make a stand and not retreat.I kept on signalling for ten minutes and did not recieve any response..When I recieved the answer it was too late n and we recieved an answer that we were worsted and that nothing could be done to stem the disaster.I not comprehending what the matter was was compelled to order a retreat too or have my army destroyed and therefore the disaster ensued.I lay the whole blame on that dirty sneaking coward. If he signalled right away something could have been done in time.''
''what time did you recieve the signal from the christian line under gener Greatheart.'' asked the athorny of defense.
''About twenty minutes after twelve.''
Then Count De Biffe had his own turn and he told his own part of the story.Then Penrod was called upon. is graphic description was this;
''It happened at the time when we were being worsted.General Cosmo observed a signal from a distant signal station and he called for the leader of the signal corps but he had been laid u up with wounds some time earlier in the battle and therefore knowing the Engl s Englishman had learned the signals called upon him to answev answer it.I saw the whole performance and it made me hot.My friend the Rattlesnake boy was close by and I could saw he was fairly eating his finger nails and his eyes were fiery and his face frightfully contorted with rage.
The coward was too scared to move and I heard the Count call him a coward and ordered him to the rear under arrest.Then as the Count himself sh did not know how to use the signal flag or read signals and knew I did he was forced to call u upon me though I saw tears in his eyes. nd Your Majesty the exploit was not a half as dangerous as it seemed.Twice I went to answer the signal and escaped without a scratch.But as the answer was delayed through him I believe we were defeated so disgracefully and our cantonments disabled and burned.That's all Princess violet.''
The soldier who was drafted for a defense in the meantime was called upon but what he said was stirring enough but the words came merely from the lips and not from the heart.All the evidence was against the Englishman. The Rattlesnake boy hotly testified against him blaming the coward for the loss of his father and sisters and his whole regiment of boy and girl scouts who were destroyed in the fearful battle.violet and her sisters were now frenzied.It was the first time in their lives that a coward had ever been in an army. nd what did a foriegner dare to come for any way.Violet calming herself stood up eyes the man saucily and asked with a sneer;
''Are you really an Englishman!''
''Yes I am your Majesty.''
''I don't believe it''said her sisters in a choir chorus.''I We never heard of cowards ever coming out of a country like that.''
''I believe you are not myself.''said violet.
''Yes I am Your Majesty.I live in London.''
''You don't live in London now anyway.''said Angeline''you are here before us.''
''What was your purpose of coming to our good country and then double cross us in battle!''
''I wanted to see the war, but did not know it was so fierce.''
''Did you fail to obey the order of general Cosmo when he asked you to answer the signal!''
''Yes.''
''nd why!''
''I was afraid I would be killed.I have always heard the saying that it is better to be a live coward than a dead hero.''

Everyone but the seven Princesses laughed heartily when they heard this answer for it sounded so silly and crazy. But violet said with a pugnacious look on her face;

"It's better to be a live coward than a dead hero! I have never seen a live coward sir." and she screamed the last words at him. Then she continued with the fury of a wild cat that is cornered "Your cowardly act dragged our hearts in the dust. You coming here to merely see the war is an insult to God and our flag. I could tears tear your eyes out with my finger nails you yellow jelly fish for answering me like that. Millions of lives were uselessly lost on account of you. cowards in this country never live, and heroes usually do. Jury file out to decide the verdict."

Her sisters arose and returned in ten minutes.

"Well what is the decision?" asked violet.

"Our decision is reached" said Joice. "the man is guilty of cowardice in the first degree."

Then Jennie handed violet the verdict slip. Then violet slowly read;

"To morrow morning the cowardly foriegner is to face the firing squad. In our own country no coward lives."

Therefore the trial lasted fully thirty minutes and six seconds.

The next morning the coward was led out, marched down the company street and out into the field beyond the camp and left standing against a stone wall fence. Then eight men formed in line and awaited the word of command.

"Attention. The men str straightened out the line and then awaited.

Ready. Aim."

Fire."

A volley rang out and the coward was no more.

CHAPTER TWENTY FOUR

chapter twenty one.

PENROD AND HIS COMPANION WITNESS THE BATTLE OF SUNBEAM CREEK FROM AFAR.
THEY ALSO TRY TO GET AN INTERVIEW WITH GENERAL JACK EVANS.

FOR FIFTEEN DAYS Penrod and his companion were forced to remain in the town of Jennie Vivian because they were watched too closely by the enemies, or because of other reasons, and for very serious reasons what that. He and the Rattle snake however were more than ever shut in the town from the twenty second to the twenty fifth because the town was surrounded by a most tremendous conflict, such as never raged before. The night after the first day after the dreadful contest was dark with heavy snow clouds, but now snow was falling falling, and yet in the far distance could be heard low rumbling growls as of a distant thunderstorm.

And at intervals threatening gleams of lightning flashed from long li e of exploding shells in the distance shot below the clouds, accompanied by dull sharp reports. Sometimes Penrod could hear a perfect rolling of thunderous reports in a still further distance, and once in a while shells even exploded some where in the streets, which had before the outbreak of the battle become quite deserted. but few ever did any damage.

The next day both boys went a certain distance outside of the town to ascend a small hill to view the battle which was raging again. Far in the distance distance all was smoke and flame, and every now and then they could see large columns of troops in long lines rushing widly toward the christian lines as if nothing whatever could stop them. Toward the left the end saw a more powerful rush of Glandelinian troops, saw a long jagged stream of darting flashes in the direction of the christian lines, accompanied by a most tremendous earsplitting crash that made the boys jump.

The surge of gra waves at this moment were torn open before the very view of the boys, and distant works poured forth their troops in perfect floods.

After the protracted struggle of the day before, it all seemed to the two boys to all happen at once as if the hordes of the infernal regions, and the combined forces of earth and heaven had at once been let loose against each other. flaming sheets of musketry miles long at once, roar and rolling drum drum crash of countless cannons, and sh sharp reports of thunder from as many bursting shells, shrieks of the yelling hordes as if the wildest hurricane wind mingled with the howl of demons, and clouds of smoke was a the sight and the sound for the two boys, while the glandelinian attack as far as eye could see it appeare d as mighty as if some tidal wave of angels had gathered and rushed forward bursting against the christian lines.

It was such a battle as Penrod and his companion would remember in a life time, and which few would ever wish to see at all.

Penrod and the Rattlesnake boy stood still watching the conflict amid the raging and blinding roar and fury of it. After a few minutes a portion of the battle began to draw closer, and at first the boys were confused for they were liable to be exposed to the fire of either side and as all was open here, they knew that they could not do anything to sheild themselves. Far to the right the boys then heard an unusual sound like the noise of gigantic cataracts rushing down into an abyss.

So excited was Penrod that unconsciously he held his cap pressed clear down over his ears and against his eyes because he seemed to be standing amid a volcano of tumult and darting smoke and flames. The crashes of so many tremendous explosions the roar of so many cannon reports and rolling thunders, and the long jagged streams of musketry flashes through the s oke clouds of both sides came in such quick succession and so close to one another that even at that distance the boys seemed to be almost deafened as well as blinded. And indeed they wondered if they should be able to hear again when they went home out of reach of all that noise. And that they were in peril of being hit by random shots or prostrated by shell explosions was so insignificent to them that they were scarcely aware of it. Penrod stood still bracing his body, and waited for the crash of a shell explosion overhead. If he had been an Angelinian soldier instead of a boyscout, and such a storm of battle had broken out, and he was in it, he would have either braced himself for his turn to go into the battle, and would fight as fiercely as any of the bravest soldiers.

This was what he was thinking of even when the distant tumult of battle was at its high tide for the day. He knew that during bloody battles past many generals and other officers had easily given up their lives in the midst of bursting shells or a tempest of bullets.

After the boys remained watching the battle untill about two o-clock ther there occured the first temporary lull in the contest. It's main fury had perhaps reached its height and broke a little before that time. At the same time far in the distance to the southwest of the town of Jennie vivian a yellow arched sheet of flame had hurled its jagged way upward tward the heavens to a great height as if some great volcano suddenly broke into eruption, and an earth rending crash had thundered itself into a million cannonading echoes and rumblings which slowly died away. At the same time there arose in the air an immense cloud of smoke seemingly only half a mile away when in realitythit was more than thirty. The two boys were stunned by t he shock and almost thrown. Penrod being all excited took his cam cap from the ground where it had fallen and drew a long breath.

his comppnion being still more excited, drew two breaths, longer ones, and then started biting his finger nails. Whatever it w s they couldnot ascertain ascertain and as they were about t o move from the hill they heard a new kind of sound, and seeing glandelinians approaching the hill beat a hasty retreat for the town, and reaching it found it in possession of the Angelinians and some of the buildings in flames. The day passed slowly away but the conflict for that day was at any end an a end. Only fainter and fainter re rumblings and mutterings were heard, and even these were soon over, and everything became silent.

The other days of the battlethe boys had not seen, but they heard it nevertheless. They remained in the two town d two days after the battle wondering what t he vivian girls ah had been doing all the time since the y saw them last, and while they stayed an unexpected thing happened(if you don't believe it ask them)

The house the boys had roomed in when they first entered the town was now occupied by the christian generals w who were in command of the divisions who had captured it. These generals were very very friendly t o the two daring boyscouts, but one of them in particular liked them better than the others did, because the y were so quiet and did not make any trouble. More than once one of the generals had given the boys a freshly baked cake with fruit in the center or a hot roll.

when Penrod came in on the evening of the sedond day after the battle, the chief general greeted him warmly, and then handed to him a package of medium size as he passed on his way to his room.

"This was sent to you or came to you this afternoon." He said. "I see you are making prepar ations for another journey. We w are sorry to see you going, but I know it is your duty to perform."

"Thank you your Excellency. We are also sorry but you know we must accomplish it for the good of the cause." answered Penrod as he took the small parcel. "I see it is not a large package." he added with a smile.

CHAPTER TWENTY FOUR.

He or the Rattlesnake boy had not expected to recieve any parcel at all at all but never theless penrod on Schoefield of Carnonian saw his name and address was on the strange l king package, and also bore thename of one of the Angelinian general he had heard of frequently, but who he had never seen, and that was Major general Gertrude James Gladerlinia, and it felt as if it contained a soft substance. The Rattlesnake boy was looking out of the window when Penrod entered the red room and he no doubt was w tching the immense processions of soldiers being brought into the town, and who were tramping through the deep snow in the streets. He who had never seen the real effe effects of a battle he sure was absorbed by the spell of the scene and his heart was great ly affected by it.

"some general sent this to me." said Penrod. "Look at this package I wi wonder what it contains." "

Immediately the Rattlesnake boy came to his side.

"what is it, and from whom did it come from?"!"!!!!!"

Penrod hastily opened the package and at first only drew from it several large white envelopes. As Penrod drew out from the middle of the package the envelope it felt as if there was something in it, something quite thick, but which lay flat and was thickly folded.

He opened it, put his hand if in, and drew out a number of yellow sheets of typewritten paper, not new sheets but old ones, which would not betray themselves by crackling. and the sheets were so old that they were soft. And they were something very important indeed.

"T hey are in small yellow pieces of paper because it is better for the spy for us boys to handle small ones. I'm sure no one will be surprised or suspicious to see us carry these." said the Rattlesnake boy.

Indeed a each of the boys knew that the package had been sent by the great general Gladerlinia, but he had wrapped the envelopes up in such a fashion, and in so careful a manner that not the slightest clue could be furnished. This adventure was indeed like some exciting game to the Rattlesnake boy, as well as to Penrod. And neither of the boys could have slept for one moment at night without thinking of and working out some dare-devil scenes and plans, which might be used to frustrate the rebels. and also to work out the plans and methods of each general concerned.....

And also it thrilled the Rattlesnake boy to contemplate on the difficulty the great general might have sure ly found himself obliged to overcome.

"P erhaps" said he after thinking it over over carefully for some time while lying in his bed "The general went to some secre t part of his own headquarters, and make or made up the package as you recieved it. He would have do e it already and in such a way that if there were any secret rebel spies watching him they could not observe what he was f doing at all. then having placed the envelopes inside the package he made up some other things, and then leaving them lay carelessly about ordered his aide-decamp or some officer to deliver the main parcel to you. the envelopes were sent to us for us to deliver to general Jack Ambrose Evans, and if failing to find him to deliver to violet and her sisters, and the other things left to lure a spy into a trap should there be one snooping around his headquarters."!"!."""A

He ing indeed created the episode with its every detail, and explained everything to Penrod. And it is so fortunate ot or it so fascinated the two boys for the entire evening, that they were so relieved after it that they were able to sleep well through the whole night. Even before they had left general Greatchear Greatheart's camps all newspapers throughout the whole Angelinian Nation, and every city in the world had totaly swept out of existance the story of the escape of the vivian girls from Norma Catherine, and told off their many strange and thrilling and yet noble doings and scenes during their stay in vivian vickey from December seventh till near Christmas or later. This had even surprised the Rattlesnake for it had been done by strong derision and ligt handling—— by threat in their escapade as a sort of thrilling and most remarkable legend.

Everyone but the seven Princesses laughed heartily when they heard this answer for it sounded so silly and crazy, but Violet said with a pugnacious look

At first both of the boys had resented this most bitterly, but one day during a consultation between general Greatheart and his main staff officers, when the Rattlesnake boy had been arguing to prove it to the generals that their story about the escape of Violet and her sisters from Vivian Wickey was a real fact, for they were safe within the the christian lines, general Greatheart somehow checked him by his own mysterous silence.

"It is true that they had escaped from Norma Catherine." He said after a pause. "But it is safer for them, and more comfortable for their father that the facts about their escape should not be believed in--- for some long time at least at least."

At these words the Rattlesnake boy came to a sudden realization that this was right. He suddenly felt hot for some moments and then cold. He even saw a new side of the Vivian Girls had had for their own military scenes. He had been making almost a serious mistake in his own tactacts. This of course happened before he and Penrod went into Jennie Vivian for the Gemini agent. Therefore during the rest of the consultion no more was said about the Vivian Girls, but when both of the boys were left to themselves afterwards he had suddenly poured forth his feelings to Penrod.

"I have made a fool of my self." He exclaimed. "Why was it I was not able to see it for myself. Shall I tell you Penrod what I feel someone has done? There are persons who have influence throughout the foriegn Nations of this big world, and who are friends of Abbie-Annia, and ardent admirers of the beautiful Vivian Girls. They have managed to get every newspaper concern, to make fun of and deny the story so that even among the glandelinians throughout their own country, and fighting armies, it won't be believed. If it was firmly believed that the y really did escape, both the detect ive and Secret Service Agencies in Glandelinia, and in Calvorinia would have countless numbers of spies and scouts on the look out for them, and so close would the search be pressed, that the Vivian girls would have to remain within the heart of the christian lines under the strongest protection or lose their chances of remaining free or even alive. And what a fool I was indeed not to even realize it. There are many in the distant foriegn Countries who are watching every chance to help Abbie-annia overthrow Glandelinia's wicked rebellion."

"But there are countless millions in Vivian Wickey who more than know their escape is true." Answered Penrod. "If there were not, there would not have been so many scouting the whole region nay the whole nation both north and south for them. And also I would not have been kidnapped by those two professional spies and shut up and locked up in that attic with the Rattlesnakes if they had not a spi suspected I know some very important information. Some very high officials among the glandelinians thought I knew something about Angelinia Aronburg, the Vivian girls, and Jennie Turner and something that I really do not. It is evident that these two Glandelinian spies were hired official spies of the main glandelinian government and had orders to find out what the real facts about the Vivian Girls was."

"Yes, yes, yes, that is true indeed." answered the Rattlesnake anxiously. "Even now we shall have to be more careful."

Penrod had made a small slit in the slit of his overcoat into which he had slipped a small photograph of general Jack Ambrose Evans. This he was able to reach without any trouble whatever. Having left Jennie Vivian they were now on their way back to the army under the vivian Emperors. While they were on the way Penrod examined his coat sleeve to see whether the photograph was still there. The boys knew he had the face of some genial bull terrior and had a sly smile.

One of the things they heard about this general was that his chief characterist ic was his passionate love for the vivian girls. He was a patron of christian generals, and he spent much of his time on long scouting tours because he loved thrilling adventures, and the earnestness of his generals and other officers to go with him. He was also dreaded more than other by the glandelinians because to them he also had the disposition of a great Rattlesnake..

CHAPTER TWENTY FOUR.

General Evans was on a scouting tour at midday yesterday, when something important is to be found out he goes out to make the tour. We will go to his lines and try to reach it to night." Said Penrod.

"It 's taking a great chance" said the Rattlesnake boy. "Yet we we must not lose anything like a good chance."

This day being the twenty eight of December was brilliantly and sunny but intensel intensely cold, the coldest day of the winter yet, with fresh snow on the ground two feet deep. Yet despite the temperture being thirty six below zero the soldiers passing through and about the company streets of the first camp the boys were entering looked comfortable and homely and head ormorous camp fires burning. The Rattlesnake boy was at this moment swinging through the crowd of Angelinian soldiers on his crutches, and he appeared full of interest and also exhilleration.

He had begun to grow different in his manners, and the change in in face and expression which had begun in general Greathearts army had become more notice able. He had been given a most important place in the boy scout ranks and a work to do which entitled him to hold it.

No one not the Glandelinians, nor even the Angelinians could have ever suspected them or of carrying almost strange and vital secret with them as they strolled through the company streets together. Even the Angelinians here they appeared as only two ordinary children, one a boy, and the other acrippled girl. They loitered even within the outskirts of this camp, watching the slow slow withdrawal of Manleys army, and the passing before them of the long procession of long lines of Glandelinian artillery in the distance.

Sometimes it would have been easier for the Rattlesnake boy to forget that there was anything graver in the world than the whole horrible seige of Vivian Wickey he was observing as if he were some great hero in a story book. But he knew that elsewhere throughout the state of Angelinia and Glandelinia bloody earth shaken battles had been already fought most savagely, and millions of bloody plans were being wrought out, and in anguished anxiety, the Secret Geminian societies of Scouts and Spies, and the whole Abbiesannian Nation, nay the whole world waited breathless for the "Sign" which would cause the fall of vivian Wickey.

And where in the world was the Glandelinian besieged getting their provisions and reinforcements from when vivian Wickey was so tightly invested! That was it seemed the greatest mystery the world had ever known about us yet. As Penrod left this camp undetained, he still had the photograph of general Jack Evans hidden safely inside the linin of his overcoat sleeve, and whom he wished to see as soon as possible.

Because the boy the day was so intensely cold despite it being brilliant and sunny, and because it was evident that Manleys army was withdrawning from his positions at gunboat Creek the numbers of Angelinian scouting parties were larger than usual. Several parties had stopped and among their leaders were one or two which were not merely officers, but who were generals of the highest rank.

One of them had made preparations to go out on an early tour as they were drawn up in military precision, when the two disguised boys came within sight of them. It was a big column of cavarly men and a grandly uniformed one, luxuriously uniformed in lavender. The first two leaders were gold and silver liveries and seemed to know that the two boys were looking at them, and their men. The chief leader of them was a stout genial looking general, with a half handsome yet bull dog like expression in his face, and with a strange smile that seemed sly, though as he was speaking to his officers, it almost forgot to be sly.

On the horse beside him were two young officers, and a thirteen year of old boy scout, and they all listened attentively to what he was saying. A little in the rear of him were several other generals and they were occasionally speaking to him. Penrod touched the Rattlesnake boys coat sleeve as the two boys came closer.

Everyone but the seven Princesses laughed heartily when they heard this answer for it sounded so silly and crazy, but violet said with a pugnacious

"It is not very easy to get near the general." He said. "But us go and stand and get as close to the officers as we can do. Perhaps we may hear some of the Angelinians say something about where he is going, while on his scouting tour."

Yes indeed, there was no mistaking the general. He was the right man the boys wished to see allright. Each of the boys knew by heart the grace on his stout face and the sweep of his intense black moustache. there was believed to be nothing noticeable in a boy taking a moments time in looking at a photograph, and therefore Penrod sauntered a few steps to a small space left by the crowd of soldiers, and therefore he took a last glance at it. His rule was to make sure at the right and finaly final moment. The movements of Monleys armies on their withdrawel was making a very good scene, and the group of soldiers and officers were evidently interested and enthusiastic about it. There was exi excied talking, praise and comment, and general Evans was also interested.....

"His Excellency general Jack Evans, must be war mad." One of the officers who was standing near the boys said to another who was a first lieutenant. "Every day or night, he goes out on long scouting tours unless serious business, or activities in the battles keeps him away. There you may see him with his column of on within three hundred yards of the rebel lines, or with his divisions bursting like some irrestible tornado upon the enemy's works. He ought to be made a commander in chief or something in stead of a plain Captian general. He's too good not to have a higher position in the ranks."

There was a large group of officers about general Evans to the last, and when all were assembled, the general uttered a command and the entire force rode away. At thin time the two boys had no possible opportunity of drawing as close as they desired, even if the presence of the boy scout, and the other officers had not presented an insurmountable obstacle.

Penrod and his companion the Rattlesnake boy, went on their way and passed by what appeared to be the generals headquarters.

"That lal building is surely general Evans's headquarters." both of the boys said at once. "We surely can go there and visit him."...

It was also decided between them that the next time the effort was to be made, Penrod should go on the quest alone, but this time when night came. there was no telling whether rebel spies were hidden within the christian lines or not, but just the same even the Angelinians may make the mistake of suspecting them as disguised Glandelinian boyscouts. Therefore only one boy who hung about general Evans headquarters would be observed less than two.

"And the Angelinians notice little girls going about on crutches more than they notice any one with healthy legs." the Rattlesnake boy said. "And I believe it would be better for me, and safer for you to keep out of the way, unless you need me. Anyhow it does not seem as if my time has come yet. Even if it doesn't come at all----- I have been on duty. I've been going with you, and I have been ready---you know that is what an aide-de-camp does."

He therefore remained hidden in a vacant tent and read such Abbisannian newspapers as he could lay hands on, and also he drew and refought battles, on paper, while Penrod went to general Evans headquarters.

Even if he had not been able to find his way back to the building after leaving its locality, he could easily have found it by following the groups of officers, and soldiers who all were walking in that direction. There were high generals wearing odd caps like those of College Students, each of them walking three or four abreast. There were young officers, and older ones, and here and there whole platoons of privates, being soldiers of all ages, and what talk was to be heard in passing it was always talk about Evans returning from a long scouting tour. for some time Penrod waited in the yard of the building, and even watched gun carriages and covered wagons roll by, while one wagon stopped to place its contents at the entrance, and at once drive away in orderly sequence. Yet the force on the scouting tour had not returned. If general Evans came he would seek permission to go inside.

CHAPTER TWENTY FOUR.

And he must make sure that he did not miss seeing the great general. Yet it was rath rather late when he arived, and no soldiers or officers were with him this time. None of the generals in the Angelinian armies are late in returning to the camp if they can help it, and so he rode up hurriedly, the soldiers and others waiting him coming being flabbergasted to see him return alone. The general halted at the gate while his aide-decamp leaped to the ground and held the bridle. General Evans was looking less genial than usual because it was apparent that he had either not succeeded in his adventure or met some mishap. Seven boys hardly distinguishable in the dark came up on horseback from another direction and were soon with him, and it was evident one of them was trying to soothe him.

"I do not think it was general Mac-yarrens fault that we failed in our plans evans dear." He said. "Don't feel cross Evans dear. It will spoil the night for you. We are having the matter investigated. If it was his fault We'll discharge him from the army."

"It was his fault and should pay for it with a discharge." Thundered the general. "On account of his infernal blunder of mistaken reports about the situation, I and you little Princesses are the only ones out of ten thousand scouts, and fourteen generals safely returning. The rest are killed or captured."

Penrod felt sure this was not a time in which Evans attention could be attracted quietly for the general was terribly angry over some disaster, and so f were those seven boys with him. Penrod however had a pass which gave him a place among the rows of young officers and soldiers, who were ad itted willingly into the building. He knew that unless unless anything happened the general and the disguised girls with him would be in the council room in a very short time. Penrod entering the building soon saw the general but this time the disguised litt le girls who ever they were were not with him. He was standing in a small room close to a wall where hung a large map of Vivian Vickey. In another room where there were several beds beyond the one he was in, were two of the beautiful little Abbisannian Princesses seated busily engaged studying some paper, while their attendands attendants were making up the beds. While he was standing by themap studying it, the generals face became more genial than ever. It seemed evident that he had settled himself down to a complete enjoyment of the map that he was seeing something very important on it, for he evidently was forgettin forgetting everything else that could happen in the world.

Indeed Penrod took care that he did not lose sight of general Evans. When a number of his staff officers would go out on being called, it was evident the generalmight go out also, and Penrod believed that t he re might be some chance to get near him, even in a crowd of general officers.

He watched the general closely. He observed that sometimes the generals young face saddened t at some sad thought, sometimes it looked exceedingly ferocious, and therefore it was always evident that he had some thoughts in his mind that reached his soul.

The pretty vivian Girls who sat in the other room was attentive to what they were reading, but not so enthralled. In a few minutes two glittering young boy scout officers appeared, and made elgant and low bows drawing their heels together as they kissed their hands. And the two handsome boys looked very sorry, when they were obliged to leave their room after performing their duty. When he was finished with the map, the general sat in his chair for a few minutes as if he were in a dream.

Some officers in the building began to leave to go outside, all of them filing out into the corridors. Some other officers at the same time were seen entering the building. One of the Vivian girls arose like a litt le majestic fairy, and came out of her room, entered the generals room, leaned forward and touched his arm gently.

Evening but the seven Princesses laughed heartily when they heard this violet said with a pugnacious

''She wants him to go out with her.''Penrod thought to himself..''He will obey her because he is good to her.''
He saw the general recall suddenly recall himself from his strange dream with a smile, and then he arose with a military bearing, and after arranging a purple cloak around the girls beautiful shoulders, gave her his arm, just as Penrod skipped out of his hiding place.Outside it was exceedingly cold, and as no one left the building, the corridors were full.By the time Penrod had come within reach of a balcony floor,the general with the seven beautiful vivian girls had issued from the door, and were temporarily lost in the moving group of officers.
At this time Penrod edged his way in among the crowd in a quiet manner, and making himself appear as if he was some generals son.More than a dozen times his appearance of being strikingly foriegn fos foriegn made the officers glance shrewdly at him clo closely and with some suspicion, but as he was not the only boy who happe ed to be in the building he felt safe enough to step at a large window at the foot of the stairs, and watched the generals who went up or down or those who passed by.He felt anxious that he would see one of the vivian girls nd give them the package to give to Evans.such a miscellaneous crowd of officers as these groups were made up of surprised the boy greatly.
suddenly Penrod was startled by a low familiar laugh and a moment later a rough hand grasped him by the shoulder.
''you did succeed in escaping from the attic and the rattlesnakes!'' a harsh voice said.
The boy half turned and when he gave a look he felt his muscles suddenly stiffen. He ceased his slouchy way and did not smile as he looked at the speaker.What he felt was a sudden wave of haughty and fierce rage.He had no mean s to control it so quickly it swept over him.A tall man who was wearing the uniform of a general was grinning at him with fierce eyes and teeth.A man who had almost the features of Mutt in the funnies of the Daily News.It was one of the two professional spies who had kidnapped him, and put him in the attic with the rattlesnakes.
''did someone else help you to get out!''Asked the tall man with a grin. The boy refused to answer but stared at him like a snake ready to strike.
''Of course I ought to have known you would escape somehow.But we gave ourselves time to escape just the same.How long did you remain in the attic you christian cur.''!
Penrod defiantly threw himself from beneath the hand of the disguised Clandelinian spy.He did it in a quiet manner while there was a look of disdain in the boys young face which made the rebel soldier wince, though he shrugged his shoulders as though he was amused.
''You refuse to answer my questions!''He demanded in a fierce tone.
''Yes indeed, I refuse.''
At this very moment he saw at the middle of the corridor general Evans and the beautiful vivian girls approaching but slowly. A young officer who also appeared to be a general was alking gaily to the girls.No doubt they were on thir their way back to their own headquarters.Was he going to miss the general a third time!Was he!
The spy laid his hand on the boys shoulder again, but the disguised Clandelinian grasped him firmly this time.

CHAPTER TWENTY FOUR

CHAPTER TWENTY TWO.....

PENROD IS SUCCESSFUL IN HIS MISSION.

''You are a desperate foriegner boy.''The man said in a very cool voice.''I am going to take you before the Angalinian authorities, and accuse you with being a spy for general Manley.and if you struggle I won't tell a person anything but kill you on the spot.Any how you are a stranger, yes a very strange boy scout to general Evans, and you are in his headquarters i without his mi permission.What will you answer to that!My companion is coming down the rear staircase, and he will help me cause your arrest by these Abbleannians.no you see!!!''!!''
And in fact there appeared at the head of a crowd of officers the figure of the middle si sized fierce Jeff faced looking man that Penrod surely remembered.He saw him alright.He was the head of the two spies.for a moment he felt bewildered, and a dampness broke out over his forehead, and on the palms of his hands.
If the ind spy indeed did such a bold act, what could he say to the officers the rascal told him lie to,and how could he bring proof to explain who he really was, and what story did he dare to tell to any of the officers.His protestatio s protestations and struggles would or merely cause the spy to committ a murder in order to insure his own escape.And Penrod also remembered the day as if he we re living through it again, the horrible moment when he had been locked up in that attic alone in the intense darkness, with his back against the wall, and had for twenty four hours listened in horror to the shrill hissing roar of the tails of the rattlers in the same attic with him.
He felt the same as he did then, but now he was in another camp among strange soldiers, and far away from general Greathearts army.He fully saw now that he coul could not do anything to save himself untill unless by the help of god something showed him a way.The boy wisely made not even the slightest sound and the tall man who held him saw only a flash of fire in his eyes.But his heart called out to god.It was as if he heard it .It was a strong plea, a plea that reached heaven, and as it called to god, it called as if it shouted.
''Please Dear god help me escape the spies.''His heart called heavy heavenward.
''Help please.''
The great general was drawn drawing nearer. Perhaps should he!''
''You are a boy who is too proud and too wise to kick rhout or struggle with me'' the man continued in a stern voice.''and you being a strange r in these places the Abbleannians would not believe what you told them.no you see!''
At this moment the stairs were crowded with a perfect procession of officers, and the middle sized fierce looking man was at the head of them, but he only could move slowly however.But it was evident nevertheless that he had seen Penrod.
And the boy scout t rned so that he was able to face the rebel spy squarely, and the Clandelinian thought Penrod was go n going to say a few words in answer to hi him, but he remained silent.Even at the same time as he made the movement of turning,some of the other Angelinian officers approached, and the spy made a great story about t the lad, and the colonelat once said!!
''Well my boyscout,what do you want within our lines now!''
How Penrod started when he heard that voice.Could he really be mistaken.He knew he certainly had heard it before.He looked at the other Angelinian officers who had come up and what had appeared to be a sort of vague suspicion now forced itself upon Penrod as a dread dread truth.

Everyone but the seven Princesses laughed heartily when they heard this [illegible] Violet said with a pugnacious pe was in t he presence of Colonel Jack Evans, the brother of General Jackcoin Evans, and other officers belonging to a division of wicked Abyssinkillians, called the Abbissanpian Tigers.Nothing but a bold front could save him now for he knew that these kind of Abbissanpians paid very little respect to Glandelinian boyscouts unless hewas likely to satisfy their own interests, and if he really was mistaken for one his arrest was certain, and then if suspected as a spy what would his fate be!He was a boy, but he knew it would be death nevertheless as the Abyssn Abyssinkillians and even Angelinians respected no spy of any age. would not summary vengeance be taken upon him in retaliation for the manner in which Angelinian boy scouts had been trw treated by the Glandelinians.Brave as poor Penrodwas and accustomed as he had become to look all danger in the face he could not but regard his situation as most critical in the extreme.

"What did you say your business within o r lines was lad!" inquired the colonel again.

"I wish to speak with General Evans the commanding officer f your division here."said Penrod steadily meeting the steady searching glance of the colonel himself!"I wished to have a personal interview with him."

"Well that's a fair request."said the colonel carelessly."As he is my brother I have no objection to it.Want to see him personally!"

Yes indeed s I would."Penrod answered a assuming a smile as best as he could.General "General Greatheart sent me to him with an important message for hi only."

"That's a li ely likely story.But we think he could not interview you to night. He has an interview with my charges the Vivian Girls."

"I did not suppose he could.But it isvmost important that I must see your general.Can I!"inquired Penrod who suspecting trouble was very anx ous q anxious to bring the trouble to an abrupt end.

"Yes you may se him when the proper time comes."Answered the colonel."but this officer(indicating the tall disguised spy)"tells me you are a glandelinian boy scout seeking information that would cause certain destruction of the vivian Girl Princesses whose guardian I am.You may send word to Glandelinia if you will it that your effort has been frustrated, and also my clever lad you are to remain in my possession.If I am not mistaken I and my generals and the whole army has a better right to retain you than any one else."

"Yes indeed colonel."said one of his lieutenants."I'll bet fifty pan pazazn that he is the very Glandelinian boy spy Gerald Starring that gave us the slip at Maldon fair during the battle of Tataria...."

"I was sure that I could not be mit mistaken."Said colonel Evans. So my lad I must tell you that you are myprisoner."

"What do you mean sir by I being your prisoner!And how do you know you have a claim upon me!You have no claim and never had.My name is not Gerald Starring."Penrod exclaimed in an indignant and defiant tone."I am no rebel spyI am s only acting in prompt obedience to the orderders of General Greatheart and am under his protection.I can prove it by the Vivian Girls."

"Very well spoken.But what d o you suppose!We believe the thrushy lies you tell!Bes d Besides I say we have a good claim upon you for you are the Glandelinian boy scout spy Gerald Starring.But you will be held untill you are exchanged.Here Lieutenant Allenconin" he said turning to one of his officers. "Place this little Glandelinian boy scout in custody and for the love of Heaven don't allow him to escape this time.We need him for a boy we lost.We can exchange him to suit his back."

Some of the privates advanced to obey t e o the order while the [illegible]said to the r rest]

"Get back to your camps.Tell General Vivian how matters stand and also that we are ready to advance upon Vivian Hickey, and reinforce General Mansion as soon as he chooses."

"Tell the general of the first division."said a captain"that the next time they go into action they must watch out for Glandelinian signals.It is evident Manley is retreating toward Fort St Dominean or Aurandecallio."

CHAPTER TWENTY FOUR.

"Tell the vivian girls "chimed in Penrod""that n one of their boy boy friends in mistaken for a Glandelinian boy scout and that they and their guardian is holding him a prisoner on some account of a lying spy, without investigat ing the matter first.And they are not slower enough to know the difference between a Glandelinian and a Gentleman."

"You are indeed very complementary young man to say the least about it"said an Abbissanpian w o was standing near the colonel."You are a Glandelinian no matter what your Canadian Nationality is in your face for you wear the traitor uniform.But I'll see to it that they'll not be informed as they may mistake you for their boy friend Penrod."

"I'm telling you the plain truth."answered Penrod."You will find out soon enough that you have the wrong one a prisons, and if the vivian girls see me and recognize me you won't succeed in keeping me long, and that they will not allow no man who accuses me to go without being investigated."

"Well if they know you you'll be free."said the colonel himself "But just now no matter what your Nationality is , you know the evidence is against y u you, and that's the truth."Then turning to the soldier he said;

"See that the prisoner is well secured, and be sure and take special care of this rebel youngester for if you allow him the opport unity to escape he'll do it."and colonel Evans turned on his heel and walked away to rejoin the generals.And the soldier who was in close charge of his boy prisoner obeyed the instructions of his colonel, and Penrod was delivered in charge of an An Angelinian Sergeant who at once conducted him toward where other prisoners were usually kept.As they passed along through the camp, the boy was gazed at every step gazed at, at every step, but he was not mocked or molested, though some looked at him more closely.

Penrod found that general evans men alone, had captured nearly eighty thou and Angelinian soldiers, many of them badly wounded, and despite the work of the army surgeons, the poor fe o fellows on account of the rigors of winter and their exposure w while lying on t he battle field were suffering intensely in deed.

It indeed made Penrod shudder so s oo so many Thousands of rebels soldiers swathed in bandages, yet their treatement by the Angelinians was heavenly compared to the inhuman treatment t to which wounded Angelinians we re subjected and Penrod knew from the scenes just past, that even the Angelinians themselves had not known more lenient in the treatment of their prisoners who were so unfortunate as to fall into the hands, especially they if they be Abyssinkillians soldiers or others.

As soon as Penrod was placed under guard his hands were unbound, and then he was seated on the ground inside a big warm tent beside a sentry, the boy being in no very good mood.

"It's not for myself that I care."He said to himself."But I'm being suspected as a Glandelinian boy scout spy in disguise and if I'm sent among the rebels in exchange, I'm afraid that the treatment I'll recievewill be a heap worse than even maybe the vivian girls had recieved.But I must not talk too loud" he added glancing cautiously toward the sentry who was walking his beat"but I'm a short distance from him."I've never been in such a scrape yet as this before.But just the same I'm not going into the rebel lines on any exchange.If I obtain the chance to escape I'm going to take advantage of it.I'd give anything if I could give them the slip now.There comes a party of officers.I wonder who theyare!"

In a short time the officers came up and entered the tent, and one of them whom Penrod recognized as general Mac-Cantler halted high orse in front of general Evans headquarters.After a short conversation, with that individual he handed him a letter, and accompanied by a number of rebel officers who were prisoners approached the tent in which Penrod was confined with the guard.

"Well my lad"He said as he came up."I'm sorry to see you in this terrible fix.But I have got news for you.General Evans has given us full permission to inform you that as you will be transferred among the Angelinians

[illegible] but the seven Princesses laughed heartily when they heard this [illegible] violet said with a pernicious

you will be well treated as long as you remain with us a prisoner.You see theglandelinians have among their camps at vivian wickey a boy scout prisoner, who belong to general Evans division as t the manoot, and the rebel general in command there is going to ask general vivian to exchange you for himwho is brave and keep a stiff upper lip.don't think of making the mistake of attempting to escape, and you will soon be back in your own camp again in less than twenty four hours. goodbye."

Penrod shook hands with the general, who walked back to his horse.It was evident from the preparations made that the christian armies were going to move forward to re inforce general Mandions army if there was an opening to do s so. part of the christian armies were already in motion.Indeed while the great fight at Jennie Vivian had been raging most of the valuable Angelinian tents and prov sions had been either sent to the rear, or send further on to the more fortified cam camps as well as the glandelinian prisoners themselves and so on, to be out of range of the glandelinian batterins, and now when preparations for the forwardmovements began, Penrod who although he had not seen either a dead or wounded Angelinian i in general Evans command, was nvertheless able to judge pretty accurately the number that had been killed or disabled in the terrific strue struggle by the conversations he happened o to overhear.,hat had been done with the countless numbers of dead, and even the greater number of wounded he could not acconscrain, but it was probable that the latter during and after th the battle had been se nt to strunge r part s of t he camp, and into the captured towns and villages or extra camps made for them, and the former hastily buried or burned on the battlefield.

Penrod was given a horse and the lad was tremendously surprised to find out that scarcely any attention was being paid to him, his Angelinian captors no doubt thinking that he was w sewise enough to rat her want to be exchanged than run the risk of the severe punishme t punish ent that they had threatened to give him in case he was detected in making an attempt to escape.He was also sternly warned that it was utterly useless to think of fleeing for he certainly would be recaptured, even if he succeeded in getting outside the picket lines.

But Penrod who knew well that the rebels would not willingly lost an lose an opportunity of securing him if possible, and of his danger of being put among their lines by the mistake was not not at all intimidated by any of these threats, and also as he had not bound himself to remain a passive prisoner he commenced laying his plans for escape, intending indeed to put them into immediate execution when he had the very first chance to do on so.Not just before t he approach of darkness, and while it was snowing heavily, the troops columns of troops halted and commenced forme forming cam camps on each side of the glander road.

while the men we re making their preparations to shelter themselve themselves from the nights blizzard storm, the general and his staff officers who evidently desired more comfortable quarters than could be found in the open air on such a night as this repaired to an abandoned house in the woods.Penrod was already sitting down on a log by the side of the road, and was thinking to himself of the incidents of the day, when suddenly a dashing young general rode up t o Penrod, dismounted from his horse and forgetting himself as Penrod looked like a English gorieyner said in English;

"Say Keed, don't you want something to eate it.If so you may so we'll allow you to come into her out mess tent were ze it is warm, for some of our offic officers want's to talk to you.I'll hold myself responsible for his not getting away from here"ge continued in Abbian nine turning to the guard.

This individual officer after a few minutes consideration concluded that the boy could pass, and the boy prisoner followed the lieutenant general to the place where the officers of the mess to which he belonged were seated at a table inside a big tent eating their suppers.

"Seet down beach at the very foist goood place you can find." said their host."we have no chairs at ze present t oime, as they have not been removed from the wagon alel he,je as ever have so good supper as viz in ze glandelinian camps."

Penrod astonished him by answering in Abbiennian .

"I cannot say as I do not know."He replied as he glanced at the differen different kind of dishes that were scattered about on the long table, which contai contained corn bread, chicken, onions, and salted pork chops the full mess being evidently the raid fruits of a foraging party on some advanced portion of the rebel lines."But I heard the glandelinian officers of Hanleys army and also the whole besieged army at „ivian „ickey live very well on what they secure yay to tell you the real truth live and fare bett er than all your army.there is nothing to hinder him or the besieged from their supplies and ammunition."

"where does general Hanley and the besieged armieesnt Vivian wickey get all the ammunition and grup that they can retain the resistance against the seige s also so long!"asked the lieutenant general!"Our own foraging parties secure aveyh everything they steal along the line of march that they can lay their hands on just to keep it away from him, and just now there was said to be no more provisions and ammunitions for the besieged at „ivian „ickey.Yet yesterday reports from general Evans said vivian wickey received millions of tons of supplies through a mysterious source despi the seg seige and also many more men and artillery."

"Well you are foolish if you don't believe any such story as that."Answered Penrod who could not help laughing outright at the idea of the rebel forces at „ivian „ickey not being able to secure any provisions.I never know the besieged to be short of rations so far.Capture Jennie „urner v city and Galvarine, then vivian „ickey is tight.But not till then /89

"Well then some of our glandelinian prisoners is not telling us the truth then."Said one of the other officers who had not as yet spoken."But to change the subject.How many men did Hanley lose in the big battle just past.?"

"I am afraid I'm not able to te ll."Penrod said in reply."I see you Angelinian and Abyssinkilian generals are doing all you can to hide your own terrible losses.I have not seen a single wounded soldier since I've been made your prisoner, and when I saw the battle raging at a safe distance, I saw them dropping in oldness windrows during the fray."

"Yes we did lose a horrible number of men." said the lieutenant general" how many none of us will really and truthfully know for a long, long time think what you may.You are telling us more about your own side than any rebel boy scout would.But to change the subject once more, what did you who I see is a foriegner and whom I thought spoke nothing but English, see in the Glandelinian cause to come over here across the fr sea from your country seventy five million miles away, to serve them as a glandelinian boyscout for.don't you know that is the wickedest cause the world has ever known and if you are in knowledge of it God may punish you with very much bad luck all your life!"""""""

"No se here"answered Penrod setting down his plate which the lieutenant general had supplied plentifully."You were very kind to ask me, a prisoner to come here in a high officers mes s hall to get some supper, and therefore I have no desire to spi spoil a good hearty meal by entering a militarty discussion. or I'm sure if I got to answer t your question, I shall have to tell you some very plain facts, and I know you will become intensely angry at me."

"Oh no we are not that a unreasonable, and you need not fear us on that." replied the general."We please be a good boy, and answer my question."

"Well then"said Penrod, "I will make the same reply as I ma expated to make.It is this;I believe that if there ever was a nation in the world who needed a good sound thre thrashing, you very Abbisan land do for a very certain and certain reason.And that's the truth too.You need it from some one else though and not glandelinia.I am a Canadian a French Canadian, and I never stood up for the old glandelinian fine sir."

This discussion was maintained for an hour the Abbiennians evincing the utmost regard to the principals which they were fighting, and the manner in which Penrod waved their flimsy arguments right and left, and the fearlessness with which he upheld the course the Abbiennian government has pursued, and predicted the speedy overthrow of the licked glandelinian rebellion excited their respect and admiration, and they suspected a mistake in in holding a prisoner, and decided to have an investigation made as soon as possible and find out who he real really is.

[illegible] but the seven Princesses laughed [illegible] when they heard this [illegible] said with a pugnacious

At length the hour for bedtime on a came and just as Penrod was to be conducted back to the guard, general walter john Harrison, accompanied by two beautiful little girls he had never seen before, and a strange officer who was a lieutenant colonel rode up.

"Here my rebel boyscout."The general Exclaimed addressing Penrod; "Here's an old acquaintance of yours.Come here and see him."

Penrod immediately obeyed the order, the strange officer followed by the two little girls advanced to meet him, and Penrod recognized the first boy friend of the vivian girls Colonel Ned Perkins.The two little girls he did not know but they looked at him very keenly as if they had seen him somewhere before. However Penrod was not at all pleased to see him, for the colonel no doubt had not forgotten the day, when Penrod disguised as a rebel boy scout, had an encounter with him, and though a boy made Ned Perkins his prisoner.Though he could not remember of ever having ill treated him still Penrod feared the colonel might have some feelings of malice, and thinking him a rebel boy scout yet, might see fit to take revenge upon him.To his surprise however the Abbissinian eagerly advanced to meet him, and extending his hand greeted him with;

"How are ye my lad!You are in a serious fix I see.I am the free soldier now, and you the prisoner."

"Yes" answe red Penrod."I am in for it.Although I am a prisoner and was made a prisoner through the lines of a crafty foe, I suppose I might as well submit to it for a while."

The colonel passed a full hour in conversation with the boy, talking over the little incidents that had occured while he was a prisoner in the hands of Penrod and his boy followers and was compelled to guide them through a most dense wood and ended by saying;

"Although you and your followers were compelled to be rather rough to me, you did the best you could under the circumstances, and I shall let you see that I do not begrudge you.I'll speak to general Jacksonia Evans, and ask him to furnish you with quarters at my own headquarters to night."

The colonel then left him, and shortly afterwards a corporal and his guard came up and conducted the boy to the building where he was confined in a bedroom with a single window.

A few extra blankets had been placed on the bed, and Penrod felt sure he could have passed a very comfortable night had he not been a prisoner.As soon as the Abbissinian corproal had locked the door and moved away, Penrod began to examine his quarters and then said to himself;

"I hope the colonel has not taken too much interest in me as I'm really suspicious of him.I'm in a fix now too if I'm exchanged for if I am exchanged, I'll be in the rebel in lines and will never gain my freedom.I would not mind it so much if I was not in that peril.I guess I'll try and make my escape while I have time.I'll not try to escape from the lines but find my way to the vivian girls and have them intercede for me.I'll try that window shutter."

Penrod did as he decided and to his joy discovered that it was not nailed shut as he had thought.

"so" said enrod to himself"the very next thing for me to do is to ascertain where the guards are placed."

He then glanced out and saw one by the window, and there was another one near the other side of the window and he realized that they had recieved orders from the corporal to keep a good look out.He therefore decided to wait untill the camp was completely quiet, and then he would make the attempt.Penrod waited for two hours and a half, sitting onthis bed, waiting for the time to come, and listening for the coming of that silence, which should tell the hour or tell that the hour to try to make the escape hadcome.

Penrod waited untill it was a litt le past the hour of midnight listening for the sentries call of"all's well."It soon came that time, and Penrod arose to his feet and cautiously approached the window.Before he pushed it open he looked out.both of the sentries were standing round a roaring camp camp fire of immense size near the north side of the house, one of them standing with shouldered musket , while the othe now and then stretched his arms and yawned sleepily.Seeing as yet no possibilities of escape Penrod reluctantly re ained seated on his bed, debating long and earnestly with himself as to what course it was best to persue.If only he was a strong man, he would spring out and overpow er the two guards where they stood.But he even knew that if he was a strong man, instead of a boy, the escape could not be accomplished without a desperate fight, for the two sentries were large powerful looking men, and no doubt doubt were very strong.And besides if a stru struggle did ensue, even were he a man, the din of the conflict would immediately attract the attention of the other guards at the other side of the building, who would lend prompt aid, and wit with six men opposing him, escape would be impossible.Still there seemed to be no other me means than to play some trick on the sentry, and the refore he unlocked the latch, pushed the window open slowly, and decided to make the attempt.

He had scooped up some snow from the window sill, and had made it into a very hard snowball, when he noticed that one of the sentries was sitting on a log near the fire, looking the other way.To hit him was out of the question.

"gosh"he whispered."I must get out of this window as quickly as possible before he see's me, and make the best of my way to the bank of snow behind those bushes.As soon as I know I'm safe I'll scoot.I w don't want to be exchanged into the rebel lines when I'm no rebel."

Penrod put his cap down over his ears, lingered for an instant to put on his overcoat and mittens which had not been taken from him then mounted lightly into the window, reached the ground without arousing the Abbissinian sentires, and in a moment more disappeared behind the snow bank.Penrod was about to continue when another sentry suddenly appeared close to his hiding place, halted gazed vacantly about him as if trying t o see int o the dark, and then retraced his steps in another direction.

As soon as Penrod felt certain that this sentry was gone, he again moved forward reached the large clump of bushes without making any noise and then hid again. It was still snowing heavily and he felt sure his foot tracks would be dov covered over before is escape would be discovered.

"thanks be to God that this was so well done."P whispered Penrod."onT the Abbissanians certainly be sur r surprised when to morrow approaches, and they call the roll of prisoners and find me missing."

But Penrod by no means was as safe as he supposed.And yet his escape had not been so surely accomplished.He was still inside this part of the christian lines far from the abode of violet and her sisters, and might at any moment stem himself upon a strong picket line.But t o prevent himself from being retaken it was necessary that he should get as far away from general Jacksonia Evans camp as possible before his escape was discovered, and reached the camp we where the vivian girls were, and Penrod threw himself on his hands and knees, and moved slowly across a snow covered field, that extended a mile back of Sunbam creek, and which must be crossed before he could reach the woods beyond.

There was no danger of leaving tracks in the snow long enough to be trailed in case he was discovered to be gone, as the blizzard was still raging driven by a high gale.

As he was buffetted by the fierce wind, and tormented by the swirling snow being hurled in his face, his progress was laborous and slow, and it took him over three hours to reach a road, which ran in the direction he supposed the Sunbeam creek to lie and where the refuge he headed for may be.Not having seen any of the Abbissannian picket lines, and now feeling quitecertain he was far outside this section of the christian line lines he arose to his feet, shivering and almost benumbed with cold, and more so to warm himself up, he commenced running as fast as he could through the deep snow.This road ran through the thick wood but nevertheless he had no great difficulty in following it, as high banks were on either side.It took him however untill morning to reach the sunbeam Creek.It was indeed a most pleasant sight to his eyes, and he could not supress a cry of joy when he found himself standing on its banks.

Everyone but the seven Princesses laughed heartily when they heard this [illegible] Violet said with a pugnacious the water was frozen solid and the surface of the ice was covered wih with two feet of snow.His spirits fell again however when on looking up and down the shore side of the river as dar as eye could reach he could not see anything a hundred feet away the snow was coming down so fast.The boy was not yet reaching the end o his journey.He feared also he might unexpectedly come upon a party of glandelinian soldiers, who may be hidden behind some of the numerous points that stretched out into the river, or there might not be a human being within a score of miles on account of the winter storm.It was g o growing so cold, that he knew he must not linger, for even in spite the snow and tempest he was not free from pursuit, untill he either reached Violet and her sisters tent, or untill he was safe within general Greathearts camps.

Sorrowful ly he continued his steps down the banks of the river, listening for the sound of approaching persuers, and eagerly hoping for the storm to abate but the hours of the morning wore slowly away, and the boy fugitive felt cold an and hungry, and he began to debate upon the mans means to find shelter, and of securing food, when he noticedt hat the blizzard had disappeared or abated consis s considerably, and also observed through the thinning snow pall a column of smoke round a bend of the creek, and after trudging through deep snow for half an hour noticed a large column of soldiers walking on snowshoes.

Seeing from their uniforms that they appeared to be Angelinians, Penrod frantically waved his cap to attract their attention their attention.The Angelinians evidently saw him, but Penrod still wore his gray uniform, and the Nat lonals were suspicious that it was the plan of some force of rebels to decoy them into some hidden ambush, and therefore they began to slowly retreat.

"I'm sure they ought to have seen me."said Penrod, and then he commended shouting and yelling with all the power of his lungs.A moment later a dozen puffs of smoke issued from the group of retreating soldiers, and as a great number of shots plowed through the snow, or whistled about him, and lodged in the trees close to him, it was evident to Penrod that he had been taken for a rebel boy scout, but he could not understand why Angelinian soldiers should fire at a boy.Little did he dream of his narrow escape.The soldiers were of a Glandelini n _landelinian scouting party in disguise.After watching the column u ntill it disappeared, the boy again went to the banks of the river.Noon was now approaching without any relief from any where, and therefore the fugitive,, cold, footsore, with almost frost bitten feet and hands, and hungry, continued on looking for a place where he could get warmth and sleep for the coming night.

As he continued on down the bank he kept onthe edge of the woods to prevent surprise by both sides, but he did not go very far from the river for fear of missing the camp of Angelinians he knew.The fierce pangs of hunger began to torme torment him much more, and this he tried to relieve by chewing on snow and twigs.But this afforded him no relief whatever, and the refore he proposed to himself to turn back into some open country space, seek a new section of the christian lines and ask for food and shelter at the first camp he could find.He prefered recapture to starving to death, or being frozen. nothing could t urn him from his purpose though he was not sure he would be picked up by friends.But it soon began to grow dark and much more colder, for night was approaching, there was no christian camp in sight, and though the snow had stopped falling, the wind had grown to a howling roaring tempest, and the inte nsity of the crisp air gave warning that a very great cold wave was coming on.

Penrod Poor Penrod feeling more colder than ever, almost famished and tired, and realizing he had fled entirely from the christian lines alth altogether by mistake, was becoming desperate.He didnot dare lie down in the woods to sleep for he would freeze to death sure.He re ented of his hastiness in running away.

CHAPTER TWENTY FOUR.

He had never all such cold weather in his life, and he had all his life experienced the cold weather of the fiercest Canadian Winters.but the Calverinian winters had those Canadian winters beat.About seven o-clock he found himself on the banks of what appeared to him as an inlet of the sea full of floating ice.This being the mighty Mic-Hollester Run river, barred his path.

To find means to cross this icy stream was impossible, there being as yet not a single bridge in sight.He saw the only course left for him was to follow the course of the river or rat race his steps back into the woods untill he could find his way back into the camp s.The boy wearily dragged himself onward, for two hours in almost intense darkness, stumbling over fallen logs, tripping on snow covered roots, and forcing his way through thick tangled brushes that lay in his path, and finally emerged from the woods and saw a light shining from the small window of a large country house standing close to a wrecked steel bridge that had spanned the river at this point.

Hastily drawing himself back into the bushes Penrod closely examined the very surroundings, which seemed to be deserted with the exception of the approach of a young girl whose age about she may have been a child slave.,and it appeared she was bring two horses cautiously near to the door of the house in front of which stood a long army sleigh, covered with all kinds of provisions.

"I don't see any one else around."said Penrod to himself."I think it will be safe for me to go over and ask that little girl slave for something to eat and some shelter from the cold.I do not think there is any danger, for if she is loyal for the rebel cause, and should attempt to do any mischief, I soon could overpower her very quickly.But I must first look for something to use as a belaying pin in case I would meet up with some of the glandelinians."

After a minute of searching, Penrod found a large stick which he could use as a club, and then moved from his hiding place toward the house.The little girl despite the darkness soon discovered his approach.At first she stood still in evident surprise and then acted very much as if she was going to run into the house for refuge, but after finding the boy was alone, her face assumed a cheerful smile, which Penrod took for a sign of welcome.When he had come within speaking distance Penrod inquired with a return smile|

"Little girl, is there any chance for me to obtain shelter!And to get anything to eat in here!"

"There is plenty of it here on the sleight sleigh of you follow me." answered the girl."I'm all alo ne here."

Penrod approached the sleigh, and was about to go to the rear of it, when the door of the house was suddenly flung open, and two stalwart soldiers wearing scarlet uniforms sprang out of the opening with muttered curses, and one of them who appeared to be the leader, seizing him by the shoulder flourished his sabre above his head, and demanded Penrod to surrender hesitatingly, also demanding his reason for starting to run away with the sleigh of provisions.

So sudden was the assault that Penrod for a moment did not have time to even use his club.But not so with the girl, who though surprised retained her presence of mind, and grasping the club from Penrods hands swung it about her with a dexterity surprising for a girl of her age, and brought it with all the force of her sturdy young ar m upon the head of the soldier, who instantly released his hold u on Penrod, and sank to the floor without a sound.But before she could repeat the blow six more soldiers sprang from the door ways, and in spite of their desperate struggles overpowered them quickly not however untill both the boy and girl had been stunned by a blow from the butt of a few pistols.

"Well I'll be ough hanged."exclaimed one of the soldiers"But this is a lucky haul of heads.Trying to make away with our sleigh and our in Thomas get some hot water mixed with ice and throw it into our colonels face"pointing to the prostrate companion."to fetch him to his senses.The rest of you fellows get more ropes and tie the hands of the prisoners behind their backs."

While two of the men were over the prisoners orders, Penrod who still had remained conscious tried to scan the countenances of his strange captors.

...when they heard this
...laid with a pugnacious

Despite the uniform they were, they evidently did not belong to the Angelinians, or Abbisannians, nor the others of the Nationals, for although any of the Abbisannians were composed of most ferocious lookin' lookin men they appeared like angels compared with the those in whose power he now found himself.These men though they were the red uniform of the Abbisannians, looked to be a dirty rugged blood thirsty lot of en, and unless their faces were deceiving, they may be capable of any kind of atrocity.Presently two of the men who had gone into the house, came out again with some pieces of rope with which they intended to bind the hands of their boy and girl prisoners who to the surprise of the soldiers offered no resistance.And by the time this was accomplished, the soldier whom the brave little girl had bold handled so roughly had been quickly and promptly restored to his senses(if he had any) and supported himself against the wall of the building to co llect his thoughts, while the oher soldiers stood silently by as if the y were waiting for his orders.

''Let's get everything ready at once.''he said at length.''nd let's do the job at once.And it will not need any Court Marshall, nor Judge of jury to decide the fa-e fate of these two christ ian dogs, knowing as we do what has befallen those of our number who were so terribly unfortunate as to fall into the hands of the cruel Abbisannians.''

The disguised rebels for so they he, obeyed the order by bringing out of t he house two long pieces of rope which they immediately took to a strong tree that stood close by the house, and coiling them up in their hands threw one end over a long stout limb that stretched out twelve feet above the ground and fastened the the m there.

''Good God''exclaimed the little girl as she witnessed these proceedings''It appears to be all up with us now little boy.They are going to hang us who are only children without mercy.''

Indeed it was nothing but the horrid truth.And for a moment Penrod was so completely unerved that he was compelled to lean against the house for support.He was soon rounsed roused by the voice of the leader of the disguised Glandelinians as he spoke in low stern tones;;;;;;

''I am going to do this in full-retaliation for an order issued by gaeral Mansion who is besieging vivian y viv wickey, stating that on account of the ''Reign of Terror'' in Norma Cat herine, no Glandelinian at this city falling his into his hands would recieve any quarter.Other christian commanders also mad- made orders that they would burn at the stake or hang all rebel assas assassins as they term us who might be caught scouting near the christ ian lines.If you needs use your eyes you will be able to see the effect of that unjust order right here.There were two hundred Scoodlers under my command at the outbreak of this war, and now there are only twenty left including myself.,he re mainder of the soldiers have been killed or captured by you christian dogs.Eve- those who were captured suffered the penalty of that order.I or my men we re no more guilty of that ''Re ign of Terror'' in Norma Catharine however than you are but were only regularly sworn into the service of Glandelinia, and were detailed to harass our christian enemy in every direction, and in every possible manner, for and for obeying our just orders more than a hundred and fifty of us have been killed by the Nationals like dogs.We glandelinian scouts shall continue to retaliate on you untill our own government recieves notice that the cruel order has been withdrawn.I will give you two only half an hour, and at the end of that time you will swing.''

''If you must execute us.''said Penrod in a husky kind of voice''Why do you not let us die properly like boy and girl, and not criminals.''

''My men would have preferred to have been shot like heroes.''Said the Glandelinian chief.''But not one of them were allowed to choose.''

So saying the leader of these glandelinians wheeled about and strode away, while Penrod was allowed with his girl companion to come inside the house, and once inside Penrod sat on a low couch and thought over his sentence with a calmness that made h- think his senses were already gone.

CHAPTER TWENTY FOUR.

He could not believe that it was really true, that he had heard aright, and that the glandelinians were really going to condemn him to so disgraceful a death, and also the little girl with him.When general Greatheart had first brought him over to the Angelinian Country, and he had entered the service of the great and righteous cause, he never believed that the time would come, when he would die so disgraceful a death.He had expected with great confidence, that he would see the war t o its total end, that he would be permitted to live to be able to some day return home and see his friends, and tell them what he had seen, and heard during the war.

Yet now could it really be a possibility that after all his good luck so far, and after he had thought of such a bright futire fut ure, that his life would be ended in such a desolate region away from home, and his dear dearest friends, and in so terrible a manner.He could not hardly believe that it was really a fact.But he could see the tree as he look looked out of the window, with the long dangling ropes with the two small fatal nooses dangling from the limb, and there were those fierce blood thirsty looking men lounging in the room, or sitting near the fire place, waiting almost impatiently for the time granted by their leader to end, so they could begin their murder of two children.

When Penrod looked forward counting the very seconds he and his companio- compan- companion had to live it was indeed a moment of dire agony.Just think, only half an hour and he and the little girl would be dangling there.Very often Penrod had spoken very lightly upon a short half hour.He had - any Catholics in his own country and had heard them declare that it was bett er for a person to know the hour of his approaching death, so he would have time to save his soul.

But for Penrod, for some reason, he had the feeling that he would rather die without knowing when death will come, but he was now realizing as is too often the case no such good luck is granted.Other times when seeing the fiercest battles he had scarcely given the matter a single thought, even very little importance and no notice had been taken the roof.

But only half an hour to Penrod, when condemned to die a most disgrace ful death, who bound like a dog, had heard his sentence, and yet watched over by armed glandelinian Scoodlers, that he would not escape from that sentence, and who is in full possession of his senses, and who has for only ten years looked abroad upon all the benuties of nature, and feel the soft breezes of the summer air f- fanning his cheek or experiencing the thrilling rigors of winter, but who kn knows that now his end has come, and he will be deprived of life, which will be terminated suddenly, and in a terrible manner, in this case of being in poor Penrods place, who could des r describe, even imagine the hurried thoughts that passed through his minds during that short half hour.It seemed to Penrod that only a few minutes of the timehad passed, when the leader of the Scoodler Glandelinians arose from his heavy chair.

The signal was understood by his men, four of whom approached the prisoners, who conducted them outside to the tree scaffold.Penrod had recieved more courage sot by the example of his little girl companion, for both of them walked with firm and steady steps.Their faces were as pale as death but were expressionless and bore no trace of the struggles they were making to conceal their emotions.They did not show even the slightest slightest hesitation, as they were forced to take the ir stand on a most high box box placed under the tree and in a moment the fatal ropes were adjusted.The two heroic children said their farewells, and the leader made a sign for the box to be removed from under their fet feet, which was pulled from its l place.

This had no sooner been done, when suddenly there cane a thundering roar of approaching horsemen, and the very next moment a very large squadron of mounted Winkie Abyssinki ian soldiers galloped up headed by general Wat Walter john Harrison, and colonel Evans, Penrod heard a few harshly spoken orders, the re was a deafening crash of musketry he saw the leade r of the Scoodlers and all his men d fall pierced by dozens of bullets, and then all was blank to him and the little girl.

Now if it pleasesthe reader to allow me to do so, let me return to the Abyssinkilians whom Penrod deserted in so unceremonious a manner.It was not until six twenty six in the morning before his escape was discovered.Then rthe orderly went to his room to call him.It was still very dark yet, and the blizzard was still raging in full fury, and the light not being lit it was very dark in the room, and as the orderly sergeant opened the door to his room he yelled loudly;

"Come out my rebel boy scout.Get out of your bed and get your breakfast.It is nearly half past six."

"However the reply he only recieved was the echoe of his own voice thrown back by the walls.He waited for only a moment or less and then repeated the summons in a much louder tone, and still he recieved no answer at all from within.

"I'll bet that rebel boy scout must still be dead as a log yet, and how cold his room is."said the officer to himself, and entering the room, he lit the candle and approaching the bed pulled off the covers saying;

"Come now my boy, none of your old glandelinian tricks.I know you have heard me.Get up I tell you--"

It was all he said, for as he tore off the cover, he found to his very greatest amazement that his boy scout prisoner was gone.He bounded out of the room like a springing phanter, then with another bound he reached the hallway and without paying any attention to the inwurdies of the two guards as to what caused his strange actions, he started for the generals quarters, and hurriedly made inquries for gene general Harrison.The general was aroused from his bed, and appearing at the door with his shoes still in his hands demanded of the orderly sergeant what the excitemt was.

"The little prisoner sir-----"began the ser geant

"Well what is the trouble with him!" asked the general who being very far from guessing the truth was infuriated for being aroued aroused from his bed at so e early an hour"Do you have to come to me to have that boy awakened.If he is too lazy to get up, pull him out of the bed, and if he starts to get unruly, give him a good spanking, that will make him become more civil."

"That could be done very e asily sir, and he is not beyond management sir, especially if he was here."answered the ser geant."but sir he-----"

"If the boy was here "repeated the general his face turning crimson as he began to suspect the truth"If he was here! Have you allowed that boy scout to escape."?

"No sir sir, your Excellency.No sir we did not let him.You see it was like this, he went without asking us and--------."

"Confound you yo. lazy idiots."shouted the general in a furious rage' A plague on you good for nothing lazy scoundrolls.You sa shall pay for this escape of this boy scout.Let loose those blood hounds at once.We must persue him! No stop there.Stop a moment I say.Can't you hear?Are you deaff stop a moment.Tell the officer of the day that I wish to see him right away."

"Wh who did you say you wanted to go away!".

"TELL THE OFFICER OF THE DAY I WANT TO SEE HIM."

The sergeant saluted and rushed off to obey the order, and the general quickly pulled on his shoes, and then his boot s, and after knocking on the door of the room where the other generals were eating t their breakfast entered.

"what's the matter general?You look excited!"Inquired general Jack Evans."Is there anything wrong?Are you sick!"

"I'm sick, and as good and sick from being bothered with foolish questions." replied general Harrison in a rough tone pacing up and down the floor with hurry strides."What luck I meet with is enough to upset the patience of Great St Peter himself.That little rebel boy scout has escaped last night, through the carelessness of the guards."

Every one were on their feet in a moment.

CHAPTER TWENTY FOUR

"gone off"theyall replied or reponed holding up their hands in astonishment.

"yes he has escaped, gone, nizzled,-------clouted out"said the general as he flourished his arms wildly above his head"And unless he is recaptured which I don't expect he will be, I will be deprived of one of my best boy scouts, I ever had, for the rebel boy scout was to have been exchanged for him."

The chief officer of the day entered at this moment, and the general turning to him continued;

"That rascall little Glandelinian boy scout has escaped.I thought him safe but somehow through the carelessness of my guards, he has succeeded in giving me the slip, when I least expected it.Send a number of squads in persuit of him at on e."Sethree bloodhounds, but hold them in the house, and don't don't injure the prisoner if you can avoid it."

The officer saluted and then left the room and then went out, and the general after giving fur orders that the case should be fully investigated in order to see who ma may have been to blame in allowing the prisoner to escape, went out of the building mounted his horse, and accompanied by other officers and a squadron of soldiers, set out in persuit of the squad, which had already started, and was following the trail of the boy fugitive, led by a large swarm of blood hounds but who were forcibly held in check by a number of long chains held by soldiers.

The deep sn snow over four feet five inches on the level retarded the progress of the persuers even on snow shoes, and to make matters worse the wind was blowing a most fierce gale added by a blinding wall of icy sleet and snow.It took seven hours to even reach the place where Penrod had been fired upon by the glandelinians in disguise, and here on account of the deep snow and the foot steps covered over the tr trail was lost.

After several more hours spent in unavailing search, the squadron seperated, and for several more hours scoured the w ods everywhere, despite the fury of the storm looking in vain for traces of the boy scout fugitive.Toward the end of the day the general completely disheartened collected his forces, and after all nights traveling in the fierce cold came to the place where the boy and girl had been seized by the Scoodler rebels, and where they were met by a real child slave who was in a great state of excitement, and who inquired in an anxious tone for the commanding officer.

"Get out of my way boy, I'm in a hurry,"shouted the general impatientl impatiently"and don't bother me now."

"But your Excellency"said the child slave persistently"Colonel Kraghl Thorlnia and his Scoodlers have taken two kids, one a boy and another a girl, and the are going to murder them."

"Do you mean to tell me that Colonel Thorlni a and his force are in this part of the country again."Said the general."Those two children, the y caught, who were they?"

"A boy and a girl"the child slave replied.and then he proceeded to give a full and complete description of the two children so that the general know in a moment that one of them was Penrod, but the little girl he did not know.

After questioning the boy as to where the execution was to take place, the general at once ordered a part of his squa ron to follo w him, directing the others to keep on the trail so that in case the child slave was misleading them no time would be lost.And he arived just in the proper time to save his little girl friend, and his boy prisoner.

Indeed one moment more and he would certainly have been soo too late.The rebel Scoodlers were so completely surprised at the unexpected approach of the Winkie Abyssinkilian cavarly, and so thunder at the death of their leader that they did not have the chance to think of even making a retreat.The ferocious Abyssinkilians fought up and completely surrou ded them, and though they threw down their arms and cried for quarter it was refused.The general uttered a terrible curse as he looked upon the lifeless, there and cruel, and all of these Scoodlers were dead.When Penrod was found in the woods, he found the real child slave on a bed in one of the front rooms of the building, where the fight had taken place which resulted in his capture by the Scoodlers, his head supported by two pillows, and the little girl sitting at the foot of the bed.Through the open door way of another room could be seen a squad of Winkles sitting on chairs, or standing up, and talking.Slowly the recollection of the scenes through which he had just passed, the cruel sentence he had heard pronounced by the rebel colonel, the preparations he had seen the Scoodlers make for his execution, came back to his mind, and he instinctively put his hand to his throat as if expecting to find it encircled by the fatal rope.

"Do you feel better now little boy?"asked the little girl.

"Where are the Scoodlers?"asked Penrod."Are we safe.?"

"Oh yes we are safe from them now, but as you appear to be a Glandelinian boy scout you are still a prisoner."

At this moment a shaggy head nearly covered with a large coronet shaped hat was thrust in at the door way and a voice asked:

"Are you all right now my boy.?If you are ple se lets get started for we must be off."

Penrod was still very weak, but nevertheless was able to walk with the assistance of one of the men, and outside they found a number of Abyssinkillians mounted and waiting for them to come out.Penrod and the little girl were each giving a horse, after which the Abbion-sinian Tigers closed about their prisoner and the little girl, and conducted them down the snow covered road as at a rapid a gallop the deep snow would permit.As soon as Penrod had fully recovered he began to make inquries in regard to the singular manner in which he had the little girl had been rescued, and learned that the soldiers by whom they had been captured were the fierce Omarian Scoodlers, that they had committed massacres in spite of what they had said to the contrary, that they had been in the Norma Catherine "Reign of Terror" and being especially obnoxious to general W le Walter John Harrison having murdered his own children they had been summarily disposed of.At first Penrod could and would not hardly believe the statem statement that he and the little girl had been rescued, through the betrayal of the Scoodlers by the little child slave, but after being assured that it was really the truth, it occured to both children, that their approach had been discovered by the Scoodlers in the house, and the child slave in order to save his life had been compelled to obey the orders of the rebels, and then to makefull amends for what at first appeared to be an act of tre treachery he had quickly conveyed the news to general Walter Harrison.

As soon as they were all fairly started, the soldiers talking the sleigh with the provisions along with them, the orderly sergeant galloped up beside Penrod and hastily questioned him:

"Tell me my boy how in the world did you succeed in getting out of that m all room that night.No one seems to know anything about it."

"I have already told the general."Said Penrod"that I walked past the two sentries, when they had their backs turned toard the house, but the general does not believe it."

Penrod then proceeded to give an account of the manner in the way his escape had been managed, and the sergeant believed it.

"You are too slick a lad to be a Glandelinian, and your escape was pretty well done."Si said he."But mind you, don't try to make any more attempts to escape, because if you do it's the generals orders, that you'll be found like a turkey."

Having delivered this warning, the sergeant rode up to the head of the column. Penrod did not attempt to make any more efforts at escaping for he knew it would be impossible.He was too closely watched, for the Abyssinkillians did not allow a single movement of Penrod to escape their notice.No matter where they went on their return toward the camp, three stalwart Abyssinkillians were at his heels.They soon overtook the main body of the persuers and on the afternoon after their rescue from the Scoodlers, arrived in the section under general Evans where the exchange was to take place.

CHAPTER TWENTY FOUR.

The Glandelinians who were to approach with the boy and a flag of truce had not yet arrived, but toward the evening a body of Zimmermanians made their appearance and as soon as they had been admitted into their lines and the clothe taken from their eyes.General Harrison approached with his own flag of truce.

As the rebels drew near the general Penrod lost a ll hope for he saw a very good looking boy in a purple uniform in their midst, and he knew from the remarks made by the Abyssinkillians that the lad was the eighteen year old boy captain of an Angelinian Regiment, for whom he was to be exchanged.

What would poor Penrod give, if some one would only recognize him and come to his aid on time.As the Zimmermanians halted before the general, and his staff, the leader of the rebels made a profound bow, there was a moments conversation, and then general Harrisons aide-de-camp advanced to Penrod and exclaimed:

"Come to the Insurgents boy.You belong to them once more."

Penrod could not hardly believe that he a Canadian, who had come so far across the oceans to serve with the Angelinians, was to be exchanged.His doom was sealed if he went with them.He would r rather suffer a long confinement in the dreaded Island Prisons than go over to be Glandelinians.Of course even if the Glandelinians did not recognize him his fears would be foolish, and his chance of escape great, but to go within those rebel lines with those ferocious Nic-Hollentinian soldiers was a re dangerous than being on the narrowest of margin.Penrod hung back.

"No "He said"Under no conditions will I go with them.I'd rather remain a prisoner.I'll kill myself first."

"But it is against our law to retain you when you are exchanged."said general Harrison."so you must choose your liberty to go with them, or permit them to come and take you by force."

Suddenly to his surprise and joyPenrod saw general Jack Evans with the vivian girl girls approaching, and at once whirled away from the aide-decamp.

At this moment he saw the capt ian general and the vivian girls hasten their pace.A moment later the guardian of the vivian girls was gazing down at the pale face of what appeared to him to be a breathless Glandelinian boyscout of foreign type, who spoke to him rapidly in the spanish Abbinannian tongue, and in such a manner that he was compelled to pause and listen.

"Your Excellency"he was saying."he tall one a with the short one among the Zimmermanians are Professional spies.They trapped me once in placing me in an attic with Rattlesnakes.They are trying to trap me again by having me exchanged into the rebel lines.My name is Marco Schoefiled Marcocian Penrod.sir may I beg you to protect me as the Esperor asks you to protect the vivian girls!"

He said it low and fast.No one else but the general and those with him could hear his words.The vivian girls looked at the boy closely, and then the prettiest of them said something to Evans:

"I know him.He is Penrod."

"What , what did you say!" exclaimed general Evans,.And then she stepped to Penrods side, placing her hand gently in his, and said with perfect distinctiveness:

"Listen all of you.He is not to be exchanged.He is telling the truth.This is general Greathearts adopted son Schoefiled Penrod.There is base treachery afoot.I demand them to two spies and the whole bunch of zimmermanians as prisoners.Release the other boy scout."

Now it was evident that Penrods prayer had been answered.Penrod saw a strange look in the generals eye notwithstanding that he turned to stare at the Mutt and Jeff like character at the head of the Zimmermanians as if they only concerned him.

"What did you say?What did you say?"he said again and made a swift movement toard them, drawing out one of his revolvers as he did so.

...violet laid with a purpidicous

The n Penrod and even the ,ivian Girls, that is ,iolet and her sisters observe observed that even a most curious thing happened.he tall man saw general general Jack Evans approaching him, saw him draw his gun, nd at that instant his proud smile died away from his face, and his countenance turned quite crimson-- so crimson thatunder the brilliant glare of the camp fire he was almost likened to a large lobster, and scarcely looked like a h human being at all.He made a sign to his small companion and slippedthrough the crowd of Zimmermannians two two sli. slippert ells.He himself was a tall slim flexible soldier with the almost exact face and form of ,ugusta ,utt in the comics of the Chocago Daily News, and made,s made a disappearance that was most wonderful in its rapidity, than ever seen befor before.Between the stout Zimmermannian soldier s, and thin or stout Nationals grouped about he made his way and lost n himself, but always making his way ward the rear.In two moments there was no sight of the spy to be seen.He apparently was g ne and so was his'' Jeff'' companion.From the looks of things now it was plain to Penrod that to follow the profession of a spy on both sides was a most dangerous thing. The general had even recognized them as persons he knew well, they had recognized the general, who was ferociously angry.His face had the ugly expression of a real bulldog, and he shouted to general Harrison;

''there has been treachery here on the part of the glandelinians to secure general greatheart.s son and most important boy scout Bo`oefield Penrod the boy here.Retain the rebel soldiers for investigation.Free Walter Starring. the ,immermannians are prisoners for tretrenchery.''

General Herros Harrison gave the or er to his own men and Evans then spoke to one of his officers;

' He and his small companion are two of the most dangerous rebel spies of all glandelinia.he tall man is a scoodler, and the small one a ,ic-Hollestinian.What they wanted of this innocent lad I don't pretend to know.What did they threaten?' 'He asked of Penrod.

Penrod was feeling rather cold and sick over his experience, and had lost his healthy color for the moment.

''They tried to have me exchanged into the enemy's lines.They made your officers believe that I was a glandelinian boy scout and caused me to be arrested by your brother Colonel Evans.''He a. answered.'',he spies believe I know something that I do not.''I hen

,hen general Jack Evans realized where he had recieved the package sent by general Kindermine nor ,ic Cantler,.he general went tward the entrance door of his headquarters, but he did it with his hand on Penrod's shoulder.he vivi n ivian girls followed.

''ees th .that he get's back to his boy companion softly.''he said it to an officers.''Send a strong escort with him.He i s t oo young to be attacked by creatures of that kind(you are losing your mind).I've ordered the pickets and sentries to hold any one found leaving the camp.''''''''

Polite young Angelinian officers of n any renk love to obey the command of their generals, Lords, Counts, and such dignitaries of an immense Empire.

CHAPTER TWENTI THR..

PENROD TELL'S HIS COMPANION A STORY.

THIS ONE WITHOUT any difficulty found a willing squad who marched with Penrod throu l general Evans's cor and to the boys own lodging.These soldiers were stolid young I nipoligonlians and seemed to have no curiousity or even the slightest interest in the reason for the command given them.Some of these very soldiers were in fact either thinking of their sweethearts who lived in Abbie-and n o or of their wives and little children they had left far at home.they scarcely gave a glance at Penrod they were to escort, they neither knew or wondered why.The Rattlesnake boy had just returned to the place he lodged. but was aroused by Penrod,who just came into the room.

''did you sneak in' i d you get in near enough'And what kept you so long.'You were gone three days''He said it.

''Yes indeed''said Penrod'' got near enough alright.''

The Rattlesnake boy stood up straight suddenly.

''It has not been an easy effort for you.''He exclaimed.''I'm sure something happened to you.Something went wrong because you were gone so long.''

Penrod related to the Rattlesnake boy of the manner of how he had been arrested by general Aby Evans Ab saintkilians at being accused by a rebel spy of being a glandelinian boy scout, and the circumstances that led to the capture, recounted the plans he had laid for his escape, t prevent him being exhausted, his reception by the Scoolders, and the capture of a little girl by them, and finally the rescue from a horrible death, and his identification by the Vivian girls, all to which thebrave Rattlesnake boy listened attentively, but with a puzzling frow.''so you see something nearly went wrong-------very ne ne rl at that.''Thenlared Penrod.

''I ought to surely have gone with you.''said the Rattlesnake boy.''I see now where my duty lies'Any one who acts as an aide-de-camp must always be in at attendance.It would have reall frustrated the spy.''Needless to say I am overjoyed to see you safely at home again, that you have returned none the worse with your experience.Hereafter I must always be near to watch, even if I am not close by you.''My god if you had not comeback at all---if you had not returned.'' he struck his clenched fists fiercely together.''What should I have done?''

When Penrod turned tward him from the bed he was lying on he looked like general Greatheart.

''It would be your duty to go on with the mission intrusted to us by gener al Greatheart.''He said.''It would be your duty to go on with it as far as you could.You could not leave off on it now.You remember the places as well as I do, the faces of the particular ones, and the Secret Signal.there is some peril more or less but I am now you are better experiences experienced with the work ever better than I am and when you face untie untimely peril you could prove yourself worthy of the name the glandelinians call you.You have not had to do it yet as long as I knew you if you had done so before.Yet as long as I have been with you, but the time will come when you will did it.You could haveeven done it now if you had been obliged to.But the work we are doing will have to continue as before.''''''''

The Rattlesnake boy was surprised as at these words, and he caught at his strong little breast as if he had been struck speechless with one astonishment.

''go all that without you as comp companion''he ,nswed.''without even our leaving once!!!!!!!!!!!!!!

[illegible] when they heard this [illegible] violet said with a pugnacious

"Yes indeed" answered Penrod. "And as we think of it now we must make our plans for there is no telling what might happen....."

Penrod suddenly stood up, stopped speaking and looked straight before him, as if he saw something very peculiar far away.

"Nothing will happen to us, and nothing ever can," he said it.

"What in the world are you thinking of" gulped the Rattlesnake boy because h s his breath had not quite come back. "How do you know that nothing can happen!"

"Because--" at this moment Penrod spoke in almost a matter of fact tone even in quite an unexalted tone at all events------"or you see I can always make a strong plea to go God as I did then."

"Did you shout the plea for help!" asked the R ttlesnake boy. "I did not know you Canadians shouted your prayers."

"No I didn't shout. I did not even shout my prayers or say them aloud. But I prayed inwardly." Penrod touched himself on his breast. "I called out to God, help, help, with all the strength of my heart. And god sent me the help at the proper time."

The Rattlesnake regarded his friend in a dubod dubious manner.

"What kind of prayers did you say!" he asked.

"I just called for help" he answered "I appealed to the power of God, to him that does all things. The bible declare he said while on earth "Ask and you shall recieve. Knock, and it shall be opened unto you."

A reluctant suspicion betrayed itself in the Rattlesnakes eyes.

"Do you mean you belong to the Christian science." he inquired with a slight touch of disfavor in his voice.

Penrods eyes remained fixed upon him in vague thoughtfulness for a moment or so of pause.

"I don't think I am." he said at last. "Perhaps itsthe same thing, but I'm a Cat holic. But for all that I may have prayed in the same fashion. But it was not in words, it was a strong call from my heart. I remember some important prayers I said, when I faced my first peril during the war."

The Rattlesnake boy moved in a restless manner.

"Well the help came to you that time." He admitted. "How did it come to-night!"

"From the prayers I said before the spy caused my arrest by the Abbiesanninns from his lips. To night it almost came like lightning. All at once I knew that if I ran to general Jack Evans, and told him of the spies, the vivian girl Princesses who were with him, would recognize me despite my disguise, it would startle him into listening to me, and then they would tell him wo who I was, and at their word, the general would know I was speaking the tru truth and protect me from being exchanged into the rebel lines."

"It was a splendid thought indeed." the Rattlesnake boy said. "And it was very quickly done. But it was God who really helped you out and no one else."

"All thinking at that" said Penrod slowly. "The Vivian girls did a part of it. I know it. That happened two days after the prayer was said. I trust the vivian girls more than I would any of the Angelinians. To my way of thinking, we boys are like persons trying to mend a long steel bridge without knowing how. But if we try hard we could lean learn how to do it sometime." then he added hastily; "I am only telling you what many of the Angelinians have been telling me, and they had told me of what they had done."

"Did you ever have any serious experience with the enemy since you entered the army!" "!!!!!!!"

The Rattlesnake boy had become bewildered, restless, and eager.

"Yes I did. Ever since then I have always thought of it. I was very calm, and myway of knowing well how to wait, is what saved me."

"Was that the reason!" said the Rattlesnake boy. "and was that the reason why!" and indeed there was awe in his voice because of this unknown experience, and if there was any achievement really possible he hoped it would be in it.

[illegible] with the [illegible]

"I believe there has been." said Penrod. "D don't you think so yourself sometimes!"

"It may have been something like that." exclaimed the Rattlesnake boy. Then he seemed to be thinking things over before he spoke again, and then even more slowly than Penrod.

"If we could only have learned now hunted of boys." he said in a low whisper "we could find out who the Vivian girls really are. There is a sort of mystery about them. Then from that reason we would know what to do for Abbiesanninns cause."

He gave a start as he ended these words and his whole face glowed with a new hope and light.

"Perhaps we can find out if we really try" he cried. "If god will hep help us like he did f [illegible] right all will be well. We---- just we two every day boys--- are part of all this any how."

"But the experience." he as Penrod.

"Look here, look here." broke in the Rattlesnake boy. "Tell me the whole story from beginning to end. I want to hear it every bit."

It was because it had something very vital in it, that the rattlesnake boy had become so excited. His very lien noire upon the [illegible] imagination as if it would be have saiely [illegible] one great theory of masterpiece that would prove true. The Rattlesnake boy sat with his elbows between his knees and his hair in his bushy hair, while being propped up on his bed, he leaned forward twisting a look with very restless fingers. Even his phrase was quickening.

"Please tell me the whole story." he said. "I want to hear it all."

"Well then I shall have to tell it in my own words." said Penrod. "and it won't be as wonderful as it was when I actually had the experience. But I can remember only this."

"I went out on a mission for general vivian few weeks before the battle of Corrin's Bridge began. Our that bridge I was suddenly attacked by the Glandelinian soldiers known as the Conservatives from an ambush. I escaped them after shooting down a do e dozen of them, but one of them hurled a hand grenade which though exploding twenty yards in front of me wounded I me somewhat seriously. Though I successfully reached some shelter, I went throu h much pain and trouble. I was in great peril but I managed to keep myself hidden from my relentless persuers though from the critical condition of my wound, I a expected I would die, before I ever regained the christian lines. I remained in that place for nearly two da s days without food, forced to take care of my own wounds, and I never knew when when I would recover enough to be able to resume my own way back alone.

And a great load was upon me when I was able for no christian camp was in sight. From information obtained from the persons who gab gave me some food and shelter I learned the main armies had moved forward toward the earthworks of Lie hburg Loading having been obliged to go there to poppose the advance of Manleys great armies which were coming with the purpose to strike general Mansion a blow to release the besieged at vivian ickey, and no one knew what was going, to occur. I followed in that direction to find my way to general general Greatheart's army b t I lost m way and was persued by rebel s cutting parties for weeks, from one place to another. However I found some kind Calverinian peasants who sheltered me, but one of my wounds had become infected and from that I became so seriously Ill that I almost died. The doctor who attended me though I was dead, but nevertheless I hard heard the distant cannon thundering, and the howling and ear splitting crash of shells and shrapnell far over head.

Through all the hours that I was barely alive, I was barely alive to be conscious of two things, all the rest of me seemed to be gone from my body, I knew that [illegible] work was not finished, and [illegible] could hear the shells scream, and the artillery roar in and thune thunderings.

"Was it the work for Abbiesanninns!" the Rattlesnake boy put in quickly "If you had died that night I would never had you as a friend, never." the Rattlesnake boy bit his lips so hard that a blood or drop of blood started from it.

[illegible] when they heard this [illegible] violet said with a pugnacious

"When I was slowly recovering again one of the old peasants little kids, a little boy who had mostly waited upon me, told me that near the location of Sumbeam Creek not far from Delights junction, was stationed the extreme right wing of the christian line under general Concentinian Aronburg, and that general Handonin Greathearts divisions may be near there.Near that region however about ten miles away there was an abrupt bend in the creek heavily forested,which for miles was held by general Shields Scoudlers.Near this same point there was a small hut, in which general Shields took up his headquarters and had been there all the time that Manleys army had entrenched.The whole family of the old peasant declared that every one knew him and his force, though few matin Nationals had ever seen him.They said that a roaring lion, or a man eating tiger was tame compared to these _landelinians.

"That's no lie.."said the Rattlesnake boy promptly"the vivian girls say they are the fiercest and most treacherious of the Ommnians.They got the name also from being so two faced."

Penrod neither laughed or frowned.

"How dod we know, and how do they know."He said."every one else has a opinion that this sect i is the fiercest and that and so on.every one else says the mounted Gargoylian gurds are the fiercest of all the glandelinians, and their truth might be better than anything.I don't say it is false, or true.I listened to all that was told me by the peasants.They said general Shields was a most dreadful man to oppose.He knew all the things the christian generals were planning and could frustrate all their movements.but even the best of all christian spies, the Secret Gemini were afraid to go near him or p."

"I'd like to have seen---the rattlesnake boy pondered aloud, but he did not finish.

"Before I was entirely well I made up my mind to find my way to general great-hearts army at any risk.I felt as if I must go for duty's sake, and I thought that if I did not recover from my wounds and if I really was going to die, I must die within the christianlines, or that I might tell my friends some wise thing to do for Abbie-annia.

"You might have had time to make out a message to gi be given to the Secret Gemini ."said the Rattlesnake boy.

"I felt so weak when I started out on my journey that for a time I did not think I would not be able to reach general Greathearts camp, and the worse of it was, I did not know the distance, or the direction of his positions.Part o of the way I traveled on a horse, and part walked on foot.But at last I came to a point within a half the distance of the small village of Zemon-Castopolis thirty eight weight miles north east of Krahl junction which is te miles away from Mic-Whirther Janet.Here I found I could go no further, because of an immense flood - probably caused by the enemy,,owever as I had traveled slowly and I had become more stronger though a little weak, I decided to make the attempt to go through a portion of the Mic-Hollester woods.This forest as we all know is the most wonderful forest in the world, winter or summer.there are all kinds of beautiful trees, oak, hemlock, pine or evergreen, and trees with foliage like lace lace and some of the pine trees seemed to reach the heavens,sometimes I could barely see glimps of blue sky between them.

And even long vines swung down from their high branches and ran at each other and mixed together and there were in the summer very hot scents and strange beautiful flowers, and countless dazzling birds darting about, and think green moss and little cascades bursting out.I found a way through a narrow path, and the flower scents and the sultriness of the atmosphere made it seem as if I was walking in a hot house.

Sometimes when I had trouble in the undergrowth I was startled at taking it may have been made by a Glandelinians hiding in ambush, but it was made by some kind of wild animal instead.

CHAPTER TWENTY FOUR.

But it was only a small small deer and it did not hurt me.However I felt sure I would become lost in the woods and would never reach the christian lines, but for some strange reason I believed I would.I was compelled to stop and rest myself many times and if I was able to secure fresh water for my canteen, I considered myself very fortunate friend.The further I traveled the more wonderful everything became.All these nights began to be filled with strange feelings.I felt as if I was no longer tired, and also I began to feel very light and frolicsome. And it seemed as if a load was suddenly lifted from my heart and also as if it was not very long, ago which belonged to something stronger.

Even Abbie-annia's cause seemed safe and that she was going to win the war in the long run.Yet I went onward and onward and looked all around me for any of unseen enemies, but it appeared as if all my experiences were dreams, and only a dream, I had suddenly awakened from, only a dream."

The Rattlesnake boy moved in a reckless manner.

"Perhaps you had a fever and it made you light hearted."he suggested.

"The fever had left me and also my weakness."Answered Penrod."It seemed to me as if I had not been ill at all, as if no one could be ill, because in that beautiful forest it seemed as if I were traveling through the borders of Heaven, and had left the world behind forever."

"I wish I had been with you then, perhaps I would have been able to know what happened me then."said the Rattlesnake boy sighed."I even feel as if I am there now.go on with the story."

For a few moments Penrod had become unaware of more than the Rattlesnakeboy he even having lost himself in the memories of the story, and was living his experiences all over again.

"Despite it all I felt as if I was followed or trailed by unseen foes."Penrod continued."I felt as if _landelinians were trailing me from all directions, and while I was breathing in the hot yet sweet flower scents, I saw a movement among the big leaves and giant weeds as if they were pushed aside by some persons.I felt nervious, and to make matters worse I had no weapons.There had earlier in the morning been a severe thunderstorm, and all the growth were wet and shining with big dew drops like jolm jewels that showered over me as I myself thrust my through and under them.

It was terribly stillaed yet I was sure I was facing some unseen peril.I can make the story as things seem to me.I simply can. I was there all alone in that wood, pursued by probable enemies.If I had been only stalked by some wild beast I would have felt better.But I was sure that unseen glandelinians were stealthil stealthily creeping upon me, and at this time I was unarmed.And yet it was so still and beautiful and so terrible, even that with facing the unseen foe, I could scarcely bar it from my mind at all.If I had only fancied it.but the truth was it was all too real.for glandelinians while hearing the selves hidden were creeping upon me like american Indians!"

Indeed the fact was that Penrod with his strange vivid story and vivid boy touch, had sadly carried his young hearer to the furthest interest.The Rattlesnake boy was so quiet, that some would have believed he was dead.His eyes did not move and when he did speak he spoke almost as if he already were in a trance.

"I felt as if I'm there myself."he said"I'm the same unseen peril as you-------- ------ go on with the story,-----go on---- go on.I want to hear more."

And Penrod understanding the Rattlesnake boys desire went on.

"I rested there in the forest already for fully twelve hours, the day was over, the stars were out, when I removed a large open glen.purple all that time I was in not colored at all.For in the distance I could see our fires, were ones so intense in cause that I could not look away from them I was so fascinated.They appeared to be on my forest fires a many miles away.The seemed to be drawn me toward them, and all over head was like violet velvet though the far distant forest fires covered the horizon skies with a gold and crimson.

[illegible] when they heard this
[illegible] Violet said with a pugnacious

The view of the distant conflagration or whatever it really was was awful and yet grand and magnificent beyond description and compar anion whatever that means.Sometimes the whole region far far away looked like an ocean of flames and smoke as the fiery waves rose and fell throughout its whi whole extent.Can you see the fires in your imaginations?surely you must see them or you may be bli d blind.I saw them all night long.They to me were a part of the wonders of the war. ''''''

I ''I see the forest fires.'' answered the Rattlesnake boy still in his trance like voice and without a i stirring, and Penrod knew he did.

''And there were huge forest fires glowing in the distance.I then observed thirty soldiers following near from be behind.They were lava lavendar uniforms of the Angelinians, but their faces were fierce and distorted, and their eyes belied the evil disposition of the ferocious Amorca canians.And there was no friendly person there.Brave as I was I was scared almost to death.If I had been armed I would need havone fourof them.The truth was apparent. To climb u n To climb up a tree was no use.They would have brought me down with a volley.To escape I saw I must humor them.Further on outside of the opn there was a large deep pool.Not farfrom the where edge was a large row boat with two oars inside inside.It was very fortunate for me that I was close to the waters edge.I first stooped down and pretended to bathe my face there.Then noticing my persuers quite a distance from me I slowly went tward the boat, hopped in, and not waiting a moment picked up the oars and partly l ing down worked the so the boat slowly glided into the war water.

As the boat swept through the water I thought I saw Glandelinians appear on the opposite shore.This caused me to hesitate.I did not know how long I hesitated but soon I heard the loud reports of rifles, and bullets whistled uncomfortably close to me.But at last I started rowing as if I had been commanded to do it. And now I was realizing I was not alone in the woods any more.I was evidently surrounded by enemies.A hundred yards or so away from the edge of the lake, appeared a a all column of horsemen wearing gray uniforms.I feared from the form of the garb, that they may be Gargoylium Kurds, because their very appearance was a tirely different from any Glandelinians outside of them I have ever seen.I'll te l lyou the truth when I say I was terribly scared.Yet I kept good control over myself.The shadows of a cloudy night had now fallen, the air was still and close and as deep as the shadows were the woods or the blackness of the woods was like erebus.

far away in another direction opposite the direction of the distant forest fire was a ge strange moving light.And not being able to see my skulking enemies now I felt still more terrified.

''What did you do at that moment?'' asked the Rattlesnake boy in a ma, hoarse voice.

''I allowed the boat to drift to the middle of the lake.I did not dare to ri e on the seat for fear of being shot down in the dark.I felt like a murderer down when awaiting his death.I was even without food, and as hungry and as sleepy as I was I did not dare land on any shore of the lake, and I did not dare move inside the boat or spe k even in a whisper.I only laid down in the centre of the boat letting it drift as it will, while I kept my eyes on the shadows along the shore of the lake.When I had been still for less than a quarter of an hour I saw a shado shadowy form from the shore make a kind of ge gesture tward the center of the lake.

I had remained perfectly still for all that time I kept my eyes peeled in every direction and I thought I heard sounds of some unseen objects moving in the water several yards from me.I picked up my oar preparing to strike at the first foe.Yet nothing approached the boat then... I heard someone shout on the shore;;

''I cannot th tell theseo all these wouldst know about the fumnitives.That is seemdeengs I may notting be able to did.But keep a sharp look on the outs for hee heem.Heem somewhere bout here on the thing a e she call she beautiful lakee in a in a boat she row mit.''

CHAPTER TWENTY FOUR.

And he had a wonderful loud voice(too loud to be pleasant) like a deep soft bell.I remained out in the middle of the lake through the whole night.The storm clouds had cleared away after letting down a short heavy shower which drenched me and the stars came out.Toward morning just before it grew light, there was sounds in the water as if some one were pulling a boat through it.I again had m my oar in readiness but the sound went on, and on, and passed out of hearing altogether.''

''Did you pray then!'' the Rattlesnake boy broke in.

''Yes indeed I did, but it seemed as if only a miracle would have saved me then. As I lay there I saw flaring rockets, and then from somewhere in the darkness, I heard mysterious words.''

''What were the words!''asked the Rattlesnake boy.

''There were quite a few which I wrote down and learned by heart.I'll try to say them as I wrote them, while listening''and Penrod covered his eyes, and waited through a moment of so silence.And it seemed to the Rattlesnake boy as if there was an extraordinary silence in the room.

''Listen''came next''These are the words;;

''Vivian wickey, and all her surrounding fortifications are like a myriads of immense word worlds.There is but one secret way the besiegers can capture this ornermous titan but it will not be revealed.It's strength nothing can swerve. Its defenses are free to chose from capture.They can create disorder for the whole world, which in itself is Pain, and woe, and hate, and a fear. The greatest fortresses are on the opposite shore near the mouth of the Norman Cun River. Cold thyself within view of it, and you can understand its strength clearly.first with all thy knowledge know only one thing, that fortresses St Phillip, and St Andrew are the ones considered, that could hold all the nations at bay---destroy their most powerful fleets, where they attack,-------are the ones that could hold the whole world back.''

''What'?'!''gasped The Rattlesnake boy.''Those two fortresses only!''

''Yes that is what I heard him say while I lay in that boat.''

''You are giving me the jim jams.''

''Well I say he said it.''answered Penrod.''And it was then he spoke of a secret passage underground running from Calvarine to vivian Wickey.And it has connections with those two greatest fortresses in the world, that in all their different galleries, the besieged can secretly obtain supplies, provisions, ammunition, and reinforcements and new generals and so on from Calvarine and also from Jennie Cun Turner.And he said that was why vivian wickey was holding out so successfully against several Mansions monsterous besieging armies.And he said if it continues longer suffering to other christian nations will come, proverty, misery, and catastrophe.''

''Catastrophe!'' said the Rattlesnake boy sharply.''Do you mean to say the whole world would suffer because of the seige of Vivian wickey?There are our own big armies, and defenses?What about Ohio-annia.''''''

''I overheard that too.And this is what they were.I wrote them down too and learned them by heart.'Let me think again.''

And Penrod waited as he had waited before.Then he lifted his head.

''Listen these are thewords.If the seige of Vivian wicket lasts a few more months there will be throughout the world an outpouring of the greatest human mise misery, and the greatest disorders caused by the failure of every food product, and materials to jump sky high in prices.When that begins man will learn that he will be deprived of all that his heart most or least desires.He will stand aloft, and behold world wide devastation.''

''Wou world wide devastation and tenoliation.''The Rattlesnake boy said.''Out-pouring of human misery, and lack of christian joys for children.I don't can't believe it!''

''No one does.''said Penrod.''We don' know.nobody does.It's only what I over-heard while lying in the bottom of that boat in the dark of the night, and did not stir then.''.''.''''At ___M

''I don't believe a word of it''...sia said the Rattlesnake boy. ''It's too fabulous.It's even ...a said by the ...landelinians, and all nations of the world, that all Heaven h elping us could capture ...ivian ...ickey in ten years.And that statement was backed by the world.''
Penrod did not say whether he said he believed such things or not .He only went on speaking.
''When morning approached I recieved such a surprise that I felt as if I had stopped breathing...he air was very still, thestillness of a dead calm.The shores of the lake was encompassed by a large encircling camp.What camp it was I couldn't tell, because no flags were flying...he canvas of the tents were the color of those used by Arabians, and therefore as they were unlike those of the enemy, and not like the christians either, I took my chances and landed on the shore.Immediately after I landed there was a rustling of the underbrush a few score of feet away as if something big and powerful was pushing its way through, and there was the sound of many feet.I turned my head and saw something to that made me jump back.I felt as if I had faced a huge leopard I would have been safer.It looked likesome one, like my foolish self had ran into a disguised ...landelinian camp with strangely camouflagged tents.Near a tree however stood a rifle which I suddenly grabbed, and covering the surprised rebels I backed into a clearing, and then seeing myself free of them, ran through the woods like a deer, with a score of cursing Insurgents after me.''
''You say you escaped them so easily!''...cried out the rattlesnake boy.''You mean you were surrounded by the rebels and yet got away!''
''Yes ...what I had seized, was a double barrelled repeating rifle.The few insurgents who had surprised me dared not face that gun.They knew I meant to do as I threatened and allowed me to make my escape.Through that means I escaped capture from the ...io-...ollestinians.''
The rattlesnake boy had reached deep water.He leaned forward...ui s hands were burrowed into his hair his face was covered with a fierce scowl, and his eyes were boring into space.He felt as if he was with Penrod.He imagined he had seen the luminious immensity of the distant forest fires, and he had looked into the nightly shawods of the deep darkened woods.Was there some remote deep in him from whose darkness a slow and bright light was rising rising. ...ll that Penrod had said he knew must be true.But the rest of it.Penrod got up and came over to him.He looked like gener l general Greatheart again.
''If a general should come who captures ...ivian ...ickey he will make great Fame for himself.It is for that man the whole world is looking for.''
''But who will be the one to do it--- who will be the general---and when will he be found!''cried the Rattlesnake boy.''...nd who will find him!''
''He aven only knows who he would be.Some say Emperor ...ivian would.Others claim it would be general Hansion.I had asked general Greatheart and he said it may be general ...kinderhine, or that it may be general Hanson ...ivian or ...mperor Hanson ...ivian, or general Henry Gale, or Concentinian Aronburg.Who ever it would be through one of them the whole world would come to know him as the greatest hero of all times, and as the cleverest of all the generals.''
Never had the Rattlesnake boy looked so strange and fierce a thing as he did now. That a whole world of nations could be held at bay by the two ...ortresses of St Andrew and St Phillpip.No hope then--- because of the other fortresses, of ever capturing ...ivian ...ickey.It made him feel sick andcyet----something sat his chest heaving.
''...nd yet the world looks for the coming og some great ...general or leader, who will have knowledge and power engou enough to capture ...ivian ...ickey''Mlaughed the rattlesnake boy scornfully.''Even Emperor ...ivian is foolish enough to believe that!''
''Yes indeed.''...nswered Penrod.He said nothing'' but ''...es indeed(you are in need but ''yes indeed.''
The rattlesnake boy then threw himself forward on his bed face downward.
''...hen he said''If those two fortresses alone can hold the world at bay, and ...ivian ...ickey has many other fort resses defending her besides, then it is utterly utterly impossible to capture ...ivian ...ickey by human means...od alone can do it and no one else.''..''...

CHAPTER TWENTY FOUR.

EXPLOSION DISASTER NEAR BIG GIRLKNOOL.

At this moment the two boys heard some one coming up the stairs and when the man reached the landing he stopped at their door...hen he knocked heavily on it. ...hen Penrod opened the door, the same Abbisannian soldier who had escorted him home was standing outside.He looked very uninterested and soli so stolid and he handed Penrod a small envelope as he said;
''General Evans said you must have dropped this by Jennie ...ivian one of the Princesse's, while you was standing at his side.''He said it.''He gave me orders to see that it was given into your own hands.It must ha e been a letter you lost there.''
After he had gone down the stair case again, Penrod and the Rattlesnake boy drew a quick breath at one at the same time.
''I had not dropped this by the ...ivian girl, and I had no letter.''S i said Penrod.''Let us open it.''
In the envelope was a large paper folded tightly.When he opened it out...he saw an extra paper on which were the photographs of the tall ...landelinian ...overnmental agent and his ''Jeff'' like companion.On the large paper were printed a few words in Abbisannian which stated that they were the well known Professional ...landelinian spies, Francis Pedro the tall man, and Christie,Mr Nerovfanis and that the bearer...must be protected against them.The papers were signed by every one of the ...ivian ...irls themselves.On the bottom of the photographed sheet was written the command;

''CARRY THESE WITH YOU AS PROTECTION, AS THEY HAD ESCAPED...''

''That is help from god.''said the Rattlesnake boy. ''It would protect us only however within the christian lines, and cities in possession of the nationals. The ...ivian ...irls really sent it but you said the prayers, and they have been answered.''
There was no moonlight to shine into their windows when they ...etiredthat night. Before going to bed Penrod shot up the blinds.The last thing each of them saw as they went to sleep was the stars.shining in a late December sky, and in his dreams Penrod saw the beautiful ...ivian ...irl princesses smiling at him in loving friendship and he imagined they approached him, two of them took him by the hand and almost compelled him to follow them to their fathers tent, and there shared their blessed company for a full day.some time later in the war his dream really came true in a way greater th n than he ever ed expected.
The Rattlesnake boy also had a dream...he stars in the sky seemed to grow larger and hang lim like lamps of radiance against the violet vevolvet sky, above ...ivian ...ickey where he listened to loud shouts of!!!!!
''VIVIAN WICKEY HAS FALLEN AT LAST. GOD BE PRAISED!''

THE next morning Penrod was standing on a hill in the midst of a great forest plain within a full sight of the ...ic-Whirthian section of ...ivian ...ickey around which the distant heights of w Evan Evangelinia loomed and loomed and smoked. .. Penrod from that great distance was looking up into the upper section of the ...orth branch portion of the venerable fort ress called Thumbelinia or Maya, a ...ort ress formidable and more tea tiful than anything he had ever seen in his life.
Penrod looked long and closely at the great Calverinian plains and wooded stretch of country situated before it with its wide spread beauties of snow covered meadow land and wood, and ruined buildings gathered about devastated farmlands and believed it would be a marvel of medie al picturequeness for a grand and bloody battle.And in the distance on the western border of this plain rise the low breastwork walls of the great land fortress, and surrounding it at a stealy distance stood u guard the gigantic majesty of other earthworks ...arty feet high, which were supported by the heaviest guns and batements be...ong beyo nd them...urther on to his left he could see smoke clouds of almost snow whiteness and whose unchanging thickness seemed to give warning of some dreadful smouldering fire somewhere.And on the top of the hill which Penrod stood like an encircling serpent that holds its victim in its embrace or as though it enclosed some very valuable treasure, stood an enormous encampment, also fortified, extending like a great city of houses and tents for miles, and above it all in the distance towered the extensive Maya or Thumbelinia fortress built as a citadel of the worlds, to defy the worlds, the greatest on earth.It was as it appeared impossible for an assaulting army of any immense size to approach it without cover.This fortress had an extent of five miles, and as far as he could see on one side of the fortress only Penrod slowly counted fifteen hundred big guns.

Penrod at first had a full overpowering overcowering desire to approach the fortress, to walk through its Galleries or on its battlements, or through the streets of its vast encircling encampments or the broad calm empty looking ones, or the narrow throughoughfares whose tents were so near to each other, to climb the walls or cross its bridges from one wall to another, or from barrack to barrack, or step out on one of the gun b l balconies, to look at the distant sections.

Yet it seemed impossible.Even from the hill he could see the glandelinian flags fluttering on the battlements on the immense citadel of Maya.Yet it was to this immense citan that the two boys were to be sent next, because at fortress Maya was to be found the or one of the disguised supreme Persons of the Gemini who was dressed and looked like a Gargoylian kurd, and who pretended to be a child slave master and owner.Strange as it indeed did seem to him both boys were to carry a certain warning at once.

''there may be fierce turneramnians who come to see him to sell him little sleves, soldiers who have them and want to get rid i of them.''he Rattlesnake boy worked it out''nd he can speak to the rebel officers when they are standing close to him.If we only had a child slave with us it would be easy to get near him.We could go and pretend to sell the slave.''

The journey from the hill to those fortifications was not as long as the boys had feared it would be and during the latter part of the day they had the journey through deep snow on horseback and great cold weather near thirty below or further.

To Penrod the fortifications were long known world wonders which being now very sun sublime their fame could never grow old.they had ever since they were erected stood against a hundred seiges,, and had now since the beginning of this seige stood against the worse attacks without any loss at all to its immense garrison.It was the same with all the fortifications of vivian vickey which had been built by the Abbiammians and which had taken nearly six sixty years to finish, and which cost hundreds of thousands of dollars in materials alone. surely they were the strongest in the world.

CHAPTER TWENTY FOUR.

EXPLOSION DISASTER NEAR BIG GIRLKNOOL.

part TWO OF CHAPTER TWENTY THREE.

THEIR ADVENTURE INSIDE OF FORTRESS THUMBELINIA OR IT'S CAMP.
THE EXPERIENCE DURING THEIR TRAVEL THROUGH A BLINDING BLIZZARD... THE HURRICANE..

IT SURELY THEY HAD BEEN begun since the year of Eighteen fourty one or 1 earlier. The whole world had been so surprised to find them there.They were just now while the two boys so stood there, very silent and yet it did seem as if they were saying some amazing thing, something that would take the breath away from every one if they could hear it.

And never had they been chosen during desperate bombardments the immense clouds of smoke changed, they wreathed the fortress, and hid them and trailed down them for months, rows upon rows of christian men poured out storming torrents of shells and high explosions on them, great onslaughts of christian infantry had thundered a min t them, and darted volcano of flame and din around them.But the fortress stood there afterwards as if such things as attacks and bombardments had not been, and were not in the world.scores of fierce assaults had roared and tore at them, great earth shaking explosions banged with earsplitting crashes above and around them, millions of lives seemed in danger, and there they stood and perhaps their secret was that they would never be injured.

That was what Penrod thought, and was why he did not want to talk much, but gazed at fortress Maya as he rode on.

The Rattlesnake boy had been very silent all the time.He had been silent when he arose from bed, and he had scarcely spoken when they made their way toward the outer limits of the christian lines.It seemed to Penrod that he was thinking so hard that he was like a boy who was far away from the hill he stood on.His eye brows were drawn closely together, and his fierce eyes did not seem to observe the Maya fortifications.Usually the Rattlesnake boy saw everything and made very shrewd remarks on almost all rebel positions and fortifications he saw.But to day he was somehow absorbed in different objects.

He sat on his horse, like a statue and stared about.He moved in his saddle and gasped when he found himself staring at the great Maya fortifications, but afterwards he was ever so strange that he appeared very queer to Penrod.It was not until they had come to within a mile of it that he spoke, and he did it without turning his head.

''you only told me what the man said about the two fortifications of St Andrew, and St Phillip.''he said.''if he say anything about the other ones?''

Penrod brought himself back from his idea of reaching the highest limits of the Maya fortifications and seeing the ground far beneath his feet.He had to come back a very, very long way.

''Are you still thinking of that?''Indeed I was wondering what you had been thinking of all this ornin.''he said.

''About the others?'' said the Rattlesnake boy, but he even did not turn his head then.

''They are called the pic-Whithian fortifications.I am not even allow to name them all.''said Penrod.''I am not even allowed to name them all.However did not hear that.'' ''Yes.'' ''It was just like the ordering of uncommon things--the small things most of the Abbiamians think don't matter as well as the bigger events.I always remembered that saying without any trouble.This it was;

''he' see' through thy mind on son that all the fortifications surrounding vivian victor can hold a world full of nations at bay despite all the war materials they bring to bar bear.If all these with the hol. of the Universe would besiege vivian ickey, they would not cause its fall or surrender within ten years.This is what proud Abbiamnia created against herself.''

[illegible] when they heard this
[illegible] violet said with a pernicious

Then the Rattlesnake boy turned suddenly round.He had a shrewdly reasoning mind. ''That sounds as if our cause will never win then, not even in the long run, if you think about it long enough and in the right way''He said.''But perhaps it's on only a false report, there's no meaning to it.If it is true the child slaves will only be free when they're dead or ransomed.My general used to shout with laughter when some one told him that Vivian Wickey could not be re-captured.''

He hugged himself for a few minutes because he felt cold.He was remembering the loss of his boy scout force during the battle of Delight's Junction.He had been in service during this terrific battle, and did not forget the loud hedious uproar.

''What if some onewished for a sin something that would bring immediate ruin upon the Glandelinians''he said next.'' h what if you hate t e Glandelinians from your heart, and wished you could kill the all, not give them any quarter either their women and children!''!''

''T hat is a question that any good priestcan answer.I've often heard many persons ask thecame question'.''Answered Penrod.''Any one that stretches forth his hand to draw the lightning to even an enemy, mu 'must recall that also the bolt will pass through him.''

''I wonder if there is anything in that.''!''!''The Rattlesnake boy pondered. ''It would make any person more careful than usual if he believed.It must be strange to revnge yourself on those wicked glandelinians and yet it being a sin.But just the same to let a Glandelinian get away with his crimes would be like holding a child a ainst a live eletric wire to kill him and yet getting all the volts through yourself at the same time.''A sudden anxiety revealed itself in his boyish voice.''Does general Greatheart believe such things about vivian Wickey.!''He asked.''Does he! Tell me.''

''He says he knows it is not true.''said Pn Penrod.

''I'll owj own up''The Rattlesnake boy decided after reflating further on the situation.''I'll own up that no one believe such reports are true.There is no signs of those re orts being a fake however.''

Then again he beg became very silent and did not speak untill they were within a quarter of a mile of the enormous fortress.As they arived to point No Seven they believed they had plenty of time to ta e a better look at the great fortress since they weresc near.The closest of course was the im mmenser Glandelinian encampments.Being completely disguised the two boys were able to go through the wide company streets and through the narrower ones without being detected or questioned.They even passed under an archway of trees, across a small bridge running a across a frozen creek, and into the square of the camp, and always the Rattlesnake boy walked on in his dream despite the peril of being in a vast Glandelinian camp.When they came to a certain barracks near the outer limits of the camp they saw a very pretty looking little girl slave looking out of one of the windoghe window.She appeared more prettier than any he had ever seen so dazzlingly beautiful that he could not hardly stand it to gaze upon her.

There were many barracks at this point of the camp but they were no great cwas her hore, and this particular barracks was a modest looking one.The little chi child slave who had long bobbed hair reaching to her shoulders of a golden color did not appear to act like other children though her face was somewhat dirty and as a child slave usually are she was half naked.The two boys walked past the window once and then seeing her look almost suspiciously at the, came back.It appeared to be a building so humble looking that surely there was nothing unusual in two apparent Glandelinian boy scouts going into it to take a look at the child slave.They believed they could pretend to buy her, and take her to the an they wished to have an interview with.

As they entered they were surprised for she came forward to recieve them and there was a dignin dignity about her that surprised the still more and made them feel queer in her presence.She was evidently more th than glad of their presence.She even undertook to make more attention to Penrod but nevertheless she turned round and loudly called to some one in one of the upper rooms.

CHAPTER TWENTY FOUR

EXPLOSION DISASTER NEAR BIG GIRLKNOOL.

Penrodhad at this moment in his slit in the sleeve a sketch of some person he had been looking for and who looked exactly like this child slav slave.Penrod had found a seclusive place in which he always took his final look before he and the Rattlesnake boy had entered the barracks.

Two nine and eleven year old boys camedown from the upper room and though they were dressed like the slave one of them had uncombed yellow hair but smooth and not bobbed but curly.He nor his companion did not at all li look like a real child slave and neither did the girl the boys had seen first at the window.One of them or all three had surely enough the features like those in Penrods sketch, their noses and mouth chins and figure were like what Penrod had made in his drawings and which he had kept to his memory.But—the oldest one mentioned to Penrod and the Rattlesnake boy to sit down on the long bench by the window.The boys obliged him so, and Penrod leaned back and closed his eyes for a full minute.

''This is not the boy scout general general Greatheart sent me to look for.' he remarked to himself.''He is not the one at all.''

Penrod knew he was not theboy, why he was unable to explain but just the same he felt positively certain.He was strongly convinced of it.If he had not had the sudden feeling nothing would have prevented him from giving the secret signal. And if he was not able to give it now, where was he to find the one to whom the signal must be given, and if that particular one could not be found, what would be the result.?And if there were so many in this same encampment who were so much alike how could he be sure which boy scout it was?Each of these same boys were a link in a powerful secret chain, and if a single link were missed the chain would be broken.Each time the golden haired boy came within closer view of his sight, Penrod recalled eveevery feature afresh in his re remor memory and compared it with theskatch he had made.

The boys resemblanc such resemblance each time became more clo er but each time Penrod felt the peculiar inner conviction which made him say to himself;

''no I must be careful.''The mysterious signal is not to be given to him.''

Pe rod was also disturbed by the fact that the Rattlesnake boy was all of a sudden becoming just as restless as previously he had been silent, and preoccupied.He move about in an excited manner on his bench, to the great discomfort of the girl and the four boys.He even kept turning his head toward the window as he talked.He even asked Penrod to translate divers questions in English he wished to ask about the Abbissanians and the Calverinians, and also about the nature of the Calverinian winters.They were also asked about the strength and power of M anaions besieging armies, about his fortified positions, the size of all other fighting armies, and so on.He added one quest query to another and could not sti sit still.

''Your companion must be greatly excited!''said the little girl.''pid you wish to speak to us.?If so please tell me the purpose of your visit.''

''what in the world shall I do for safty sake!''Thought Penrod to himself.''He is not the boy at all.Will I fail?He is a girl in disguise.''

He did not give the mysterious signal.He thought it best go to go away somewhere else, and think it out though where his thoughts would lead him he could not know for sure.He never did sre dream that he would ever face such a did diffuc difficult problem.He could not find no one here to ask advice of for he was in the midst of a vast rebel encampment.Only himself and the Rattlesnake boy who was so nervious and who wriggled and twisted in his seat only knew the secret.

''You must sit still please.''He said to the Rattlesnake boy.''Our hostess and her two companions are afraid you'll bring in their master.''

''But I want to know the size and strength of the armies that are besieging vivian Wickey.''said the Rattlesnake''you have been a famious Glandelinian spy and are able to tell me anything when I ask you too.''

''It's time for you boys to go now before our master comes.'' the little bobbed hair girl said.''Perhaps hein in a strange part of a large camp has made the little gentleman very nervious.It is sometime so when he is in the presence of a little girl.I believe I can notice it.''And she laughed.

Penrod really could not understand the change of moon mood that the Rattlesnake boy had shown.And he realized also that if the boy had been the right person he would not have had the opportunity to give the mysemysterious signal. He would not have been ableto give it under any conditions, because therestless questioning of the Rattlesnake boy had so directed the atention of the girl and two boys tward him that nothing could have been said to the golden haired boy without his companion and the girl observing it.

"I could not have given the mysterious sign ' if he had been the right boy"Penrod said to himself.

They indeed made a very hasty departure from the old barracks.When they were f i fairly in the Company street, the Rattlesnake boy grasped Penrod by the right arm.

"You did not give themysterious signal did you?" "he asked breathlessly"The reason I kept asking you so many sill silly questions and foolish questions too was with thepurpose to prevent you before it was too late."

"Why did you do that?"asked Penrod.

"That was not theboy you were looking for."He said in a whisper."It did not matter how much his resemblance was to him, he was not the rightone.And neither were any of-ther slaves whether they recognized us or not.They were three of the vivian girls in disguise.What they were doing here I don't pretend to know."

He was pale and swinging along swiftly as if he were in a big hurry for a certain reason.

"Just to be safe let us get into somequiet place and hide."He said."ll those strange and important things about vivian wickey you have been telling to me has got hold of me like a vise.How did I know about those boys and girl being the Abbieannian Princesses? How could I know if I did not recognize them despite their disguise.I've been saying to myself that we should be findin out to myself that we should be finding out the right things to do for the cause so that I could be the right sort of side-decamp.I've been working at all kinds of secsecret plans, and when I took a good look at the girl and two beautiful boys I knew they were the „vivian girls in spite of their greatest effort efforts to hide the beauty of their faces.And I knew not one of them was the boy you were looking for.And I was not sure whether you knew or not and therefore I thought if I kept on interrupting you with all questions you could be prevented from giving them the sign ' not failing to reach the proper one."

"There is a big log near a creek not far away from the camp where we can get a look at the fortifications.Let's go there and sit down."Said Penrod"I know it was not the right boy too.It's the hand work of God over again.Of course it would not matter to us if they knew the signal, but if one of them was ji mistaken for the boy, the right one would not recieve it and would probably fail in his mission."

"Exactly.Yes it was thehelp of God---i was thehelp of God---it must have been."muttered the Rattlesnake boy walking fast and with a pale set face."It could not have been anything else."

They were not detected by any of the glavish men as they passed through the company streets, and therefore they got away from the camp and reached a quiet place where they could seethe Maya fortifications.There a king a good brush fire first they sat down on the log despite the cold the Rattlesnake boy took off his cap to wipe his forehead, but it was not his swift and quick walking which made him sweat as if it was mid summer.

"The queerness of meeting three of the disguised Vivian girl Princesses in a much more queer place and looking like child slaves within the enemy's lines gave me a kind of fright"he said."When they came down from the upper floor of the barracks and drew near enough for me to see them more properly a feeling very queqm queer and strange came over me.At that moment I did not fully recognize them but knew just thesame it was not the boy you was looking for to give the signal.Then I said to myself--but surely he looks like Walter Starring, and then after one good look I recognized the three to be the vivian girls in disguise and I began to get nervious.And then I wanted to stop you from giving the vivian girl the mysterious signal, and then it seemed to me I was acting very foolish and silly before them, and the next moment all the stories you had been tel i telling me about, came to my mind at once-- and I remembered what I had been told---and I said to myself"perhaps all faces are not of the same person s" n and the palms of my hands got moist."

Penrod listened to him in silence.He was looking at the farthest section of the fortress and the highest parts and wondering about the great number of great cannons on its ramparts.

"The long yellow or golden haired one had such a strange expression on her face that I dared not give the mysterious signal."He said."And his eyes were more like a girls than a boys.The light in the barracks was very poor and it was not untill she had come much nearer that I discovered what I had not observed before.Her eyes were complete blue, the boy we are looking for has brown eyes."

"did you really observe that?"The Rattlesnake boy exclaimed."then we are sure about it.We are safe now."

"We are not safe untill we have found the right boy."Said Penrod"but where he is at I'd like to know."

He said the words as if he wereadream ing, and spoke very quietly as if he were lost in his thoughts but also in a manner as if he expected an answer.And he still looked off at the distant Maya Fortress.The Rattlesnake boy watched Penrod for a moment and then began to look at the Fortifications also.There was somep thing irresistably thrilling about them, and when his eyes had rested upon them for a full minute they did not want to move away.

"There must be some way to work our entrance into the fortress. "He said at last."Let us go as close as possible and take a look at her battlements and sit there and think, and think about finding the right boy."

For Penrod this idea did not seem to very fantastic or deca decisive.And to enter those fortifications seemed like committing suicide.And where th could they find a quiet place to sit and ponder about the thing he desired to remember or to findout.Of course he had been taught by general Greatheart to be quiet and still but to do so among the fierce Abbielinians seemed impossible.It was like listening to something which could speak without words.

"There is a large column of Zimmermannian officers which will soon ride up the Thumbelinin road to the fortress."He said."If we follow them we may be able to slip inWhen we are once inside, and we can reach the top most battlement you would see a world of fortifications spread round you.General Greatheart went there once before the war and told me all about it.And we won't need to sleep on the snow all night.Let us go and make a try at it any way side-decamp."

so they started tward the vortifications each boy having the same thought and each boy had the same vision on his mind.Penrod however was calmer than the Rattlesnake boy because his belief in the help of God was an accustomed one and never had failed He believed quietly and u quite simply that it was a most dangerous move to seek entrance into that fortress, but he had his faith in the belief that God would help him and his companion see the advanture through providing they did nothing rash

The Rattlesnake boy who had never faced close danger before with the Insurgents was at once awed and greatly fascinated by the suggestion of entering such a gloomy looking fortress he perils many had gone through, and especially the Vivian girls had baffled and overthrown him but he knew that any professional scout could secure practical benefits from any of his efforts if he could follow out enough plans to work at

"You could never succeed in accomplishing anything without an effort as far as can make out " he had said to Penrod just like a general fighting and directing a battle you'll have to sweep the enemy from the entire line of works, sweep the foe out as if did it with a broom, and then keep on driving and attacking and following up your success untill victory came"

Then suddenly he gave a short ugly laugh because he had suddenly recalled something to his mind

[illegible] laughed heartily when they heard this [illegible] violet said with a capricious [illegible]

"There is something about this war that my father used to jeer at---- something about this glandelinian Insurrection being a war against God.Is it true?" he said.

"Oh yes!I've heard about that."Said Penrod."It has all the symptons.The massacres of children that no other civil history has ever recorded, and every thing you know has already occured.All the world says something like it.It has been said so often it makes you believe it wie whether it is true or no."

"He did not believe it and I din didn't either."said the Rattlesnake boy.

"no oncebelieves it even the Angelinians"answered Penrod as he had often done before."It's because we ourselves don't know."

Being in disguise they managed to get into one section of the fortifications.New batteries of artillery was being pushed and dragged through the deep snow toward the lower battlements, the soldiers panting and cursing and swearing and shouting volumes of commands to each other as they worked.Yet as Penrod watched the men and horses work stubbornly gradually the guns were brought to their proper positions untill the work with these guns was finished.The boys finally managed to find their way to one of the battlement towers, and mounted the interior stairs higher and higher untill they had reached the top.From here the boys looked down upon the lower sections below, and from there observed the world of fortifications, whose snow covered towers and flag poles rose and spread and lifted great titans behind and before each other and besides each other and beyonf beyond each other untill it seemed no other fortifications on earth could compare to each other.

As he gazed downward Penrod almost felt the absurdity of any army no matter what size of ever assu assaulting it with success.And the army of men who would dare make an assault upon this fort ress must take life to be a most insignificant thing indeed.There were many rebel soldiers in this tower, and they also were looking at the scenery from the top.They did not pay any attention to the two boys.Neither were they in search of any one in the works.But the Rattlesnake boy and Penrod were.When the Glandelinian soldiers began to descend, Penrod and his companion went with them.Then reaching the lower extremities, they wandered about with them over the inner snow covered platforms and observed things from this view point and the other.

Penrod noticed that the Rattlesnake boy was growing more and more silent, and his silence was more of expression than speechlessness.He also looked as silent as he was and appeared as if he was no longer aware of where he was.As soon as they had the chance they left the unsuspecting glandelinians at last, and wander ed away by themselves.They were allowed the entrance into the barracks where they could recieve shelter from the intens intense cold.They were given some simple food and they ate it there.When most of the rebels not on duty were retiring to their quarters for the approaching night the boys realized it they were cooped up for sure, for an hour later a fierce storm had broken out the wind blowing like a great hurricane and the snow falling at the rate of two inches an hour.

It appeared as if a night of vigil was to begin for the boys.And no doubt that what it was going to be.Astorm night within the barracks of the fortifications where they could wait and watch and hold themselves ready to hear even any kind of noise coming to them.The Rattlesnake boy was so thrilled that he would not have been surprised if he heard a voice from a snowflake.

But Penrod only believedthat despite the great fury of the storm he he fel held his boy soul quiet enough he should find himself thinking at least but not last of something that would lend him to the place which held what it was lost that he must and should find.They saw a large party of glandelinian officers pass by the barracks but did not recognize any of the.They heard the generals talking as they went on their way as if somet in very important was going to happen.Then soon the two boys were alone, and for a moment so they felt the same lonesomeness as the child slaves do while at their daily toil.And while the listened to the howling of the blizzard storm outside they sat on the cot and watched.They saw the reflection of strange lights through the dark murk of

of the storm change from shade to shade, deepen and then turn radiant, and then after appearing in the colors of rose gold, and rose purple, and rose gray, suddenl suddenly disappear.It took a long time for them to fade out but at length they were gone and still more willd the storm raged.One of the boys went to the window and looked out.He saw clouds of snow dash defiantly against the window pane and heard the wind shriek his ally.One or two camp fires began to show themselves but presently went out.

"The storm is so fierce it puts out the camp fires."said the Rattlesnake boy gazing from the window.

"Yes" answered Penrod"we are in luck to be sheltered here as it is.It seems as if we are in the midst of a blizzard and hurricane together."

Despite the storm of wind and snow there was a most strange and intense light on the side of a hill which he felt sure was not a camp fire and he mentioned it to Penrod and drew it to him.

"It is a light from some sort of fire within the outer limits of the Glandelinian positions."answered Penrod.

"The storm is so fierce"the Rattlesnake boy whispered again after a moments pause and Penrod whispered back;

"It is to our decidive advantage."

While waiting they had partaken of a light meal and then they lay down upon the cots and looked up toward the ceiling.Then they began a very low talk.

"How are we going to get out of this place if we are suspected."Said the Rattlesnake boy."But it does seem as if we are the very midst of the fierce Zimmermanns.The things that are passing through my mind are not the things I would wish to see come true.What if we do not find him-- at all------don't find the right boy I mean."

"Lie still and let us go to sleep now."Penrod whispered."God will come to our help in time."

Indeed Penrod had a sort of curious serenity about him which caused the Rattlesnake boy to remain calm.So the side-de-camp laid still and thought as he tried to sleep.And what he thought of most was his hearts desire only.The noise of the storm did not disturb him.That there was a howling blizzard raging was a thing forgotten.They were only two boy scouts, one a Calverinian and the other a French Canadian and they had begun their adventure since they met, thinki thinking of great and anxious things to be done.

"It is terrible cold inside"the Rattlesnake again said at last.But Penrod being asleep did not answer.Soon both of them were sound asleep.

"I see one in close beside my cot"Penrod was saying in a dream.Then he quickly awakened and found it was really true.There by his cot stood a young lad who looked as if he had come in to give the barracks the once over.He wore the uniform of a glandelinian boy scout of a very high rank, and had ablack rounded hat with a large tuft at the back.He appeared to be surprised as he looked down at the two strange boys.

"Good blizzard weather for the coming of a good morning."He said"did you and your comrade obtain permission to sleep here or did you come in to obtain shelter from the storm?"

"We obtain permission."Answered Penrod.

"Were you told them?It's fierce out now."

"We walked about to rapidly to know.And we are wearing our thick heavy overcoats.Our general told us to."

"I just entered this building this morning."said the boy."From your appearance I know you are not a glandelinian and believe you are an Alliance or the like.I am an Allianceian scout in disguise, but I know of few with in these fortifications low enough to obtain any information within my reach.The Vivian girls tell me you were here and that's why I came.My general and all my friends believe I am a traitor to the cause when I am so well known to the Insurgents.They said I am almost certain to suicide.Oh your companion

[illegible] Prisoners laughed [illegible] when they heard this [illegible] violet said with a pugnacious [illegible] is awake now is he!'' turning tward Penrods friend who had risen on one elbow and was staring at him.''What is the matter my friend.''You look as if you were suddenly afraid of me.''

Penrod however did not give the Rattlesnake boy time for to recover from his surprise and spoak.

''I know why he is gazing at you so''he answered for him.''He is greatly startled.Yesterday we went to the barracks in the canoe wonder, and we saw three of the Vivian girls in disguise and one of them had completed her make up so that she exactly looked like you----only--''the maid'' looking up'' her eyes are blue, and your's are brown.''

''It was Joice Vivian you saw who looked like me.''said the boy scout puffing at a cigarette cheerfully.''I was one of the boy scouts who went with them, and before we went I made a bet with Joice that in donning a disguise she could not almost correctly impersonate me.So I see she did and only her eyes gave her away.And she almost fooled you.They wished to go into one of the barracks posing as specialized child slaves, and telling me where you went as they followed you secretly as the [illegible] recognized you they told me where you were and I come here.So I have cleaned my hair unde a pomade out of it, went with them and here I am.I don't look like the Glandelinians would easily recognize a [illegible] now do I?''

In fact he did not at all.But Penrod knew they did, or he would not have been sent on this mission to warn him.Just now however there were no one in the barracks but themselves.therefore the two other boys did not need to be afraid to do or say anything since there were no Glandelinians within the building to see or hear and those that were were asleep.Penrod immediately took the sketch out of the slit inside the coat sleeve.He looked at it for a moment and then looked at the boy scout and then he showed it to him.

''That is not Joice who impersonated you.It's a sketch of you.''he said.

There was a sudden change in the boys face, and his probably changed more than any other face had when its owner had been suddenly spoken to.In a barracks apparently deserted as [illegible] was not to be afraid.

''You are in danger and so are your followers.''Said Penrod''The Glandelinians have recognized you and it is only a matter of moments before your detection and capture.''

''God be thanked for the warning.''Burst forth the boy scout.And he took off his cap and bared his head.And the Rattlesnake stood as in utter silence and stared and stared as Stirring after Vivian a profound bow made his hasty de a departure.

''That's another one saved.''said Penrod.

CHAPTER TWENTY FOUR.

EXPLOSION DISASTER NEAR BIG GIRLKNOOL.

THIS story should also describe the fo w following account of one of the wars probable worse disasters not far from the district of Big Girlknool.Indeed the large State of Angolinia, and also tye State of Calverinia has since the war began been properly credited with being the most war torn states of the whole of Southern Abbiesnnia.Already in the fictional history of this rapidly growing war numerous instances of unusually immenseloss of life, in battles, disasters, massacres, and destruction of property on the Angolinia as well as the very neighboring Calverinian and Abbiequnian coasts and river courses and arteries, and elsewhere throughout the land could be mentioned as having been occasioned by enemy ferocities but just so far there seems to be one awful overwhelming disaster since the war started, which all other famious writers could have agreeed to consider one of the greatest and most saddest events as well as most tragic of any real terrible war, as natural calamity ever known.

In reality the naval and merchantile fleets of all European nations and other nations of the world, coast, cities and towns, landscapes, and forests have in all wars suffered terribly beyond comp comprehension, or also in those awful aerial convulsions we know as tropical cyclones or hurricanes but even all these overwhelming disasters, even in such far distant regions as the West Indies, Chinia seas, or samoa could not compare with the same force of disasters as would similar events occuring during this awful war itself.On the night of July the fourtyh some three or four weeks after the big battle of Gadernine the whole southern half of Calverinia and the northeast part of Angolinia was frightfully ravaged by a series of sudden and most violent shocks which exhibited double times the worse features of the most dreadful earthquake the world has ever known.

Even by the concussion whole forests of trees some fifty miles in extent even on the lower sides of hills as well as in valleys and on plains were either uprooted or left inclining in every direction, more than twelve big warships near Vivian Vickey were wrecked by big clouds of flying stones and debris hurled so far by the big eruption of mighty earthrending explosions, eight hundred thousand in houses in the city of Big Girlknool were totally demolished, four hundred farmers windmills throughout the country for nearly eight hundred miles thrown down and the e wells caved in, innumerable church steeples in many towns and villiages and cities and many houses completely thrown down, the lead roofing f of thousands of houses and other materials shaken down like an avalanch into the streets, and houses innumerable unroofed completely and shattered as if struck by a tornado.

Scores of thousands of lives were lost, the city of Big Girlknool losing more than fifteen thousand persons under the wreckage of their houses.Colonel Richardson Killdare and his wife and children werekilled by the collapse of a large section of his headquarters in the mobolisz-t mobolization camp at Dorothy Gale City.One of the best friends of the Vivian girls general Walter Jennihngs was reported reported killed in the collpase of a barracks in the same camp.General Concentinian Aronburg refers it to it as the most amazing disaster that any war or storms, or natural natural earthquakes could boast of, the shock of which overthrew at once all the trees within this compa and shattered many barracks, hurled down all the tents and caused the cannons of his very batteries to dance violently or jump or up and down.

The lowest estimates of the damage in Big Girlknool alone was a million dollars per block, some computations placing it at two millions and even considerably above four millions dollars.According to the observer''never was such a concussion or succession of violent shocks and devastations caused by natural earthquakes known in the memory of man of an memory of man nor the like to be found in any of the most terrible storm disasters or other kinds, in the existance of Abbiesnnia.And only by an explosion.Before the full extent of the disaster was known the curthorities of the whole nation voted an address to Emperor Vivian expressing the great sense the entire government of Abbiesnnia hath for the great calamity of the explosion fallen upon the Abbiesnnian Empire caused by the unusually violent war promishing to [illegible] immense stores of supplies for making good the serious loss caused by the [illegible] concussion.

The [illegible] was no other instance on record of a wars explosion being the occasion of such [illegible] humiliation.It was through the efforts of the members of the Gemini spies that [illegible] Vivian was indepted for most of the information hitherto published about this frightful visitation of the war.Whinking the explosion of such force an unusually great event, the members of the Gemini had decided to hand down to porterity such particulars as could beobtained and made an a ne appeal to all the people in the stricken districts to supply them with at least local details of the explosion and its consequences.

The entire collection of all the most remarkable casualties which happened throughout land and sea either in dreadful tempests on land or sea, or such as fires, floods, earthquakes, volcanic eruptions, or those caused by wars could not make any accounts as thrilling as these big disasters already described in this great Sandico Abbie annian war.Yet it could be y believed that these shocks being the greatest, the longest in duration,the widest in extent of all tye earthshocks that history can give account of since the Beginning of law was caused by more than fifteen terrific explosions of gigantic mines set off by rebel engineers to cause havoc to stop the progress of an advancing christian army.

So far as the war is to rage the war swept stateszand provinces of southern Abbiannia will from the start of the war have the reputation of being in the leadership of unaccountable disasters.General Hapson vivian found it so when he attempted to drive out the rebel armies from Jennie Turner, and when he crossed the famious Mic-Hollester gun, and the fate of countless hundreds of thousands confim confirmed the old story.

This war is full of instances of violent disasters, and battles of indescribable fury.Take Cedernine for instance.What kind of explosions they were which had all the appearances of great volcanic eruptions and whose clouds were mingled with such violent flashes and leveled a score of cities and towns to the ground, will yet remain undecided nor could any one be satisfied the effects they had on the water of the mighty river.The way the situation appeared it was evident that the states of Calverinia and Angelinia were to be the most terribly torn of any other part of the nation for battles, and complications of great disasters.

As it is to be known yh the glandelinians just now seen to be the full masters and they were causing havoc of the most terrible and indescribable description causing in some spots by bursting leve l leveas impassible and devastating floods, and terrible raging forest fires which made the regions dreadful to the noncombatants.But to go back to the shocks, caused by the explosions. As it is to be known the ground has shaken exceedingly hard for about fourteen minutes, and so hard that the inhabitants of the towns and cities thought it terrible convulsions, stacks, and chimneys fell down from the roofs of buildings, and the tiles from many roofs were shaken down into the streets, and a few moments later the fury of the shocks increased.Yet though tye ground trembled hard it did not do so bad enough to give so mento gi e give any apprehensions till about three moments later there came shocks of increasing violence and during that time the buildings shook very furiously.

One very old lady narrowly escaped the mischief of a part of a high built building which fell before the shocks,and an abundance of tiles slate and singles were shaken off the countless houses, yet the shocks continued with the most unusual violence, and had not the greater concussions followed so soon this would have passed for a great disturbance.

After a few moments pause other shocks came with exceeding violence but even then not so that it gave any apprehensions of danger to those whithin doors.Then came more concussions of still greater intensity.But as the observations of these concussions were not regular enough to supply the reader with fu' ll information the disorders caused by the dreadful concussions had caused unspeakable terror throughout the shaken regions, the people c p expecting every moment that their crazily acting houses would bury them all in their ruins.One survivor recieved an ingenious letter from an ingenious gentleman a little after the disaster directed to the Royal Abbiannian Society and printed as follows;

''A letter from general Francis Vivianum.
F.D.W.S.
To emperor Vivian.
Containing my observatory during the late explosion disaster.
To His Majest Emperor Vivian!
According to my promish at the general meeting just recently, I here send you inclosed the accounts of my most ingenious and inquisitive friend general Richard Mic-Cantler concerning the cause of the disasterous explosions in that part of Calverinia where he lived in the late dismal calamity. And I hope it will not be unacceptable to accompany hisawith my own observations at Canora, especially since I shall not weary you with a long history of the devastations, etc. but rather some of the particulars of a more philosophical consideration.

At first I do not think it improper to look back to the procending disasters of the war.And I scarcely believe I shall go much out of the way to reflect as far back as April, May, June and July, because all these four or three months were full of disasters.

In april Vivian wickey fell into the hands of the enemy.At that time the defending forces recieved twelve to thirteen thousand shells e per hour for a full month. During the time the enemy besieged the christian forces at the Julio Callio section of Vivian Vickey in the month of June there fell upon the defending works more shot and shell and high explosives in any one month of any seige or battle since the beginning of time, viz,322,227 rounds.But now as you know the besieging christian forces under general Hanson hurled during July alone 214,555 rounds without effect.

And I remember the Abbiannian newspapers gave accounts of great artillery duels that month from divers places at Vivian Vickey but the north of vivian Vickey which also escaped the vio violence of the late disaster was not so heavily shelled in any of those months at least not in that great prop proportion that julio Callio was, as usually they may be later on, as I guess from the accounts of the shelling with which a war correspondent favored me.And August although it had considerable intermissions yet had some violent artillery duels.

This I have laid open before you as shortens account as I could of the preceding disposition of the seige of Vivian Vickey , parcl particl particularly as to artillery fire, because I am of opinion that these had a great influence in the late disaster not in only causing the enemy to try all desparate means to raise the seige and so on but also to make and cause great explosions that would shake the earth and atmosphere with the most disasterous effects.and from these violent explosions, I judge those concussions or far reaching flashes in the upshooting cloud to have proceeded which most people as well as myself observed andwhich some took for a most vio violent volcanic eruptions.

But these things I leave to better judgement such as that very ingenious member of our society who had undertaken the province of the late explosion disaster to whom if o you please you may impart these papers to your generals.From preliminations it is time for me to proceed nearer to the time of the explosions themselves and the foregoing day - think deserves regard.

In the morning of that day a big battle rage somewhere and the noise of the conflict was extremely severe in the afternoon.In the evening there was something like flashes of lighting lightning from a clear sky and between eight and eight thirty oclock a violent u but short squall of strangely thundering noise rolling as along the ground a long distance away and such shaking of the earth to drive us into consternation and of a violent shower of falling debris and earth in some other places which did some great damage there fell in that peculiar shower tons of debris over a space of one hundred miles in extent.The next moment there was a series of thundering and earthshaking which came with unusual violence and with the greatest excess and then suddenly ceased.The shocks had been so severe that their effects aroused me what the shocks did at my town I cannot say, the smoke cloud being excessively dark all the while, and my roof had collapsed everything else being shaken down and everything else secured that I have not yet seen but my information for more resources and others who were forced to venture out in spite of all dangers and by my own guess I imagine the explosions to have created sudden air waves with the devastating effects of a tornado.

This Your Majesty I have given you the truest account I can of what I thought most to deserve observation, both before and after the late explosions, I could have added many other particulars but I now fear I have already made my letter long and tedious.I shall therefore only add that I have accounts of the results of the explosion at many places of which it would take too long to mene here but I need not tell particulars because I question not you have better informations.The explosions and earth concussions caused by them did not occur until late in the evening and before it happened most of the families of the various towns and cities went early to bed, though many of them not without some concern at the noise of the terrible battle still raging in the distance.but when the series of great explosions occured few people that were capable of any sense of danger were so hardy as to lie in bed.

And the fury of the concussions increased to such a degree that many correspondents conversing with the people the next day understood most people expected to be buried under the ruins of their houses!And yet in this general apprehension nobody had dared during that half an hour leave their swaying tottering buildings for whatever the danger was within doors, it was far worse without.The sides of walls from tall buildings, tiles of roofs, and stones from the tops of houses and glass from windows fell int the streets with such force and in such thick clouds or masses that no one thought fit to venture out, though their own houses were nearly demolished within.

I myself was in a well built brick building in the outskirts of the city, and a big smoke stack falling in upon the next house gave it such a tremendous shock that those within thought it was just coming down upon them but opening doors to attempt an escape into the streets the danger was so apparent that they all thought fit to surrender to the Mercy of Mercy of God and expect their graves in the ruins of the house rather than to meet certain destruction out in the streets for unless they could have reached the middle of the street quick enough from any building, there had been no security anywhere from falling materials, and some of the materials fell from the highest buildings to the side walks below with such force and alpha speed that in many cases in broad and narrow streets that were sometimes windows broken from rebounding bricks, tile shards, and other materials, and where there was room for them to fly far when rebounding, I had seen all kinds of falling materials rebound from the side walk for a distance of about sixty or one hundred yards and in falling again struck from twenty to eighty five inches into the solid earth of yards and private gardens.

Long pieces of timber, iron pieces and shafts of iron and shafts of lead falling to the streets from higher buildings had shattered the hard cement, and stone side walls and also in rebounding had been hurled much further that a whole blocks; for this most peculiar reason it is beyond my power to venture to make an affirmative of the fact that there was any such thing as a real concussion of the earth as it had been caused only by the terrific terrific force of the explosions, but the concern and consternation of all the people was so terrible and so great that I cannot be surprised at their imagining things many horrible things, which were probably not any more than their imagining on the very things, there were since nothing is more frequent than for fear to double every object, and to impose upon the understanding strong apprehensions being apt very often to persuade us of the reality of such things which we have no other reason to show for the probability of than what are grounded in these fears which prevail at that juncture.

Others including myself at first believed we heard loud distant thunder as if a violent distant thunderstorm was swiftly approaching. I may if pleased to repeat that the explosions though so many unknown miles away by the unusual violence of their loud reports made such a noise in the air as has had a very very remarked resemblance to rolling thunder now far now near even at that distance away and it was observed that the distant roaring distant hoes had a voice as much louder than usual as the fury of the distant noise was greater than ever known. The noise also had something in it much more formidable it seemed to sound aloft as well as distant and roared not very much unlike loud remote rolling and howling thunder and yet though I can remember to have heard the thunder of the explosions I had not remembered to have seen any flashes or heard of any body that did in or nearest the city, yet in the vicinity nearest the explosions the air was seen as full of flaring r ising and falling waters, and vaporous fires, and also the appearance of unusual flashes of lightning along the horizon to the great terror of the very inhabitants. And yet I cannot but observe how fearless such speculations are as are addicted to such wickedness are both of gods judgment and operation prodigies which is visible visible in this particular that hordes of hardened lawless men rogues raided towns badly crushed by the explosions, broke into the ruined houses and robbed and slew many of the people who would not escape and try to find their way to some encampment of national soldiers to get some assistance, but none can be right who would venture out in to the assistance of the distressed towns which were rifled and plundered in the middle of all the extremity of the disaster, together with the violence of the lowes of the distant explosions the darkness of the night, the apparent eruptions and the severe concussions added to the terror of it.

The points from which the shocks proceeded are variously reported from various hands it is certain the first shocks lasted five to fifteen seconds, or at least I thought it did or continued as nigh as near as I could judge by the impression it made on the house for we did not have to look out, the concussions followed one another in increasing violence and they ceased.

As soon as they ceased our fears also abated, and people began to peep out of doors, but it is impossible to express the concern that appeared in every place, the distraction of the disaster and its very end in the faces of every one and every body's first work was to visit and try the after their friends and also relations.

The next day or two was almost entirely spent in the usual and transportic curiosity of the people in the awful and ingenuity house of the shocks and made which was so universal throughout the explosion territory and especially on the outer parts of the city that nothing can be said sufficient to describe it.

Another unhappy circumstance with which the awful disaster was joined was also the dreadful loss final wave which happened along the shore of the sea in the region where the explosions occured at the time of nine o'clock and which was probably occasioned by the fury of the earthquake shocks produced by the explosions, which is also a demonstration that the concussions affected the sea like as it had earthquake and as it is observable and known by all that understand the affairs of the sea that a natural earthquake makes a high and devastating tidal wave, so I see violent concussions of the earth caused by the explosions and that with such violent force caused a tidal wave of so raging devastating force and force that along such certain parts of the coast it was most incredible, the first tidal wave rising to the height of sixty feet higher than it was ever known to do in the memory of man and by which which many women and children and others were drowned; by which thousands of ships were floated up upon the firm land several miles off from the banks and an incredible number of cattle horses, and other animals drowned. Though the consciousness of the though the severe concussions of the explosions attended after that half an hours horror distant fires still burned exceedingly fierce and the sea was still so exceedingly rough, so rough that no boats dared stir out too far but on extraordinary occasions, and people from afar noticed the fires increasing and they were in a fresh consternation lest it was to spread into a miserable forest fire, this part of the country being thickly covered portentously that following night an extreme wild and violent thunderstorm arose as an engaging the entire country seeing with a great black cloud and showers torrents of rain which overcame the fire so that in a quarter of a night they were completely extinguished and only left miles upon miles of blackened timbers and embers. Yet as I heard the disaster had come with such force that many lives were wiped out, and had not the horrors of the war hardened the people to all things less than itself this disaster would have passed for a catastrophe fit to be ranked in our history history.

Untold sorrow ensues

the country along the shore was in many places devastated by the unusual high tidal wave that accompanied the explosions at Sandy Hook and also Quarantine and other points of the coast line and large portions of the sea coast were submerged or must it be forgotten that untold villages along the sea coast were destroyed involving the loss of a great many persons, who had often fallen defiance to the seas and worse t worst of storms to do their worse what an awful time the survivors must have passed through.

Where these villages and towns stood nothing was to appear standing, but upon a nearer inspection wholesale of wreckage was also, and many of the the corpses of the drowned floor and or out of the materials of the inmates of the buildings were found afterwards during the whole night and part of the next day clouds of smoke like a dense smoke prevailed over the sky which during the morning gave the sun a dull red appearance such as smoke always produces. Far away from the explosions but at the same time there were noises like some very remarkable meteoric phenomenon but only following each blast.

The violent blasts of these earthrending explosions caused concussions and devastations far worse than the succession of fierce earthquakes which laid waste a goodly the tremendous disaster was far more startling in its effects than any ever remembered by the oldest inhabitants although to where the explosions occured was the damage was most terrific. Trees were blown down and even blown away by the air blasts caused by the explosions.

It was at first believed that one of the war correspondents gave an extremely exaggerated accounts of the effects produced by these explosions, apparently from many some of the details being alike but not quite the same as those actually recorded. The war correspondent wrote:

"The banks were torn and forced away from the trees twenty miles away from the explosions by the force of the blast, and the fruits of the earth for more than a hundred miles from the scene were destroyed, the very ground was torn into huge craters. The blast were on the sea produced by the concussion, uprooted the very bottom and depths of the sea to miles from shore, scores of townsmen the shore and some fortifications were totally washed away and one hundred and ninety eight great guns weighing ten to twenty tons each were swept into the depths of the sea. The trees of the trees were burned off and I torn loosed by the force of the blast and also by strange electrical motions. Many convoys of various batteries were driven along the submerged fortifications or carried away into the depts of the sea and some buried into the air by the terrible force of the storm. At the Narrows into a perfect deluge of debris hurled far and wide and high into the air by the explosions fell like a cloud burst of materials as if from some sudden so devastating volcanic eruption upon us several towns and entirely destroyed them. There were fourty thousand houses in one of these towns with over ten thousand inhabitants and the governor of the State reported the fate of these towns to the Emperor in only four words: "The towns have disappeared."

Nineteen thousand persons are missed also the ruins of their dwellings at St. Joseph's city and also at the south of the city of St. Vincent DE. Paul where all the houses were razed to the ground by the blast concussions. Scores of thousands were injured and three hundred thousand rendered homeless. The large towns of St. Mathieu, Pleine, Le Prunay, and Verne were also devastated by the concussion. At St. Jerome the Cathedral, all the Churches and one hundred thousand houses were razed and others wrecked, and the Hospital was wrecked and twelve thousand narrows buried beneath the wreckage.

At Bermuda city near the big ..io-Hollester gun river, fifty se en river craft were driven ashore by the violent action of its waters, a n ore of others went down near the middle of the river, and in Bermuda city, thirty two thousand persons were perished being crushed under the wreckage of their fallen buildi ,s.Perhaps the most remarkable effects of the disaster in this district were those experienced at the closest touch of the explosions.Near the blasts was a store house for old cannons.The entire contents of the building was hurled in all directions for a distance of four thousand yards.

The soldiers who were in fort St John the Baptist took refuge in the yards of the fortress when the concussions began but nothing seemed to afford protish of safety. But in a few minutes during the last shocks the concussion hel shattered some of these walls to the ground though they were nine yards thick, and the roof crushed in.Materialsand wreckage fell heavily into the yards.Terrified they sought refuge in the wooded country but before long the rain of wreckage hurled u h up by the distant explosions fell so heavily that they were drive driven into the battery where they placed themselves behind the heavier guns some of which were driven from their place by the force of the shocks.

When the fog broke after the disaster the whole country side li looked as if it had been blasted by a most gigantic tornado, fo flood and fire at the same time and of a whole forest,not a leaf, scarce even a branch remained on upon the stoutest trees. Yet I can probably say that this great disaster must not be confounded with other great disasters of the war just having occurred.The worse effects of this disaster were experienced not only in war striken Galvarinia and Angelinia but also in northern Galvarinia, and southen southern Abbiaquania.

While was just now the only series of explosions which had equaled the rage of the worse earthquake in the world and had left a dreadf l collection in the minds of all people in Abbiaannia.No other explosion disaster was ever in the whole world the occasion of a parliamentary address or a public fast.Even by the tidal waves caused by the concussions of the explosions whole fleets of ships of every description had been cast or swept away.Scores of thousands of large mansions were worth millions of dollers apiece,had been shaken down by the concussions.One grand duke and arch friend of Emperor Vivian had been buried beneath the ruins of his palace.A score of cities and towns ruined by the severe concussions were then mated by the wicked hordes of raiding ,bandalinians and the frightened inhabitants driven off without even their personal belongings.Hundreds of thousands of families were in mourning.The greatest trees of all kinds, large and s all, and the ruins of so many countless houses attests to all parts nearest the explosions, the fury of their blasts.

The largest city nearest the explosion were Annisdale,here by the very noise of the blasts thousands of the most solidly constructed houses were completely demolished and one wing of the state hospital had two wings completely thrown down.The force of the explosions had imparted such a rate of speed to materials of every description that nearly all of them penetrated through stone walls, thick doors, and other solidly constructed objects.....

A large piece of steel blown from a railroad trucks thirty nine yards long, with the tires still adherred to it was curled through the air with such tremendous velocity that it went straight through a stout oak tree one hundred and eighteen inches in diameter dispositing the tire in a straight pile at the foot of the tree and flying flinging others about five hundred feet away.

Many pieces of wood of all lengths and widths or projected by the force of the explosions along hard ground and roads were driven yards deep into the soil.Large iron railings and fences in front of many big buildings were literally shattered to pieces.Large quantities of the debris by the great explosions were hurled so far that they fell upon Monmouth street of the town of the same name fifty miles distant. Many big guns were hurled from two batteries high into the air and these in fall ng crashed through the ro ofs of many houses.

The many vessels vessels which were in the harbor of Annisdale disappeared and some ships were said to have been lifted out of the harbor by the force of the distant blasts and wrecked in the very air by flying materials at the same time.Other ships were said to have been hurled by the force of the air waves upon the crests of one of one of the tidal waves and some flung a distance beyond the range reached by the waves themselves.

When a big war transport steamer was hurled out of the harbor by the effects of the explosion to a point twenty feet above the highest known tides.One of the inhabitants who had escaped said the explosions were sudden terrific volcanic eruptions from the ground, accompanied by earthquakes, and the tidal waves and that the great clouds filled with enormous flashes were so to speak hurled upward to a height of a hundred thousand feet, and the sky from horizon to horizon full of shooting fire much higher than the clouds, and a tumult of crashing thunder that seemed to split the earth.These last mentioned events were however quite true but that of the height of the cloud, flashes, and of volcanic eruptions were complete exaggerations probably that man was either insane, or too confused by the turmoil going on of [illegible] with the second year of the war between the months of

'll around himwhen his housesxwas destroyed to note with strict scientific accurancy what really took place.Nothing we believe has yet ever happened during volcanic disturbances themselves even during the fiercest volcanic eruptions the world has ever known which could or has ever shot clouds so high in one series of explosions which could properly be described in the words used by the survivor.Probably when an eruption blows a hole in the earth as wide as the Pacific Ocean it may u hurl clouds a hundred thousand feet into the air at one outburst of a few seconds duration but in such a ''when'' I will say always ''Never.Never.Never''

A remarkable illustration of the terrible and sudden nature of the distaster was afforded by the experience of a number of tug boat crews.At the moments before the explosions they had been running their big tug in the river near the harbor.they were traveling up the river without any fear or anxeity whatever.

Shortly about eight oclock in the evening there was an q awful noise like that of a volcanic eruption near. uddenly the cry came''the waters are up.''

Jumping up they looked out and saw a monsterous high wave with its crest top gleaming in the flashes; it seemed like a flash, in an instant his boat was rising on high, they fastened on a life belt in a few minutes, another wave came rolling on and the tug boat was smashed to splinters, they paddled around in the water all the night long with the help of the life belts.

They all managed to reach shore.The total destruction of life probably surpassed any which had been produced in the same space of time by any violent battle.

War correspondents and news paper writers and reporters after a personal inspection of the afflicted districts came to the conclusion that in Anniedale alone not less than four hundred twenty five thousand persons lost their lives out of a population of three million.They also distributed the other fatalities as follows; City of Lucy Lane with its neighborhood city of gearcoss possessing a population of one million five hundred and thirty seven thousand had lost about a fourth of that number.Yeakerglen with a population of five hundred thousand, and Edgewater junction with a population of two million two hundred and twenty two thousand lost that two hundred and twenty two thousand in dead. and of Allendale out of a total population of one million sixty five thousand more, more than one fifth perished, or two hundred fifteen thousand lost their lives.

To this terrible human mortality must be added a most tremendous destruction of animal life which though it was not being felt acutely at this present moment would soon form an obstacle too tremendous to explain to agricultural operations by the survivors a few months hence.

''Well may the government of Abbiaannia''remarked Emperor Vivian''express the opinion that this calamity is scarcely parelled in the annals of all history. It will take many years before the afflicted districts will be able t recover from its effects and it will be a lanemakr landmark in the war of such calamities.''

The swiftness of the catastrophe caused by the enemy was indeed most terrifi terrific and the reader may gather from the effects of the concussion that the great air waves created by the dreadful noise of the explosions literally flashed out over the land with apparently the force of almost violent cysli cyclone and that simultaneously the vast destruction of life andproperty was completely made.

The explosion also caused a tremendous flood as the concuswion of the explosions bursted some of the high levees of the Rio-Hollester gun river.The flood was the most aw u part awful part of the disaster.fifty villiages were swept entirely away and thousands drowned.In this awful part of the calamity the greatest sweep of the disaster I would say caused a flood of the worse kind which had ever fallen on any part of the world since the time of God's flooding the world to destroy the wicked.Not even the horrible floods in India, Chinia or elsewhere could compare to it.At Lisbonnia fifty thousand persons were drowned all the houses wrecked and many swept away.The ultimate cause of the big flood was clearly because of the heavy shocks of the explosions.The big levees of this mighty river was constructed by human hands and was of a very sound condition the even evidence being constantly telegraphed that they were kept in a very sound condition, and thus the shocks must have had terrible force to have leveled them at that distance.

When they broke there was a flood of waters wholly beyond calculation or arrewt, a rush of water that even overflowed every otherssmaller river in the nation till the water could not pass under the highest bridges and which probably far exceeded in aggregate volume the worse floods in China.

CHAPTER TWENTY FIVE.

ONE OF THE DISASTERS OF THE WAR, THAT WOULD ALWAYS BE MEMORABLE IN CALVERINIA...
OTHR FREAKS OF THE DISASTERS//////...!!!

THE MASS OFVFLOO D waters, rose, and rose and rushed with incred ble speed added by the new asso accessions from the breaks in the levees, till its pressure was unen eurable.The unbroken masses of flood waters with its crest reared sixty feet high into the air like a tidal wave from the Ocean, and throwingbout rolling clouds of spry spray which was blinding its full length or extent, rushed on with the roar of an angry sea and only took two hours and fifty minutes to move through woods and over plains, carrying all before it and tore through and over cities and villiages of that zsection of the Mic-Hollester Run valley as if they were not existing.

Of any of the cities and towns swept by the full force of the b flood, not one building stood, and for instance the city of Pinner, a city of two hundred and fifty thousand people,, and here most of the houses were of wood only, and all swept away like logs and drift woods their many inmates screaming within thim them for help but in vain.

One of many eye witnesses told a reporter that every space swept by the flood, that gh the country once covered by woods and towns and villiages became like a stretch of wawaste ground, there was nothing to id indicate that there had been anything l else than what was, all swept as clean and as clear of forest debris and wreck of towns as though there had never been anything there.In realty this part of the Mic-Hollester Run valley, was the center of one of the most beautiful spots in that part of the nation.Beautiful towns and villiages and forest glens covered it thickly.

The streets of every city and vilage were most beautifully pafed paved and their sidewalks were of bricks,, blocks, aspualt and most substantial stone.The smallest of these towns had excellent street cars and lines gas and eletric ligh in lighting systems and telephone and telegraph service and all the other improvements of a big substantial city of onehundred thousand or more inhabatants.

Countless uron bridges which spanned many streams, and the buildings of all the towns and cities were of the most substantial character.After the flood swept by there was not a single brick remaining, not a single stone, not one stick of timber.In all this wide territory t ere there was not even the smallest mounds to shoq where the once sea of floating wreckage might be covered with a layer of mud.They were now gone, e ery city and town, every single street, every sidewalk, pavement wtreet railway, everything else that covered the ground, there and these had vanished befor before the flood as though they had never been there.The ground for hundreds of miles wasxswept completely clean as though some mighty cyclone and tidal wave at the same time had swept over it a hundred times.

Not efeb the lines of the streets of all these cities and towns could be exactly traced.As the ernormous flood sea was moving at nearly fourty ro to sixty miles an hour the very beasts of the land could not and did not escape,, flight for any animal or human being at the shortest distance from a hill had been almost impossible and it was fearse that the official estimate of the dead was far within the truth and that e even the private reports of the war correspondents and estimators, fifteen hundred thousandmay be dreadfully exceeded beyond comprehension.

It was certain that the tremeneous slaughter o laborers and whole encampments upon encampments of soldiers throughout the Mic-Hollester Run valley had been so exceedingly gr great that there was no one left to bury or cremate the ernormous sea of dead, and that in dear of a great pestilence spread, not so much by the str stench of the corpses as by their effects on all drinking water the emperor o Abbieannia had ordered fulldivisions ofmilitia to assist in forieng as many Clandelinian prisoners as possible in the painful and horrifying task.

And to add to the horror of the tragedy an w ernormousportio of the poeple and soldiers destroyef were not drowned or struck senseless, but burned alive. All the tte trees of the forest swept away by the forve of the flood and rush of other debris carried by the flood had formed a huge barricade at the point where the flood had lost its fullest power, and probably millions of wooden houses and other debris and shant es and even logs and jams of trees had been weilded by the flood sea into a most huge raft onehundred and sixty miles o long and sixty acres in breadth and thirty to seventy feet in height which stopped against the barricades of trees formed too strong to give way before the rest of the flood, and o t catching fire at many spots formed a most tremendous blaze one f the fiercest blazes the world had ever seen in ins its existance since the creation the full widty and extent and burned on steadily for says even after the flood receded under the eyes of the thousands may scores of thousands of spectators who attempted all des er desperate and fensi frenzied attempts at rescue.Amid such a scene of volcano of flame and din and seas of dense smoke which shrouded and covered the sky for hundreds of miles the destruction of property swemed to not to mat er matter but a fine of more than eight hundred million dollars levied by wars disturbances on a moment on a retion populated by eighteen million must mean forvthe survivors ruin which anywhere would probably be j hopeless and even in 'bbieannia will take ut much of the happiness from life during a generation.

The scale of the fierce calamity was of course not wholly unexpected.And probably it could and would not be nothing when compared withthe destruction of general Baldwins encampments at the battle of Deli ht's junction when a quarter of a million sold ers on the christian side persihed in a single charge, or with the more greater horrible disaster at the battle of Evangelinia Cra ia and Sunbeam Creek at and at Surandecallio which destroyed in lrss than three days or more nine teen million soldiers, or with the explosion at the mouth of the Aronburgs Run which swept away a third of the people, and shook all parts of thevnation with the most damaging effects, or with the horrible flood ceused by the enemy bursting dikes and levees of the Aronburgs Run where the flood in less than six hours drowned more than ten million men women and children, and onehundred and fifty thousand soldiers and caused samage too ernormous to imagine.

The scale however at this latest disaster is too large to think of and when the fate of the christian people is compared to it it is the scale of Abbieannia I unconscously emply and employ.

These scales of Abbieannia's big war disstar disasters which should have a profound effects upon our own thoufnts could of course be the results of many rebel made explosions worked by rebel min ng and other engineers and soldiers and during which the Abbieannians had noted the moderateness of all past disasters of the war a moderateness so nearly unbroken that eve Violet and her sisters, the seven little Princesses of Abbieannia held the disasterous explosions at Jennis Vivian and Aronburgs Run which destroyed more than any other catastrophe an adequate reason for doubting the mighty destructive power of wicked Southern Angelinia, and her Clandelinian states.When the sun rose in the morning after the flood spent itself, it shown upon a desolate country and shivering s terror stricken bad band of survivors who at first were not agle to realise what kind of a calamity it was that had so suddenly overwhelmed them that same time of the explosions.

Many how ever had been snatched from imminent death in the most astonishi astonishing and wonderful ways, some some had been able to catch hold to a friendly piece ofwood board or fragm nt of wreckage floating past them, and many had been swept into floating trees where they were held tightly by the branches untill the flood waters had subsided.

Persons living in towns and villiages not damaged by the flood, were ost astonished and could not believe their eye sight at the appearance of the corpses of somany strangers, men wh women and children in the midst of every one of their streets, a d it was not k untill the extent of the awful calamity became widely known that it was found there were few Calverinian and Northern Angelinian homesteads cities, towns famrs and villiages and country homes that had not had dead bodies washed into them from so great a distance.

These explosions of course had force enu enough to create extreme damage on a large scale. hat had been known respecting the wide spread destructiveness of concussions produced by explosions ve varying inversely with the range of distance must not of course be understood to si signify that the sudden air waves produced by the explosions as necessarily less destructive than the ground concussions or the shocks less destructive than the air vibrations.I there refered to both.As a explosion has a greater force its effects are most destructive, as they are muffled they loss power.But it is the force of the strange air vibrations that roduce the most terrible effects.An explosionwhen small can have only destructive effects at a local section, and then of course the range of its destructive action is limited to only the spot where it occurs.

Many explosions made or caused by both sides in this big war have been so small that when they have occured with force enough to work mischief there space of destruction have been mere lanes or spots compared with a whole country devastating effects of these tremendously big ones.The explosions of shrapnell hage not unfrequently spent their fury in the upper air, or have torn off the upper parts of forest trees without moving orvtouching the lower branches, and houses placed on a hill have been wrecked by the air vibrations caused t by the thunderous reportsof of shrapnell while others in a valley or meadow scarce a hundred feet lower had not suffered at all.One witness thus described the fury of this tremeneous blast as he had witnessed it;

"I heard a far distant booming sound as if some volcanic eruption had broken out.I have heard in my youngest daysand seen many and surprised by the sound I look 3d in the direction of the terrible noise and I was at that moment still more surprised to hear a distant sound of a most extraordinary nature, and as I rose to my feet I observeoenormous clouds white and black rising high into the sky along the horizon, the sudden appearance of which was very new to me.

Little time was left for to me for any consideration as the next moment a fresh crash roared forth with seemingly a million loud rolling echoes and the concussion threw me flat on my face and fiercely agitated the trees in the woods close to me. The distant noise andcorupto eruption of cloudsincreassed to an unexpectedcdeg ree and so severe were the concussions though that I had regained my standing posture I felt that I was almost thrown again off my feet and the trees vibrated so hard that the smaller branches and twigs fell tward the ground, and the leaves fell in a dense cloud.

Two seconds more had scarcely elasped when more eruptions of smoke in the distance occured with a startling increase in the concussions that put the whole forest g before me in the most fearful motion even for a moment.At that short space of time I saw to my greatest astonishment that the noblest trees vibrated so before the concussion that they literally fell to pieces.The branches broke off with a loud crackling noise, and elsewhere the upper parts of the trunks went, and even whole trees of the most gigantic size fell entire to the ground.so rapid was the progress of this strange disturbance that berore I could even think to take measures to insure my safty the worse of the strange performance oc ured occured.

There was a terrible rolling thundering noise in the distance there was a terrible blinding d s display of flashes likeaill one of fireworks lightning and a volcanic eruption at the same time and so severe was the concussion that I could never forget the scene which at that moment presented itself.Before something of which I know not which, the tops of the trees for two seconds were seen moving in the strangest manner as if the central current of an irrestible tempest and there fell a mingled mass of twigs and foliage that completely obscured the view.

Some of the n leargewt trees suddenly snapped acrosss and many after a moments vio violent shimmying fell uprooted to the ground or stood inclinded like the town tower of Pisa in every direction.The mass of twigs, branches, fol i foliage and everything that fell descended like the most dense cloud of feathers and soon there werecwide spaces filled with broken trees, naked stumps and heaps of shapel esforest ruin which showedcto me which I thought was the strongest and most mysterious disturbance, I had ever observed in my life time or that any one living hundreds of years ago had ever known of had they ever witnessed it.The horrible noise of the vibrating forest resembled that made by the tearing of the forest by a most terrific cyclone and all this scene and noise here and along the h r horizon produced a feeling within me which I could and never would be able to describe correctly to save my life.

I observe the pric principal force of the disturbance was now over though high in the sky I observe to my fresh surprise millions of large and small obk objects seeming to float as if drawn there by some strange mysterious power, and a large peculiarly colored sky hun cloud hung overhead and move slowly forward and upward.After crossing through the woods to his own town close by he found to his surprise and horrorthat many houses were in ruins and in the streets already strewn with wreckage materials of every destruc description were now falling in a manner which was causing great surprise and excitement among the survivors.

By the concussion many houses in this town had been suddenly wrecked or thrown down.

Thes fell as if hundreds of batteries had opened a heavy fire at once upon them.Hundr hundreds may thousands of people were buried beneath the ruins.The few that had escaped could hqrdly understand what had happened, and believed that in the midst of a dead calm a violent tornaod had suddenly struck.They even believed for a while that the end or the world had suddenly come to an end.Even by the very concuswion men women and e en children were hurled over hedges, others were cut to pieces by strange machis ry that fell into their midst, others without being actually hurt were so terrified that they died from the effects of their fright with the course of a day.

So fierce was the air vibrations, and earth concussions that whole rooms walls and roofs were completely turned upside down so as to be no longer recognizable.At other points many buildings were literaly pulveri sed.

In the city thousands of the biggest and trees of all sizes were thrown down and all lay down one way like what sheaves in astraightline.Even houses appeared as if gutted inside without being shaken down.Many trees to make the mystery stillmore greater were found completely scourched and burned while others remained fresh and t green.

yew disasterscould ever more become more memorable than these.It also caused great shipwrecks and disasters all over the country.All people trembled at its fury and the coasts were strewn with wrecks and bodies of the drowned.The effects were felt not o ly that in that part of Calverinia but also in some parts of Angelinia and Abbisania.

Q d And also in southern parts of Calverinia.Nearly every war correspondent and newspaper reporter mentioned this great disaster and the effects of the calamity made so deep and solemn an impression upon other nations of the world that one wonders at the fury of it.

How did the enemy bring about these big explosions?

was it thecsetting afire of immense so store houses of heavy and high explosives by the hundred thousand ton, or by the making of gigantic mines?.

Authorities widly differ.

Some speak of the explosions as being caused by a million tons of explosions put in mine galleries by the enemy.Ot ers stated that the enemy blew up a munit on sotre storehouse holding countless tons of high explosives at Clarenden city which had been blown out of existance where the blast actually occured, though it boasted of nearly a hundred thousand inhabatants.One other said the cause of the great explosion were a most profound mystery of which only the enemy knew.A war correspondent says the disaster was the cause of some christian general's blunder.Another sa d said that aw after acareful examination f of all the records the explosion broke forth because of a forest fire then raging near Cedernine and implies that the biggest fire the war had had yet wi was either si set by the enemy or by the battle itself. Yet it is in the hour of such great calamities when the full average will be palsied and ordinary men are weaklings that soldiers who have the vogor of mind an thv force of character to fully comprehend the cobditions conditions and meet all t e the requirments are revealed.

Onevthing that could be revealed was the existance or experience of a certain Angelinian officer during the flood and his work afterwards.It or in the city of Moffet a few minutes after the explosion there was a most heavy rain of earth debris wreckage of every description and a loud distant noiseaccompanied by violent concussions of the ground.A half hour later it appeared that the city was being surrounded by a raging flood.

Even at this time the strange materials were still falling from the sky and as the streets were already covered with swiftly running water an Angolinian officer who was there at the time started for the city limits to get a view of the flood.At that hour the water in the streets had risen untill it reached the very hubs of wagon wheels.

The people of the city were somewhat alarmed at the unusual appearance of the flood but yet no one could have thought that the flood would become any more serious than it really was.Shortly after Colonel Maner reached the citylimits he saw many small buildings carried away by the sea of waters.The colone noticed that the flood was swift and muddy and realized that these scenes meant a most dr destructive kind of a fo flood.He then hurriedly started for the main part of the town and told all the excited and anxious people he met that they had bester seek refuge in the upper parts of the stronger buildings.When he reached P agodo street the first strong force of the floods current struck and a full bl ck of buildings within his sight went down.

And yet though the distant strangeexplosions had ceased the strange materials still continued to fall be ng mingled with mazonry, bricks slates, fragments of trees and the like.He himself was then wading and swi ming through an average of five feet of water and was kept busy dodging live wires that sputtered and burned in every direction.All that time it was almost impossible to avoid the falling materials which in striking the water made great geysers like spa splashes to the height of from six to twenty feet.

He finally reached his home at thirteenth and Lwve Lovewell streets where he threw off his uniform and putting on his bathing suit he made himself ready for work.At that time there was no one in the building.By tyis time the water was running furiously through vevery one of the streets, and yet the air was still full of falling materials.At this moment a large raft thirty yards long and ten wide came along as if propelled by steam being loaded with men women, and children.

-his was secured and towed tward and fastened to the building.By means of ropes and lines this huge raft was used during the day and night in the desperate and brave work of rescueing persons who were carried on the flood past the building.

In this way the colonel with the assistance of other rescuers rescued three hundred and eighty persons during the day and night.By three oclock in the morning the flood had abated almost entirely.The water had gone doa down as rapidly as it had risen untill it was almost gone.The worse danger being over the colonel left to seek friends in another part of the city and finding them safe he returned in the hope of being of some service i the down town districts.

Store windows had been broken by the flood, where the buildings were not destroyed and crowds of people were seen crawling over heaps of rubbish and going in and out of stores in the most woeful manner.Everything was chaoes.

Corpses of people a d of animals lay in every direction.Large knots of people were standing on the streets and corners frightened out of their wits, while many crazy men and women walked up and down the streets weeping and wailing at the tops of their voices.A little beyond this spot about fifteen suspicious looking men appeared and he overheard a plan among them to set the ruins on fire and cause the total destruction of the city.But he single handed placed the gang under arrest and bringing them t to the police headquarters found it partically wrecked, but nevertheless an officer on guard showed him whereto put the prisoners.Not long after he had a band of soldiers under his command within ten minutes with what they were needed for doingduty.

Two hours after he had more than one soldier on guard at almost every point of f vantage and set others to clear the wreckage of what dead they could find.The colonel himself wore out five or six hou horses in a day in making his rounds night and day to seethat his men did their duty.The troops mixed as they were nevertheless behaved most nobly.There was strict descipline but no case of insubordination.There were also beliefs among the soldiers that the colonel would shoot any man who might be found sleeping whileon duty, or inclined to disobedience of the slightest orders.

And the men worked so long as they had strength to work. Every day they had to bathe their feet in cold water to get on their shoes and many walked miles when on duty when they should have been in the base hospital.There were no complaints. Every man of the best business, and professional men of this city were in the ranks and worked as hard as any one.Even chuldren volunteered for work butbim this ease they were refused.Even the colonel himself had no rest from the time he undertook the command of the troops and city forces untill he was relieved by general Alls and during that time he had nothing to eat e xcept an occasional loaf of bread and a cup of coffee taken in the saddle.

The work of disposing of the dead was the most horrible in the stricken city. Many thousands of glandelinian prisoners had been brought and the soldiers drove all of them at the point of the bayonet to assist in the wa work telling them that as their comrades caused it by disasterous explosions it was more than right to make them repair the havoc wrought.Many of the Glandelinian prisoners did say;

''For the sake of Neptune don't make us do that.We won't do it.You can shoot us if you want to but we can't and won't do that.''

The only answer was;

''Load with ball cartridge-------take aim'' but fortunately that was as far as it was necessq necessary to go.The glandelinians acted wiser, and went to work.For fear of glandelinian vandals every one in all ruined towns caused by the series of disasters armed themselves in some way.Even elder children carried large carling knives especially boys concealed about them and little girls carried pistols.Arms in large numbers were bought from gun and ammunition stores.The cities and towns were also under martial law and all citizens themselves were enrolled in all branches of public service but the bost arms were placed in the hands of the military.

All good citizens were advised to carry arms they could rely on, as shot guns, rifles, pistols, and so on, and to keep plenty of ammunition about their person.But all strangers were forbidden to carry arms except by written permission from the Mayors of the cities and towns only.

In deed the people of the town of Moffet were very grateful for the work the colonel had done to protect life and property.When civil law superseceded martial law he and his followers were tended the greatest ovations wherever he went.Even on his way to Angelinia Agathia he was tendered great ovations and at the mobolis tion camps at porothy & Gale city a whole Abbisannian army recieved him, and he was asked to eat a military luncheon at the c i chief generals headquarters, and the Concentinian cavarly turnedout as a guard of honor to escort him and his brave troops to the raip railway station.

The colonel had that day almost fallen from the saddle from faintless caused by a lack of food and sleep, and the luncheon revived him considerably.

I407.

Hard and reprobat as the Godless glandelinian general John Manley, seemed now, there had been a time when he had been rocked on the boso of a Saintly mother, cradled with an ocean of prayers, and Catholic Hymns, his now seared brow bedewed with the waters of Holy Bapitsm. In early child hood a fairhaired woman had led him to the sound of the Church bells to worship and to pray. For years that beautiful mother, had trained her four sons with long unwa unwearied love and patient prayers. Born of a hard tempered Glandelinian on whom that gentle mother and wife had waisted a world of unvalued love, the Manleys had followed in the steps of their father, johnston Jacken Manley . They had become boisterious, unruly and tryannical, they despised all her good council, and would have none of her reproofs and at an early age broke frok her to seek their fortunes on the Angelinian seas, and it was at this time when they became exceedingly wicked. They never came home but once, and then their mother with the yearning of her heart, that must love something, and has nothing else to love clung t o them and sought them with passionate prayers and the tearful entra entreaties to win them from their life of sin to their souls internal good.

That was the day of Grance for the four Manleys, then good angels called to them, then they were a lmost persauded, and mercy held them by the hand. Their hearts inly silent relented, there was a conflict----- but sin got the victory, and they set all the force of their roughh nature against the convictions of their conscience, and became more wilder and brutal than ever, and one night when their mother in the last agony of t her despair, knelt at their feet and begged them in overflowing tears to amend their lives, the glandelinian fools spurned her from the , them, and john Manley threw her senseless on the floor, and with brutal curses ordered his child slaves to get to work, and then oridered the massacre at Crowley, then the Manleys left to command armies more wicked than themselves. The last the Manleys heard of their mother was when one day, as he was then advancing his armies into Angelinia in the attempt to make that disasterous and futile invasion in the north a letter was put into his hands. He opened it and a lock of curly hair, fell from it and twined about his fingers.

The mothe letter told him that his mo ther was ta en taken out of a burning house, and she had died in des despair declaring that she blessed and forgave him and his borthers. Manley burned the hair, and burned the letter, uttering the most vile curses against his own poor Saintly mother, and shook his fist as if he wished to tear somebody to pisces. The night after the battle of Aurandecallic Manley had slept more soundly than usual Oh how dares the bad soul to enter sleep, that land whose dismoutlines lies so fearfully near to the magic scenes of retribution. Manley dreamed. In his heavy and feverish sleep a veiled form stood beside him, and laid a cold soft hand upon him. He thought he knew who it was, and shuddered with creeping horror though the face was veiled.

Then he thought he felt the hair twinded about his fingers, and then that it slid smoothly around his neck, and tightened, and tightened, and tightened, and he could not draw his breath;----- and then he thought voices whispered to him in sound that chilled him with inortal horror. Then it seemed to him that he was on the verge of a frightful black abyss holding on and struggling in mortal fear, while dark hands stretched up and were pulling him over, and then his child war victims came up behind him laughing and pushing him, and then appeared that solume veiled figure, and drew aside the veil. It was his mother, and she turned away from him, and he fell down down amid a confused noise of unearthly shrieks, and groans and shouts, of unearthly demon laughter and howls.

For some remarkable reason ghostly legions were commoningly reif about this time among the officers around Manleys headquarters. It was whisperingly ass erted asserted that footsteps in the dead of night had been heard patrolling the house. In vain all the doors had been locked, the series of ghosts oe legions entered either carrying duplicate keys in their pockets, or availed themselves of ghosts immororal priviliages of coming through the keyholes, or through doors or walls and promenaded as before with a freedom that was alarming.

Aurthorities were somewhat divided as to the outward forms of the spirits, owing to the custom quite prevailent among ghost stories written, though it was mostly ghosts of girl children, with their naked bodies cut to pieces, and their entrails falling or exposed. Others of invariably putting the eyes and covering up the heads under blankets, petticoats, of whatever else might come into use for a shelter in these occasions. Of course everybody knows when the bodily eyes are thus out of the list, the spiritual eyes are uncommon lyvivicious and perrpicious and therefore there was abundances of full length portraits of the ghosts that were not nad naked abund abuntantly no swore and testified to which as if is often the case with pr portraits zagreed with each other in no particular except the common family perculiarly of the ghost tribe, the wearing of white sheets with eyes blazing like coals of fire ad hands throwing tongues of flame.

The poor souls were not versed in histories. Be it as it may the glandelinian officers had private reasons for knowing that torn and bleeding figures did walk at the most ap roved ghostly hours around general Manleys headquarters, pass out the doors, glide about the house, disappear, at intervals, and reappearing, pass u up the silent stairways into the garrents, and that in the morning the sentry doors were found shut and locked as firm as ever.

From the garrents every night proceeded most dolsful and lugtrious wailing and moaning sounds of children, h which at intervals increased to a perfect shrieking such as to credulious and superstitious ears might easily seem to be that of horror and despair. Those sounds were from timeto time plainly heard by the officers on windy days and revived in full force the memory of the ghost legionds. A superstituious ree ing me reeking horror seemed to fill the very house and though no one dared to breathe it to Manley, he found himself encompassed by it as by an atmosphere. Manley could not help overhearing the whispers about it and it was all the more exciting to him, from the pains that were taken to conceal it from him.

He became more cruel than usual, held up his head briskly, swore louder than over in the day time, but at night he had bad dreams and the visions of his head on his bed were anything but agreeable. While he slept there came over his sleep a shadow of horror, an apprehension of something dreadful hanging over him. He heard a confused noise of screams and groanings, and with it all he knew he was asleep, and he struggled to wake himself and succeeded. Indeed he was sure that something was coming into his room. He knew the doors were open, but he could not stir hand or foot. At last he turned with a start--------the doors were indeed open and he saw a small bloody hand, putting out his light, which he had set at the head of his bed. It was a cloudy misty moonlight, and there he saw them, mangled forms, gliding in by scores. He heard the still patter, patter of the torrents of blood as they stood still by his bed with all their ex entestines exposed, cold hands touching his bed and some his own hands while some childish voice said three times in a fearful whisper;

"See what you have done. See what you have done! See what you have done!Ai n't you sorrowful now to have killed us this way?"

And while he lay sweathing with terror he knew not when or how the mangled forms were gone and not a trace of blood on the floor was seen while the candle at the foot of his bed was relighted. He sprang out of bed and pulled at the doors, but they were shut and locked. He li lit anothet light and looked closely for the blood he had heard fall. There was no trace of it, and the man fell down in a swoon.

Two hours later when he recovered, Manley indeed seemed past repentance, past prayer, and past hope, because his experience only made him worse from sheer terror. He did not even believe that God would have mercy on him and that repentance was useless, because he had been long excommunicated from the Catholic Church, and because all the catholic Priests, nuns, and other Religious had been long before massacred at his orders even the Cardenals, Manley having at that time vowed that he would get rid of all Catholics in galverinia or know the reason why. So now when he knew that he did this, ge had no hope of forgiveness, not even from his w own dear mother, even though he felt remcursel remcurseful when he thought of his treatment of her. When he learned that through some cause that the vivian Girls were praying incessantly for his conversion, he only laughed and said to his own officers and to even his father and brothers;

"To hell with them stinking Vivian Girls. God hates me and so he won't forgive me no matter if I cry myself to death for my sins. Praying for my conversion eh! They ought to pray for their own safty, the little devilish guttersnips, ad and centepedes of hell.."

DO THEIR PRAYERS SEEM IN VAIN.!

Poor little Violet and her sisters. Did their prayers seem in vain.! They knew that poor Manley Had been excommunicated, but yet they hoped he would be converted before it was too late. They even had Masses said for him every day, sped spending all their little earnings for Manleys conversion, making promishes to God and offering Novenas bythe score. Yet it seemed as if Manley was beyond hope indeed. General Gen Galmannia Shoemannia was in some stages a more wicked man than Manley himself, before he entered the war but under his power woe to the glandelinian soldiers who slaughtered helpless children, destroyed churches, and the like if he found them out. S Shoemannia had seenthe true likeness of the vivian Girls when they were first brought before him andhad defended them against the Masonic glandelinians. Manley had promished heavy rewards to any of the glandelinian privates or generals who would murder the vivian Girls in any way, whether they spied or not, and Shoemannia hearing of this wicked plot of threatened assassination, longed to warn them but he could never see them as they never for a time approached his lines. And he had a feeling that if Manley died a sinner the vivian Girls could probably dis of broken hearts. It was one day while the last great struggle was going on that terminated the seige into a sweeping christian victory, when the Vivian girls riding across the stream to see Evans had to cross a good portion of the enemys territory and were seen by a score of Shoemannians, Shoemannia being in the rear, and not knowing what was going on. Shoemannia however suspected they were spying, and reluctantly gave the order to catch them, but inwardly hoped they would escape, and he decided to free them on the sly if they did n get caught. The little girls saw the hostile men coming tearing after them on swift horses, so they urged on their own steeds and raced away.

Shoemannia gave orders to his men not to fire unless the little girls fired first, and then only shot low enough to bring down their horses. The glandelinians saw the little girls dashing across a stream and followed after them, Shoemannia shouting to them to stop. Violet and her sisters drawing back saw that Shoemannia was far in the lead racing tward a certain part of the creek where the water was only a foot deep. They seemed to him to look out that it was quicksand but in a moment more his horse was floundering in the quagmire and the glandelinians were too far off to render him any aid or see the peril he was in.

"Quick we must rescue him if not his horse, though enemy in warfare." Whispered Violet.

"But how can we, we have no ropes." Answered Joice.

"I have a short one" Said Jennie uncoiling it quickly. "We may succeed with that."

They attempted this and though after desperate efforts they got Shoemannia nearer to safty they themselves all got caught in and beyond reach of Shoemaii s Shoemannia who was working his way to firmer ground. The soldiers came riding up at this ument and were amazed at what they saw. Violet and her sisters had sank up to their waists by this time and they thought themselves done for and were horror stricken at the thought of smothering under the quicksands in this helpless condition. Shoemannia being nearest to them and having reached firmer ground uncoiled the rope he had been rescued with and threw it to one of the little girls. But alas it was too short. However three of the soldiers managed to swim t across the deepest part with ro es ropes tied around them and held at the other end by their comrades, and being well supplied with other ropes they soon had the little girls safe and sound on hard ground.

"I believe I will have to make myself your prisoner." Said Shoemannia to violet and her sisters. "You have rescue me and that is the only way I can reward you."

"We do not take prisoners, and have no part as yet in the war whatever excepting to tend to the wounded." Said Joice." s your men were chacing us we were supposed to be your prisoners."

"Well then neither os us are prisoners." Answered Shoemannia "You little girls have saved my life at the risk of your own, and so I'll let you go also. But hurry before the rest of my men get across."

But at this moment the rest appeared having r crossed at the deepest fording. Shoemannia halted them, told them what had happened, and asked them if they would keep it a secret if he would let the vivian Girls go.

"Seeing that they rescued you and as your our main leader we will be willing to consent even without your oders your excellency excellency." Said one of the men. "but since they were spying or at least making us suspicious from being within our terrir territory that old reporbate of a Manley might hear of it any way and you might get into trouble."

"Damn that Manley. They had rescued me and I'm going to let them go no matter what happens."

"Very well your excellency and hope you good luck from God." Said the soldier.

Shoemannia now went to violet and her sisters as and asked;

"These soldiers object to my letting you go for fear of Manley as they suspect you of spying. So I wish to ask you if you were spying when you and we first met. If so I'll have to arrest you but I and they will let you go when no one knows of our intentions at all. If not I cannot arrest you."

"No your excellency we were not spying." Said violet truthfully. "We were on our way to visit our friend a christian e general whose army is somewhere near by when we were surprised by yourmen coming a-tearing after us."

"Ha laughed Shoemannia" It's a mighty good thing we chased you as we did after all We saved you and you did not know it. Now listen and take my advise and do not go any further to the west of the woodland where the christian line is for you will encounter a portion of Manleys line a little to the middle of these woods! There are no more christian lines in these directions whatever as they had surged forward tward Evangelinia Granda and Norman Cessinia and taken the places and carried all our positions Manley would be only too glad to get you, and cut you to pieces, and has already been planning your assassination in cold blood. o take warning and go by a different rout. As long as you little girls were not spying I will not be obliged to take you prisoners, and I did not want to persue you anyway but we suspected you of spying and had to do it to prevent the men from firing onyou on sight. Now go home before any more of the glandelinians see you!."

"Though you are on an opposite side you have proven our friend." Said violet. "And we hope hope that some day we can do as much for you."

With this they were off. Indeed violet and her sisterswere touched at Shoemannias actions for they had not expected to meet him once again. they rode off in another direction keeping, on the watch as enemies may be everywhere that may not be Shoemannias. It was late in the evening of Feburary the sixth hewhen they came in sight of general Jack Ambrose Evans and a number of the soldiers went out to escort them inside the little lines the Angelinians wondering how the little girls got covered with so much sand. Evans came forward to meet them.....

T4IO.

"I see that you little girls must have had some experience somewhere." He said.

"We were caught in quicksands." Answered Catherine.

"Quicksands-----and who in the name------of heaven-----rescued you? Surely you did not get out yourselves!"

Violet then told the whole story, leaving out nothing whatever.

"I believe you are making a great friend out of general Shoumannia" Said general Evans." So he offered himself as a prisoner and you would not take him!"

"No" Said little Jennie." He saved us from the wicked Glandelinians once and rescued s us from the sand after we all got caught, and as we even have no part in the war, we have no aurthority to arrest him anyway."

The little girls hastily changed their clothes, and then wh went in to Evans headquarters, who had a big supper ready for them. The evening was very cold and fearing that they would catch cold from their exposure and experience he placed a heavy blanket around each.

"Are you going to watch the progress of the next battle when it comes!" Asked general Evans as they started to eat.

"We don' care to unless we cannot help it." Declared Joice." Our papa does not want us to go near the firing lines for fear that we would get into needless danger."

"Neither do I." Said Evans placing a gentle hand on her pretty head." If any of you little girls were killed, I would be broken hearted. Where is your father, and who is he?"

"He is one of the main generals of the christian armies, and his name is general Robert Angelic Vivian." Cried Angeline." I thought you n knew..."

"General Vivian your father!" Gasped general Evans.." So then general Hanson Vivian is your uncle but I did not know that general Vivian was your father or his brother your uncle .I thought they were your big brothers."

"No he is our father, and general Hanson is our uncle. We have only one uncle and three gd brothers who had been reported dead not long ago, but which we found out, and so did our parents, that it was a false report."

"Not dead!" Gasped Evans." And you have three good brothers. Violet, and your sisters quit your fooling. I literally saw them die with my very eyes."

"Maybe you did see them die at that." Said violet, while her sisters smiled." And so did we. We thought you know the crafty Glandelinians and their ways by now. My three brothers had been severely wounded at the battle of Calverine, or saxton Run, and three dying men who were nursed, and who resembled our brothers very much told us that our brothers were only slightly wounded. They looked really like our brothers alright, but they were not though we wished they were as we love heroes. And only am we not fooling but we have absolute proofs. Heres a note sent to me by one of our brothers himself."

She produced a small roll of paper crumpled up and aged and handed handed it to general Evans. He at once recognized Jimmie Vivians writing. It was startling, the worfs of words of which he read;;;

"Dear violet and your sisters;

I have been x captured with my two brothers by a portion of our wicked brothers army, and transferee, and then held by federals men since now . There seems no hopes of escape unless you my sisters know it. Please take this news to your father, and ask him to find some way to rescue us.

Your loving brothers;

Germaine, George and Jimmie

Vivian ".

"How did this note reach you!" Asked Evans.

"I got it only three months ago." Answered Violet" I found a bottle with a paper in it floating down the Mc-Hollester River close to the bank and as I am an excellany excellant swimmer as well as my sisters, I swam after it, and secured it returning it to the shore, and found this note. And I can assure you he is free now with his two brothers and somewhere within the country making up new armies and taking command...."

Evans did not say anything further but embraced them and then went to his room to work over some plans he had while the little girls prepared for bed. The next morning violet and her sisters were planning someway to get to their brothers, and were walking along a stretch of beautiful trees when they heard the pounding roar of many horses and before they could dash ash aside a big body of Angelinian cavat cavarly led by general Jack Evans almost dashed upon them, and the little girls would have been trodden under foot had not the men swerved their horses in the nick of time.

T4II.

They did not even stop to the surprise of violet and her sisters and as soon as the la t of the large column passed there came the roar of some great clash. Violet and her sisters realized that something was up, and went to see where the cavarly had gone and soon came upon the scene of conflict, sabres being applied in an alarming fashion, the Glandelinians fighting with determined fury. The whole force of Glandelinians however had been surrounded by overwhelming numbers and so the survivors saw nothing else to do but to surrender which they did. The two generals and the colo colonel strove to get away but a score of Angelinians surrounded them with drawn sabres, and they gladly gave up their arms. Evans found important papers on one of the generals which he kept himself. The christians now started off tward the main line with their three thousand prisoners. This had indeed been a surprise for the Glandelinians as they had no idea whatever that any of the Angelinians were around. It was one of the cleverest deeds that general Jack Evans had ever done for he and his force of cavarly had captured the Glandelinians without a single shot or a single loss of life, while fifty Glandelinians had been killed, and over two hundred wounded. One of the Glandelinians generals was a grouch and he upbraided the Vivian girls for the occurance. The little girls did not pay any attention to the Glandelinians who believed that he had cowed them, and he grew worse and worse, and even started to call them names but soon the christian soldiers tiring of it threatened to cut him down if he did not stop his revilings. The soldiers soon reached the lines, and Evans and the little girls watched the men take the officers and privates before general Baldwin.

"You have caught good fish your excellency" He said laughing." Where did you get them?"

"My cavarly force went out fishing on land and capturing them and a thousand Glandelinians on the Zimmerman an crossroads." Said Evans." The number of men captured is about three thousand five hundred men altogether. I wish you to have them sent to the prison camps."

"Good I will do so." Said Baldwin." Are these officers child butchers!"

"I don't know" Said Evans.

"What shall we do with them?" Asked Baldwin.

"They may be held for exchange as long as they are not bh buc butchers." Answered Evans.

"You are alright your exd excellency." Declared Baldwin." You certainly can do wonders, and I hope general Hanson Vivian will reward you some day."

Evas Evans left the prisoners with Baldwin and then as they rode off Evans said to Violet;

"Violet can you imagine what was in those plans. If we had not secured them our cause would have been ruined."

"Goodness is that so!" Declared Violet." What were in those plans, and what were they going to do!"

"I can't tell you now it is too shocking." Said general Evans." Later on I will tell yo , but I can't now."

Th next day Evans went out with another force to see if he could find the whereabout of the last of the enemys positions which had not been captured as the foe had abandoned Evangelinia Crania, but "scovered that Violet n and her sisters had fallen into an ambush and were being carried off prisoners. The Glandelinians who had captured he Vivian girls brought them before general James Thompson accusing them of spying.

"We were not spying." said violet." Your men ambushed us. We were looking for somebody."

The general however confirmed by the men that they were spying ordered them to be brought out in the field camp and under a strong guard, and that the next day they would be transfered to the main camp.

"We stand for no more spies." He said in a surly manner." I do notbelieve in child slaughter, and so I do not intend to put you beaui beautiful little girls to death. We are literally hemmed in by the christian armies, Evangelinia Crania is already in their hands as well as all our fortifications, and Norma Oscinia also and if we allow you spies to escape we will be in for it . To morrow we will see to where you shlu should be sent without getting you into Manleys hands."

They were roughly led away by the men through the main city of tents, and out into an open field contrary to the officers orders, and not in the plains where they were commanded to take the little girls. They were each tied to a tree after being stripped half naked.

"We will torture you little centepedes first." Said one of the Glandelinians who was a major, and a brutal one at that." We have longed for the opportunity to get you, and now we have you. And we would like to see the God who would save you now."

The little girls did not answer but they feared they were going to go through the same ordeals like other slaughtered children had gone through. The Glandelinians decided among themselves that it was too good and only a waste of ammunition to shoot the Vivian girls, and that spies are supposed to be tortured to death. Yet it was hard to decide among themselves what to do first. At last one said;

"Let's go get some stout switches and beat them hard."

The switches were procured and these were about to be laid in cruel blows about the faces and bare arms of the poor little girls when came a loud voice;

"So this is what you captured them for you impudent sneaks."

And turning in dismay they saw general Thompson standing with drawn gun. He had followed them to see what they were going to do and had caught them in the act.

"Manley has said that all spies ought to be;------"

"To hell with Manley---"Interrupted general Thompson." They are in my possession, and not in old Manleys, and he has no word whatever to say about them. I said that they were to be put under guard in the outside camp on the plains, and you have brought them here in the glen instead to turture torture them. I have followed you to see exactly what you would do as I was suspicious in the first place of your accusations. You have committed the crime of insurbonination by disobeying my commands in this treacherious ways and you will suffer heavily for it. And also this gives a good proof before all in the heaven itself that they are what they call innocent, and are no spies whatever. Untie them in three qy quarters of a minute of or I'll blow you all to Kingdom come."

In the meai meantime Evans sweeping the snow covered fields with his glasses, had caught sight of the cruel actions prepared for, before Thompson came to butt in.

"Good God."He gasped.My little charges in the hands of brutal graycoats.I must go to the r rescue before it is too la te."

He quickly went back to his cavarly force and started off in haste for the scene. The ɠlandelinians had just released the ɣivian girls from the trees when the wild yelling hord of Angelinian horsemen burst upon them with a thunderous roar of horses hooves, and the twelve ɠlandelinians were immediately surrounded. Four of the soldiers quickly dismounted and lifted the seven ivian girls onto their own horses. All the ɠlandelinians except Thompson were tied firmly to eleven horses, while violet and her sisters gave a cry of joy as they saw general Jack Evans. Having seen his actions general Evans allowed Thom Thompson to go free and the general in gratitude said;

"Get out of here quick.The rest of the ɠlandelinians have seen you, and are tearing after you."

"Quick boys before the rest of the foe get's too close."Cried general Jack Evans. "Make for the christian lines."

Just as the three hundred Angelinians dashed away, a perfect swarm of ɠlandelinian horsemen came a tearing, and a fussilade f of shots were exchanged between them.

"Quick"Gasped Evans"They are gaining on us."

The Angelinians raced away like mad but therecwas absolute cert ainity that they would be overtaken, and that the only means was to make a desperate stand. The Angelinians reaching a long rocky ledge dismo dismounted and far formed a line behind the wall of stones and opened fire upon the ɠlandelinians with telling effect. Several men rushed toard the christian lines with their prisoners not being seen by the ɠlandelinians . Violet and her sisters also rode off onobserved by the enemy to bring he lp to general Evans. At the first onset scores of the enemy went down, but they soon went at it again, and the fight waxed fast and furious.

In their mad haste the little girls had not seen where they were going and soon came upon another party of ɠlandelinians who were galloping up from another direction, and who had appeared from behind a hedge of tall trees. Violet and her sisters saw that they had torride some as these Glandelinians by their looks meant murder. They set off toard the christian lines at breakneck speed, but then another party rushed up from the west to cut them off from escape. These glandelinians were coming on at a tearing gallop or like the wind, and it seemed as if the little girls would surely be killed as all brandished gleaming sabres. Yet by a clever move they managed to elude the new party and dashed off toard the northeast, the Glandelinians persuing like mad.Violet and her sisters reached a wide plank road, and dashed down this hotly persued by the ɠlandelinians, who seemed bound to get them at all costs. all day long the little girls were persued vigoriously the ɠlandelinians continually dashing after them with a rush and a roar hardlystopping at all, and now violet and her sisters saw that their only means of escape was by seperating. Each little girl mentioned it and seeing the nearness of their persuers did so. Violet dashed across a field, Jennie headed for a corn field strewn with dried stalks, Joice dashed on down the road, Angeline and Cat erine dashed on across a meadow usually in summer swarming with tall da Dasies, Hettie dashed across a beat feild, and paisy went into a what field, and fired some of the dried what still left behind, to prevent the persuers from following too closely.

The Glandelinians seeing this move seperated into six to seven squads each one chasing their fugitive. The Glandelinians who were chacing Angeline were lancers and this little girl soon found a number of these dangerous weapons sweeping past dangeriously close and at last one struck her in the back, but wounded as she was she managed to stick to her saddle, and urged on her horse bound to get away if possible. Jennie's persuers were gaining steadily on her but she managed to urge her horse over a rail fence and speed across a wide meadow. On came the ɠlandelinians.

Two of their horses stumbled and fell throwing their riders into a snowbank headlong, but the others continued on, now opening fire. A bullet carried away Jennie's hat, and then another zipped her on the little finger. The Glandelinians were now almost behind her heels, and seeing her dangor she shot down five of them causing some confusion, then suddenly changed her direction dashe dashing off tward the wide creek. The ɠlandelinians knew the creek welland one of them yelled;

"Stop you little fool. You cannot escape us. You are between us and quick sands."

Jennie did not hear or did not pay any attention for she continued to dash on quickly reaching the creek. To made a side rush she knew would surely cause her capture and seeing that to escape either way was impossible she urged her horse across as she would rather die in qui k quicksands than be cut to pieces by the foe. To her dismay, as she inwardly hoped that there was no quicksand, she found that it was and the most dangerous kind. She vainly urged her horse to plough through but the more he struggled the faster he sank. The Glandelinians were on the brink in a moment and seeing Jennie's plight did n t not venture any further. Jennie felt a thrill of horror as it was a terrible death to die among quicksands her horse being entirely submorged and as not a Glandelinian had a rope among them they rode of expecting her to perishe but while they were gone she had managed to jump from the sinking horse to the outher side where all was safe and firm. Joice and ɣiolet being hotly persued came rushing past the creek and saw Jennie's danger and the other ɠlandelinians riding off laughing to themselves, and then saw her make the desperate jump as one of the foes was heard to say;

"Let her another. It will do her good."

Violet and joice between two hordes as they were af at first did not know what to do , but their first persuers being more human halted when they saw Jennies plight and then see her jump. At this moment a large body of Horsemen under one of the christian f officers appeared and the ɠlandelinians retreated, leaving ɣiolet and her sisters behind.

THE BATTLE OF OPHELIA RUN...???))('&_1###

The ɓlandelinians had now left all the fortified works behind at Evangelinia Crania and had retreated,northward tward Ophelia Run which was a great distance north of the region of Jennis ɣivian but at a junction of gunbeam Creek at and close to the town of Gertrude Angeline. On Febuary the twenty seventh or first I mean general John Manley made efforts to cover his brothers retreat which was started tward the creek of ɣorrington with the purpose to getting to Albertinia and Rossinia Rogan before the christian generals could follow. So he struck at General Robert ɣivians army which was the closest. Throwing a huge division under general Elm across Prosɣia and Protestia and Panro Pandora railroad tracks the christian commander mer a heavy column of assailants under general Antagon and the suffering in losses on both sides was also dreadful in this bloody battle. With great bravery and in the face of a murder ous fire the ɠlandelinians first destroyed the bridges at the left and rebuilt the others on the right and crossed them, driving general Normans divisions backwards, capturing eighty eight thousand cavarly men whom they surprised. Machingburgs Abyssinkilians were entirely surrounded by general Austers glandelinians and were cospelled to surrender a deed which shocked the whole christian army. Other Glandelinian forces opposing the ɠlandelinians were prisoners or in flight. No time was lost by the ɠlandelinians who had advanced under a scathing fire tward the town of Helen polores and Gertrude Angeline. As the main troops of christians came upon the scene fierces fiercer fighting raged with indescribable fury the Angelinian forces of nine hundred and seventy seven thousand confronting the assailants numbering eight hundred and sixty thousand. Perciving that it was their intention to cut him off from his advance on general Manley and his brothers general ɣivians made a change of positions, and then threw half of general ɣhillimsburger ɣimmermanns men in a terrific counter charge, but the result was a complete defeat for the Angelinians because at the time Zimmermann had not been there to take command, and the christians retreated in confusion tward Ophelia Run.

General Papels divisions were the next to be overthrown despite their overwhelming numbers and were driven back. First the ɠlandelinians under general Leo although badly shattered succeeded in routing the christians along a portion of the creek under general Joice, and while they were in hopeless confusion general May threw his whole cavarly on Hanoevers corps but here met with serious resistance. At some time the glandelinians under Devoe defeated with frightful loss ten christian divisions under St glare. The tactics of the ɠlandelinians was much superior though attacking in inferior numbers, but there was a moment when their defeat seemed certain, had not general Hensien of the christian divisions been slain and the news of the christian defeat at Gertrude Angoline came in time to demorilize the Angolinians and put them to flight. The Glandolinians then closed in on the Angolinians still remaining to stand their ground but general Meldon had been delayed by bad roads and severe blizzard weather and in the progressive concentration five brigades were nearly annihilated. Both sides fairly descriminated their very columns the glandolinians finally withdrawing. The battle of Ophelia Run was been very fierce nearly as bad as Evangolinia Cranin or Sunbeam creek also lasting only four hours but it was a christian success and both sides lost as it was estimated over 600,000 in killed and wounded.

Even after this fierce conflict the armies of the various christian commanders had moved forward to make a junction with general Vivian and help him to keep the Manleys hard pressed. When violet and her sisters heard of this their hopes for the ending of the war was gone Manley had escaped as was feared as general Vivians advance had been frustrated at Ophelia Run.The Glandolinians although always outnumbered, had always the most guns and strongest positions. Yet general Hanson Vivian the main commander aided by reinforcements was confident of victory though probably other battles would turn out to be more sangj sanguinary that the other ones just past. But would it be the last.? Would it end the war? Were his questions.

Even now a furious mutiny had sprang up among the better Glandolinians and the best of the Omarians who revolted after being notified by general John Manley that they were to kill all Catholic children in Calverinia. Thousands of the Omarians had thrown down their arms, even some of their generals stepping forward, and offering their sabres saying.!

"I resign my whole command.We intend to fight men and not assassinate children. We will do no massacring if you please."

The disatisfaction among the Omarians under orders to massacre all Calverinian children found in the towns caused a serious outbreak and many thousands of the Omarian s withdrew from the Glandolinian armies altogether, fast becoming enemies of Manley and his cause instead of friends. The situation for general Manley on account of his folly was critical. The actual n umber of resignations even among Mc-Hollestinian officers was still problematical, but that it was considerable was evident from the ernest consultation of general officers regarding the best means of counteracting the movement. Even cannons were seized by the Omarians, while all the towns around Torrington creek was already occupied by Abyssinkilian troops. General Henery C gohnmanns divisions and otherdetatchments were moving along the country roads with long trains of baggage wagons and ammunition carts on their way to strengthen the various Abyssinkilian divisions. Meanwhile all the newly concentrated christian line there was great animation. Throughout the line a feeling of intense excitement prevailed and everybody seemed waiting in anxious expectation for something to occur . Heppelns army also displayed considerable activity. Two batteries of calibre cannons arived with five thousand officers, and five million five hundred thousand men. Manley indeed was confronted with the gravest crisis and issue since the carnageat Calverine. He had collected another army from the various towns but an actual defect of this disaffection was more discomforting to the Glandolinian aurthorities, as the ae y army was now short of commissioned officers so many having fallen during the terrible war, and now so many resigning.

Threats of a crisis in the army if a movement or regular troops was undertaken against Phelan had long been current, and in some quarters it was believed that the sudden massing of a limited number of troops was ordered so the military generals might get an idea as how withd widespread the threatening battle was. General Federal had summoned a meeting of the army council which took the necessary place or steps to replace officers who had resigned in Manleys command. According to reports however the numer number of vacanies was rapidly increasing and it seemed possible that all the regular regiments which were to serve Hennie Shoemannia would have to be withdrawn, and be replaced by fresh troops, and both men and officers had expressed their disinclination to slaughter Catholic Women and children. Within twe ty four hours over eighty million regular troops, including four battalions of infantry, with machine guns and twenty two batteries of fresh artillery all equp equipped for active service had arived through various towns and joined with general Vivian.. These troops formed the most immense army the world had ever seen, and which general Vivian depended upon despie the assumption of local officers. Still more troops were on their way to general Vivians divisions from the various cities, and from other army stations. The first arival was the division of fourty Third battalions of general Booths light infantry which were convoyed from their barracks under Cornton and Leoughin. They arived at an early hour.

Field guns were mounted on newly erected fortifications and gal Sailents during the evening and orders were issuedto the other batteries of artillery at strategic positions along the Torington dereek. It was expected that four cavarly brigades would be concentrated here being equpied with carbines, lances and sabres. Generals Canconia and his lieutenant generals on the foe side desired Manley to take the first provo cative step before the christian armies grew too large but fearing an outbreak of the battle too soon Manley urged them to keep cool. Two special trains left southern Calverinia from Angolinia, carrying troops to general Vivian and several other trains were preparing to depart.

Of all the events beginning with the second year of the war between the months of Feburary and March none is or was probably more memorable than the famous march or campi campaign of general Hanson Vivian through the State of Angeline Vine . ithu Although probably a generation will pass away since then in this story, millions of children who probably will have never known slavery or been slaves, and children who have never known war or ever saw a war in their lives, will still join in singing the famious Angolinian war songs originated from that campaign.

And next to this mighty of al christian cauptians the Angolinian nation gold in grateful remembrance the name and deeds Ifgeneral Kindernine, and general Robert Vivian, the three Evans, and Concentinian n Aronburg.

Afte after g having left the region of ivian Vickey, and loabing the armies there which he had brought to Mansion from Calverine Hills general Hanson had taken a train southward and visisted some of his generals who had immense organized armies at the towns of Dorothy Gale and Os Ozma. General Hanson was seven then strongly impressed With the terrible gravity of the situation of the rebellion and urged the generals there in charge of the immense armies to see to it that the Dolorine fortifications recieved reinforcements, and then as he took command of one of the armies from Dorothy Gale with Kindernine and some of his or other generals, and Ordered general Concentinian Aronburg to secure an army also from Dorothy Gale and move on the rebels at Jennie Turner, Big GirlKnool and Madge Evans in northeastern Calverinia some of the generals at Dorothy Gales urged Hanson to take them with him but general Hanson Vivian had only replied lightly as he started on his advance "Oh I guess I cannot get along without you fellows in charge of Dorothy Gale. Hon general Hanson had learned at defending Dorothy Gale, Ozma and Angelinia Agathinthat there was only seventy five million Angolinians left if he took from it one hundred million he feared the former number would be utterly inadequate and so he refused to take but only 10,000 000 men declarging !

"If I take away too many armies ffo from Dorothy Gale and expect Angelinia Agathato be strongly and successfuly defended I might as well try to put out a conflargration in a forest with a squirt gun if the enemy obtain possession."

At the beginning of his advance tward Torrington eighty miles North of Vivian Vickey he commissioned some lieutenaments as colonels in hisnew regular army and then moved on. He had retained with him nevertheless all of his generals who were in commands at the fatal battle of Norma Jo ossinia and who had done all in their power to save the day on th at disasterious field.Evan general Kindernine who had saved the army from destruction during t hat dreadful battle was with general Hanson. General Hanson had once wrote to his Brother general Robert Vivian; "To the efforts of general Kibdernine I am fully indebted indebted for the success I had in withdrawing my troops from the disasterious region of Evangelinia Grania the closest to which of Vivian Wickey I had brought my Armies which I now have left ther with Mansion to maintain the seige while I direct operations elsewhere throughout Calverinia.It was and is also the unanimous opinion that Lieutenant,general Richard Kindernine saved the fortunes of the day at the battle of Jennie Vivin or Sunb sunbeam Creek."

On the first day of the advance of general Hansons armies tward Torrington general Robert Vivians army of troops was encountered and soon both armies were joined and started the advan ce once more. There had been some fighting and skirmishing on t he evening and general Kindernine had led his batteries regiments into t he fight and enacted over again the fierce and heroic deeds of other past battles.Untiring to the last general Kindernine had pushed out after the victory At St Louis burg and beat a large force of Glandolinian cavarly capturing a very large supply of ammunition. During this long campaign general Kindernine was a one among the brilliant Angelini n and other christian commanders who under the two Vivians captured Vernerburg and drove a wdege through the Confederacy of the Glandolinian territory of Calverinia. Now general Hanson being theocommander in chief of all the Angolinian armies had called army his old followers from Vivian Wickey to direct the movements of other forces throughout Calverinia and for a time it seemed as if general Kindernine would be promoted to the command of the seigeing armies of Vivian Wickey and that general Mansion would be withdrawn for a vacation as his health was run down by the work he accomplished in maintaining the seige, but general Hanson felt he needed Kindernine where he already was and needed Mansion at Vivian Wickey and so having already giving Mansion much support in an armies sent from various points as well as from Dorothy Gale, Glinda, Ozma and Wheelerton many armies and sublime and great christian commanders to help him and lighten his burden. which included all the armies from Angolinia as well, while he sent other forces of great strength from orders, from Abyssinkile to besiege Calverine.

Already from Fullaway to Calverine Hills general Hanson had throughout a years war fought his way desperately and from Calverine he had then fought his way to Vivian Wickey inch by inch and then laid seige and reinforced Mansions army. Now he was in command of new armies and moving against the retreating Manley who had also left Vivian Wickey by a secret rout to bring up new and armies and oppose every advance of general Han o Hanson Vivians armies.

The summer of 1912 and early autum of that same year, and winter of 1913, where were indeed days of desponency and gloom for Angolinia and her states and even for the whole world in general.....the awful battles, in Glandelinia, and elsewhere and around Vivian Wickey by land, and water, and battles elsewhere in Calverinia, north, and south, especially at Vivian Wickey where Hanson Vivian and Ansion had been keeping up a steadily that dreadful hammering, which it was hoped for alone could reduce the Confederacy of Glandelinia had brought grief to the Angelinian countries and the whole world, and the declaration of the Angelinia Agathia convention and other places as well That the war just as it was was a failure'' flyfound response even among millions of t hose who had hitherto stood as firm as a rock. At vivian wickey so far great er exertions and greater sacrifices than ever n any other place had been made and so far apparently without any results without a ny results whatever ever. However the first gleam of light in the gloom since general Hanson ivians abandonment of the seige of ivian wickey was general Hanson vivian capture of elenore late in February which was accomplished after a dange o dangerous and difficult advance. his army had entered the Angelinian or Galverinian state of Angeline vine at the boundary of the Atate of Dorothy Gale and every mile of his progress had taken him further and still further from his own base of well needed supplies. He was met at every step by the veterans of general Blango Johnstonins Glandelinian army which had stood in the way to cover Manleys retreat to Porringt onand the former rebel general was one of the ablest generals in the Glandelinian service atthat time next to Pio-Hollester Johnst on. It had been and was a most hazardious game to play for general Hanson vivian but at a critical point the government of Galverinia which was rebel in aurthority and membership accidentally gave Hanson ivi n important aid. Just on the eve of the battle of Elenore the aurthorities relieved general John stonin because he would not move and again attack Hanson, and in his place put the more dashing and reckless general Izmer Mylstze. IIzmer Mylstze strove to carry out general Johnstonias plans but without success. fighting fiercely and flanking t he various Glandelinian armies upp opposed to himgeneral Hanson drove general Mylstze into Elenore and cut off all his sources of supply. there was soon Nothing for general Izmer Mylstze to do but a abandon the small city which he did burning immense quantities of cotton, stores, of provisions and during the confla gration on the following day general Hanson ivian entered and took possession.

Angelin Again the whole christ ian nation was wild with delight.....A salute of hundreds of thousands of guns cannons I mean was fired throughout the countryies of Abbisannia, Angelinia, Eastern Galverinia, Abyssinkila and other states in the honor of general Hanson vivian at all the chief military posts.

He was the hero of t he hour. He had won the first greatest success of the war so far and that great success managed to turn the tide of pub,i public feeling and opinion and assured the prosecution of the great war.

But greater things were still to come. Angeline vine though a state of the country or province of Galverinia was a the great centre of supplies for the Confederacy of Glandelinia--the full workshop, and food crib of the Glandelinian cause.

If general Han o Hanson vivian could only make his way through Angeline vine and capture porrington near the northwest seacoast of Galverinia it would probably undermine and honeycomb that portion of Galverinia in the sent of its strength and force the glandelinian ao aurthorities out of that port ion of Galverinia. General Hanson determined to march from Elenore str i straight u on La Palansa nearl four hundred miles distant. Leaving general Hindernine with a very strong force in Elenore he soon abandoned his own d base of null supplies, but all his connections with Angelinian aurthorities and st started on his march for porrington and almost accomplished a march similar to Shermans through Georgia but of longer duration and a campaign which was full of the bloodiest battles. The greatest of the Angelinian generals as he was he knew what he was about but no one else did and all friends and foes alike were ignornat of any i of his plans at the very beginning and wind any of the rmain Glandelinian generals known whether he was marching, or what his general plans were they could have easily concentrated against him vast arsiesand repulsed him, but not knowing anything about his movements or where he was going to strike or even where he was they had scattered their big forces at different pointsin an effort to locate his army but could not do so quick enough and so h had tried to but failed to put any formidable obstacle in his way.

General Izmer Mylstze immediately started for Thumbelinia town in the Gal verinia State of Maya hoping to draw some of Hansons forces after him into the mountians of that state and prevent Hansons plans from being worked out but this suited general Hanson exact ly. ''If general Mylst ze will dare to go into the state State of Maya'' He said to himself with a chuckle ''I will see to it that he will be be furnished with all the excitement it will be necessary for his trip.'' he full idea of general Hanson vivian actually cutting loose from the strong protect ion of the base supplies and strong forces at Dorothy Gale and Ozma and marching hundreds of miles through the heart of an enmye wiked territory was so boldand seemingly rash that it did not occur to any of the wisest of the glandelinian generals as possible at all, and so meeting their armies in battle at that time, general Hanson vivian did something which was almost like general Sherman had done, and that was at the beginning of his c ampaign toward porrington left all serious or any opo opposition behind him.

Pearoie a last member of boyscouts a day lat er after the batt le of Oplain was it being the second day of eburary eoubrary was without expectation encou y general Greathaunt from the camp and ordered toward the ever increasing forces of the Antiangelin linian army the region of St Ona mona mortifications. was had been sent with the purpose to scout around the region of that fortress with orders to capture Gerald ging a jealous Guardian Boyscout who was who was said to be constantly increasing the Gerind, and if possible capture or scatter his whole boy scout co mpanion the Rattlesnake were out on the first day with their snowboats and did not succeed in accomplishing their purpose.

They could not get a glimpse of any rebel soldier even and the snow was so deep and hard, and so highly banked and the weather so extremely cold that Pearod held on he was close to the north Pole and not in Galverinia.

Therefore as it was so late sol, cold and the days before had been colder and it with the to perature about seventy two below for three days long, and now on a most blinding snow squall was setting in, and the wind blowing like a growing cyclone the whole force finally returned to the stays toward the christian linian. At this time Pearod declared he did not know whether they were really snow flakes falling or falling or large pieces of cotton mixed with balls of ice crems and hail.

Their horses as well as the boys were nearly jaded from battling against the terrific st rm, as the sno storms do in Angelinia when a horse suddenly gives out he is to quickly about it to the band, shoulder their saddles, and trudge along after the boy scout climbs on foot and breast the storm until they could secure another animal to t ride. Pearod had placed himself in command of the rear guard and when they had reached within a half of the camps tree broken off short by a sudden increase of the wind fell on the hindmost of the t rop, who gave way falling wild lem l ike like the rear rank t reading its rider headlong into a dead dea snow bel ow and so badly wounded that it was unable to go a step further. Before quit e a few minutes this Pearod realized he was in a serious fi indeed. Therefore h had a pleasant feelings when he found himself sprawling into a deep snow bank and saw his horse held down by the trunk of a fallen tree. It was indeed a serious undertaking to find his way back, snow while snow loved as he was, and all through a country infested with Glandelinian Gerillians and their guerillas and which was obscured by the blinding snow so all so he could hardly see a hundred feet away. It is true however that if he had so desired he could have secured a horse as several had been offered h him by some of the boys but Pearod had not the heart t to send that enough to save himself he took in one of his brave boy scouts behind, so he t ld them and the Rattlesnake boy to go ahead with the Regiment keeping a good look out for a ny saddle horse, and if he could find one to send it back to him.

Pearod then started in the direction twice the with the band a dood he hated to do indeed, for he never left the last horse he had ever ridden having carried Pearod many a mile and through danger wise and being his constant companion for h al out half a year and had become very much attached to him. But he could not help it, for the horse was needed, wounded, and also it was strict military orders, that all stragglers should be shot down on the spot. Pearod threw the snow after the column of the men and he soon was all alone and surrounded by a wicked fury by this time. The wind was blowing shrieking and driving the moving clouds of snow and hail before it, and it threatening to uproot all the trees to the earth.

In the face of the terrific onslaught of snow and wind Pearod plowed along at a slow pace of about two miles an hour. At last by the snow driven into his face, and even his twice protected eyes by the violent squall of wind. "Now is the time for me to be brave as ever witness of myself, I exclaimed to myself, with flashes and I he could not see this or that objects a hundred feet or less could not be seen at all, despite the fact he expected every minute to see a friend. His deliberate to permit but hundreds, about three the the storm was attacked by the report that the Rattlesnake boy and his party had found the horse which [illegible] up. As Pearod approached he felt and sounds [illegible] at the [illegible] and [illegible] and [illegible] and

About four o'clock that afternoon they finally reached a cross road where they were blocked by an impassable snow drift. They discovered where they were however. For had often been there on sleighing tours, so with a last look [illegible] for Penrod, they [illegible] and their packs on their backs [illegible] and almost [illegible] a hundred feet further on now [illegible] through the thick snow fall. [illegible] to [illegible] all. All were [illegible] unacquainted with him and those on the [illegible] of them [illegible] to the Angelinian cause had been likewise [illegible] turbed. Here the two boys made halt at the front door, and when the servant of the house opened it asked her if she could [illegible] with more supper and shelter for the night and from the storm. She at first shook her head a great cloud of snow for her own benifit, and the two boys placed their saddles into one corner of the room, while the woman and her two husband began to bustle around, her own two boys and one pretty little girl volunteering volunteering to help her. It took full an hour before the meals were served up to the two boys and it was one of the best suppers that the had had for the past, and Penrod and his companion sat down and fell into with ravenous appetites. Before [illegible] the two boys took off their belts to which their revolvers were fastened, and placed them in the corner with their saddles.

As it was afterwards proved it was indeed a very foolish trick, but as the boys were within half a mile of the christian lines they were not apprehensive of any danger whatever. While the two boys were fairly started started the women and men conversed upon [illegible] important subjects, and they finally finished everything on the table, and were thinking for starting to bed when they were startled by hearing the front door open with a bang, and some one yell out;

"Here you dirty christian dogs. Get up from that table. Let me see."

Both of the boys suddenly looked up and glanced at the [illegible] there in the doorway [illegible] lots of snow but the room, and with their [illegible] and overcoats [illegible] covered with snow, and with their revolvers leveled at their heads two Glandelinians, one a general, and another a colonel.

"And I'll fix you and your heads you old witch." exclaimed the colonel triumphal Triumphantly. "You did not think because of this [illegible] storm that any of us would be around."

"The old hag has betrayed us." cried the general. "She invented the story of her sick child in order that she could betray our plans to the Nationals. She thought her absence might not cause any suspicions. There is only one thing I'm sorry for and that is that we don't have time to check those young cubs of yours. We came to find you and [illegible] with you, giving them information [illegible] come, come", there [illegible] scouts" he added "Get up from behind that table at once or we'll shoot you dead where you are."

"We have been [illegible] easily enough Penrod" said the Rattlesnake boy in his usual excited manner as the boys arose from their chairs. "All I suppose there is no help for us now seeing that we have no weapons but what is you intend to do with a boy or wildcat if he refuses to obey your orders, even under dese these circumstances. We never permit ourselves to be prisoners. We never surrender. We defy you before heaven."

"Send you direct to the upper world." was the encouraging answer made by the colonel as he walked twart the corner of the room with the intention to take possession of the guns.

"Come out here!" Demanded the general.

Neither Penrod or the Rattlesnake boy moved. Both had once allowed themselves to be taken prisoner and suffered almost a fatal consequences, and already he and his companion had had a long and fatiguing trip through the terrific storm and if he allowed himself [illegible] the Rattlesnake boy to be made prisoners they would both be sent to the dreaded Livian wickey. He had heard outrageous stories about the treatment of the [illegible] scout prisoners, and how now they were in for it if they surrendered. Better die in the house than [illegible] would.

And he and his companion had been treated very kid kindly by the hostess and her beautiful children who had given them plenty to eat. The children were flabbergasted at the action of the two boy scouts. "Either I am [illegible] in the rebels while covering the boys almost the man and the woman in the worse kind of manner and [illegible] swearing [illegible] profoundly at the children, [illegible] God before them all, and calling them [illegible] boys not mean that would make Penrod [illegible] red to hear and declaring that if they had only a few more soldiers with them they would put the children like a [illegible] deer [illegible]. He [illegible] a man's trick to treat decent people in this way but he kept on [illegible] while the colonel proceeded to go through the man's clothing and his house pretty thoroughly.

He pulled the rebel the man of two hundred and fifty dollars in Additions to greenbacks, a watch, comb, several articles in jewelry in fact he did not leave him a penny. He overhauled the whole house, put on an expensive overcoat he found. He even kicked the little girl in the chest with force enough to knock her flat on the floor. While this inhuman scene was going on the Rattlesnake boy was watching his chance to strike. While the colonel was ransacking the room and just after he had kicked the little girl the Rattlesnake boy made up his mind in an instant, giving a low cry to attract the attention of Penrod but the man, he sprang at the rebel general, suddenly caught him around the neck with his wrestle and pulled me back that he fell sprawling and shouting, and the Rattlesnake boy rebel over on his back. The rebel boy kicked and implored most furiously and if the Rattlesnake boy would have been alone he would most likely had got the better of it but a rebel being close at hand caught up the revolver which the rebel general had dropped when attacked, and turned more the Rattlesnake boy had secured his entire. The co, colonel could up on the scene drew his gun to shoot the two boys down, but the man failed him with a chair, and so seeing that further resistance was useless the Glandelinian general [illegible] out;

"don't shoot me boys, please don't. don't shoot me for mercy's sake and I'll do anything you say."

"No one in going to kill a puppy cat unless it has the rabies and does not relieve itself." Said Penrod. "Now see the christian dogs won again. Get up you mole cat you skunk."

The rebel general raised himself slowly to his feet, and the Rattlesnake boy began [illegible] around him as they call "searching" a man in the army. The men of the house got back his money and everything else the colonel had just stolen.

The bewitch stopped at the house overnight, but attended to their prisoners first. They fastened both of them to a chair apiece, and then tied a [illegible] towel over their mouths to prevent them from yelling and making a whole lot of noise. If they did they would not only keep those in the house awake during the stormy night but the noise would make their whereabouts known to the Glandelinian scouting parties, and cause the capture of every one in the very building. Hello boys in bed the Rattlesnake asked of Penrod;

"What are we going to do with the two prisoners when we leave here to morrow morning."

"Leave the [illegible] tied up in the chair will we can make a squad of soldiers after the." answered Penrod. "Now I wish I was a man for a few minutes. I would not touch him with a cross puff I'll tell the world."

"The colonel will be in for it when I be is taken to the camp to morrow" said the Rattlesnake boy. "We'll report that kick he gave the little girl, and her parents will confirm it."

"But I'm not going out if the storm does not let up" declared Penrod determinedly. "It may be about two or three days before we will probably start, for the camp and we will have to leave the rotten prisoners behind as it is exceedingly dangerous to allow them to come with us."

The Rattlesnake boy made no reply but well knew what Penrod was talking about. After a few more words they tried to sleep but that was a long time out of the question. The uproar of the storm was at its height the force of the wind shaking the house like an earthquake at this times. And their situation was not one calculated to quiet their feelings very much, and as they rolled about on their beds trying to find a comfortable position, Penrod could hear the Rattlesnake boy wanting his full spite against "that storm" "He did not really seem to think what was in store for him and Penrod. They passed a miserable sleepless night, and at daylight observed that the storm was still raging but not so wildly. After a hasty breakfast which was also given to the prisoners (though they deserved it not for their meanness) the boys finally decided to set out with the prisoners, to man to follow close behind them with a revolver in his hand ready to shoot the first Glandelinian who made an attempt to escape from them. After dressing themselves as warm as possible they all started out. The prisoners were compelled to travel on ahead. It was now as terribly cold as the first most severe cold wave the feet of all of them were almost frost bitten already but on they continued.

They kept on the lookout for the rebel scouts which they knew were in the vinicity but did not meet with any of them. After an hour of traveling through the deep snow they heard a yell and sq on looking up saw half a dozen white hooded figures or creatures on snow shoes charging over a snow drift tward them. They were the "Hooded Terror" of the Gargoylian Kurds.

"It means we [illegible]" said Penrod "[illegible]

"[illegible] If we [illegible]" the command.

[illegible]

[illegible] the [illegible] was evident that the [illegible] had fired the house. The prisoners who had been [illegible] to [illegible] to their own men. It was evident they were [illegible] their own men. [illegible] the others. If not they could have [illegible] them all down with one discharge of musketry.

The remainder of their homeward trip from that house to the christian lines was indeed rejected with the most intense suffering, hardships, and near disaster escapes. The storm instead of abating grew more and more violent. Coming to the river gulch a blizzard the small party was intercepted. The force of the wind like a cyclone. Not recognizing Pedro Gomez at the head of the sledge the Eskimos to attempt their rout in that direction. [illegible] a small portion of provisions the boys had in the sledge were almost exhausted there was no hope to find their way to the christian lines, and it indeed was the gloomiest prospects possible before them. Pedro and his companion hoped to secure game but nothing could be seen through the snow murk. And they were separate far from their rendezvous. Of the ic; natives of the more gun river station were plentiful despite the storm, but none of these could have been secured if killed. And the deplorable situation of the party could readily destroy the [illegible] of men, weakened by the lack of food the intense cold, and strained by desperate despair, and Pedro realized the increasing urgency of securing relief at all hazards or giving up to fate. As a last resource in which there was [illegible] the least [illegible] of hope to decide to find shelter of some kind, and attempt to secure food provisions.

The weather at this time was terrible the storm raging with a marvellous fury, but the threatened death by exposure and hunger made it absolutely necessary to find food and shelter if possible. Despite the storm the temperature was already fifty five below zero, still dropping, and the wind blowing almost like a tropical cyclone, the hurricane swirling in dense clouds so thick you could hardly see fifty feet any way and blowing in all directions. Quickly the hunt for shelter one of the women's sons suffered unbearably with frost and against the orders and wise advice of the two boy scouts put his exposed legs to eat snow. This caused his [illegible] and hands to [illegible] become wet, and as the wind was terribly strong from the North west the limbs were soon frozen. The snow caused his mouth to [illegible] Winter also, [illegible] became very weak. The rest tried to bury [illegible] exposed but discovered that the legs feet were also frozen. They fortunately at this moment reached a small abandoned hut or soon it would have been all up with them all. Here Pedro and the Battleground boy took care of the half frozen lad. They gently took his shoes off, and restored the circulation in his hands and feet by friction. After a terrible night spent in the hut they continued on their way with the temperature rising up to twenty five below zero.

The boy who had caused his own misfortune by eating the snow was now unable to walk without support. His hands and feet were again almost frozen, and his mother and father had to help him along. The others stumbled wearily through the deep snow but the whole party were soon becoming exhausted. Though the snow storm was over the wind was still strong, and their exhaustion prevented them from restoring the circulation in the frozen boy. And now there was no shelter in sight for miles. They had no tent and they were filled with despair. Words cannot describe the horrors of their experience. The noble boy urged his friends to leave him behind to die, and save themselves, but they continued to rush on [illegible] as they found third [illegible] miles to the rear of the christian lines.

Even before [illegible] on the boys worked for two hours and were not able restored the circulation in the boys hands and feet. At last it required all three of the boy for his legs became stiff and he would frequently fall. The little girl and her mother also became to full and it was decided that the Battleground boy and the men should push on ahead, while the rest remained with the two children and their mother and give assistance. CHAPTER TWENTY SIX.

Another Amateur Adventure.

During the next week following this stirring experience Penrod and his companion were several times the recipients and thereafter under an escort toward General Grantbanks camp, giving a strange contradictory signal to six different Angelinian officers at six different stations of the lines which were on their route. Within one section of the Grantbanks encampment there was a small fortified village and here the boys were taken to the office of an officer sitting inside of his tent which stood under a tall almond tree and when the strange mysterious words were uttered he suddenly stood up and bared his head. As the disguised boy scout had done, at which Penrod gave the mysterious signal in some quiet part of the camp to an officer who was alone, he noticed that they all did this and said their "God be thanked" devoutly as if it were part of some religious ceremony.

In another small village or town far away but still in the Christian lines and had to march some hours in the bitter cold before he found a stalwart young young officer with bright red hair and a scar on his hand in the form of a star fish in the sand. He was not in his tent when the two boys came up to his because as they found out later, he had been on a long distant scouting tour, the day before and had been detained in his early return to the Christian lines because he and his one thousand followers had encountered an overwhelming force of Glandinians cavalry, and had very nearly lapsed.

When Penrod rode up to him and gave him the mysterious signal this young colonel was quite friendly to the two boys and told them about his almost fatal adventure.

"There are many officers of ours and a few in who should not undertake to go out on scouting tours alone for have had lots of experience." He said. "I brought the disaster upon my whole force of fellows by through my own carelessness, and forgetfulness. I was standing on a bit of rock jutting out over a ravine, large force of wheeler Cavalrian cavalry spotted me and charged up after climbing with me down before them, then like chaff."

"How many men did you lose in the skirmish" asked the Rattlesnake boy.

"Over three hundred were killed or wounded and fourty captured" said the young officer. "But it was not as much as the men lost. One reason I shot turned heels ever head down a ring of alone a few thousand feet up, managed to elude my swiftly and furiously swift pursuers and after some difficulty reunthered the remainder of my badly scattered forces where is nothing like it scouting if you know how, I shall soon be at it again. This won't do for me to let a foe like this try to outwit me. I tried other other ways to discover the enemy's intentions because I am in love with a Courtney Clay out for a girl at home who alone I am fighting for. I once a secret, also a secret."

Where was no one else there but on the distance heavily clad soldiers were tramping back and forth from the trenches, as the colonel did not lift his red hand. He was not in talking.

"Not be thanked that you were able to help the signal in time. We are what those documents really, or did you read b some one?"

"I cannot tell until I am where are already." answered Penrod." and my companion must go on."

"Yes, you it is very necessary that we must go on." answered the colonel." but I'll tell you what I'll do." I'll note the word silent then to Princess Jemuld Avinu. Some great love will reveal upon when she shall see the to all our best generals, and perhaps also of them." He glanced around cautiously, and then added still looking at the papers "then will be called the "documents of the Messengers of the Mysterious Signals." and I shall say "He was only a young boy scout."

Then he straightened up on his saddle with a great smile.

"There'll be scouting enough to be done now" he said "you'll look to see you again somewhere."

Then the boys went away they talked about their meeting with this colonel.

"He is like one I know" said the Rattlesnake boy. "so many officers must go out scouting at our Invasion line. here are sentinnels everywhere it seems. you should the trees on the up."

"Our secret messengers who are all to everywhere without interfering, and who can slip anywhere, and cross the most dangerous places and reconnoitre from points no one else can reach, can find out things not for signals, other cannot do." said Penrod.

"That's what I have always been figuring out" the Rattlesnake boy murmured. "that's what the colonel meant when he said "there will be scouting enough for us to do now."

Strange still were the other actions of the camp they met to and curiously unlike as in other ways the officers to whom they carried their strange and unknown message. The most singular of all was an old general who lived in the thickest section of Camp No. One. To reach this part of the camp they had to follow a road walled up by tents on either side. It of course was not a real road, but it was a wide way to travel, hauled in a general army wagon, when one is all ride, and the tents stood with roads between them one could not the brown stretches of tents one looked down on the tops of many lines and the brownish of fires and still in the scattered plains guarding themselves to the very verge of the camp, shifting their lines in wave breath taking intervals to look down on the road counted higher and higher.

"How can any one have such a hill higher than this." said the Rattlesnake boy as they continued on foot after the wagon had left them. "look at the tremendously fortified works looking up over there. at us look at the generals picture again. His picture looks as if he was eighty years old."

Penrod took out his hidden sketch. It seemed surely one of the strangely and strangest things in the world that a man as old as he could reach such a high place of action, or having reach it could ever descend to the lower camps again to give orders to. The face of a large grayish old face was crowned and surrounded with long whiskers. His profile was very splendid yet, and he had been a handsome man in his younger days. His nose was like those of an eagle and not an old eagle either.

And he had a look much like "Look here" at his appareal to hold his old head high.

"I wonder what his intentions are for that all may go for above the rest." exclaimed the Rattlesnake.

"General Grantbanks who are up now who are. If we don't" said Penrod. "Will you wait a few minutes here and rest while I go a little further up and investigate."

"No" the Rattlesnake answered stubbornly. "I did not receive any training to stay behind and leave you fall into unseen danger alone. But we shall surely come to steeper and more difficult climbing soon and even then I will not oblige myself to stop." and he said the last about as stubbornly as before. He knew that if Penrod went on alone he would have ridden on as any moon but would have wit on ward and onward steadily through the deep snow to the end of his journey. But they did not reach the highest level as they expected. Suddenly as they had scaled half way up it appeared that ascent a bend in the road, and found themselves going into a new elevation encampment, and an astonishing marvel of a city of encampments with row upon tents buttoned by lines of strong breastworks like fortifications, but it also looked as if the Company Streets the distant roofs of evergreen pine and the white clouds had come to and had been shut down on everything, was deeply covered.

Penrod and the Rattlesnake boy here for a position across could be seen which soared above into the sky like some mysterious ancient buddhist city, with row upon row of tents for millions. Such city then to be heavily snow snowed down right have rested there for all time. There stood the mysterious encampment. there it huddled itself out the snows of a severe Calvinian winter. Penrod and the Rattlesnake boy at it still despite the cold wind and stared and stared.

"What in the world it is it doing up here" the Rattlesnake boy cried. Penrod however said about his head. He was there he did not know, and certainly could not be explained on of it either. Perhaps some of the Scribe could tell at once of the matter only. As Rattlesnake a liter paging his boat while on guard duty saw visible upon the distance of the two boys. He looked with great curiosity and perhaps at that but Penrod himself forgetting himself spoke to him in English but he could not understand but shook his head, saying something in his own tongue which Penrod and only Abbiana alone only knew.

"If we speak English to every one of them like that they will take it for granted that we are fireman union - spies for the interest of Glandinian and will have us for investigation." said the Rattlesnake boy. "but it is not safe by"

"I make a discovery in the all a great one." answered Penrod "I am sure that this is a volcano."

In a subsidiary way the whole of the camp were tents and barracks standing in disordered clusters together evidently with the object of keeping itself warm when the cold the south of the Calvarian winter the blizzard storms also strove to bury it, and the hurricanes which roared down and tried to tear it from the ground and sweep it into the air.

There was only one entrance into the tent and gave a glimpse of the inside of the tents showed floors of earth and dark partitioned rooms.Of the b rracks the doors and windows were few and small and it was plain that it was counted a more comfortable thing for the soldiers to live without light during the winter than to let in the awful cold.And it was good by the boys that to reconnoitre was an easy matter indeed.The winter and cold hardened sentries that were evidently not surprised or suspicious that two strange boy scouts who had accidentally discovered their strange camp should hesitate to and want to look at them and their tents.The boys at first wondered about if they were only casual explorers who having reached the camp on below sent were interested in searching for some one they wished to see.Feeling hungry and cold they went into a small mess tent and received a very light meal.The mess sergeant was a tall brawny fellow who though an Abyssinkilling understood some English.He told Penrod as plainly as he could that they were the only strange boy scouts ever known who found their way to this camp.In the forest beyond this camp were numerous dandelining scouting parties and in the higher lanes hidden ambushes and traps.Now and then some venturesome christian spy came with parties of the most daring kind were great scouts indeed,"he said shaking his head with pride.

There was only one man who had his headquarters in the mountain but he liked best to be roaming around on dangerous adventures.Penrod began to wonder if some of the strange things might not be true if great professional Angelinian spies sometimes got through the very centre of dandelinianswhat he had not been sent to give the message to a professional spy.He had been sent to give it to an old general who had gone like an outlaw,and he had the sketch of the general hidden in his sleeve with that of his chum, and of his circus like tent.

Penrod believed if he and his companion walked about a bit they would sure come upon it, even in this i mense camp.Then they could n in, on persuasion to see the general and give him the message.

They roamed about for a full hour despite the intense cold after they left the mess tent.They went into the K's building and then looked at the lowest breastworks, and wondered that they were not buried a l out of sight after a one good snowstorm.After this had been done they continued to look around elsewhere and walked past the closely lined up tents examining each one as they drew near and passed.

"I believe I see it now." exclaimed the Rattlesnake boy."It's that very large striped one standing a little way back from the rest.It's more imposing than most of them, and thereare the Angelinian flag flying in front of the tents."

"Yes that surely is it," said Penrod.

They walked up to the door of the tent, and after ob aining their cards were admitted into the general's presence.As they stood before him the boys saluted and then stood at attention.And there before them stood the old general with the angle eyes."There was no one else in the r om and no sentinels at the door.And when the old general looked u at Penrod and his companion with his angle eyes, holding his head high on his "Andy Gump" neck, Penrod gave the mysterious mess signs.

The general stood up straight and gazed at him for a moment in silence.He was an Abbissinnian it was clear, for it was in the Abbissinian tongue he answered him:

"I thank God with all my heart,"he said,"you into my private quarters young bearer of the Mysterious Message and bring your friend i with you.I am alone for the present and not a soul is within hearing."

He was a wonderful old general.Neither Penrod or the Rattlesnake would ever live long enough to forget the hours they spent in his strange dark tent.He kept them, and made them spend the night with him.

"It is quite safe as there are no lurking dandelinian spies around"he said."I am alonefor the day since my aide-de-camp was shot by rebel snipers while he was trying to save his comrade.So for to night I have two room to spare, and and some time one of the members of the Gemini comin. here to see me are glad to sleep in them."Ine is a good warm tent and I am well known by my men here.You are also a very young boy to be on such dangerous adventures and in such bitter weather as this."Here,let me take his hat."You are so young, and so brave.And you must have good blood in your veins to be trusted with with such an important message."

"I have my father's blood, and I am Scandinavian,"answered Penrod.

"You are sure boy a once now"said the old general and he looked hard at him with his angle eyes as he said;"Please tell me what is your name is?"?!?

"It is Marcellus Schoenfield Penrod Pennrod."

"What you want to tell me it is that?"He cried out in a very low voice and he said it with pride for he saw no reason why he should not tell him.And to Penrods amazement became forward and stood in front of his chewing indeed that a tall strong man he absolutely was for his old age.

And to surprise his still more he actually made a sort of courtesy to him-- indeed indeed laughing his knee as peasants did do when they made a obeisance.

"I believe it a fact,"he said again,"and let the generals have to let you boys go out on dangerous adventures on this, and in such a terrible terrible winter.That's for your courage not for their's."

But Penrod did not know what the old general meant, and his strange obeisance made him feel a bit awkward.And Penrod stood up because in his earliest days he had been trained to stand up when a superior also rises.

"He once spoke for the sovereign,"he said"because it is my fathers. And he was a soldier in the Franco-Prussian War."..."

He watched the boy with anxiety in his face.

"You do not even know of it"the answered-----and it was an exclamation, and not a question.

"I know what my general has did me to do."said Penrod."I do not ask anything else."

"Who is your boy companio "asked the general pointing to the boy known as t the"rattlesnake".

"He is a dear friend of mine and when general Greathear sent with me."said Penrod with a smile."He is captian of a Company of Boyscouts, and my aide-de-camp also.I can say our meeting was strn strange.It was almost a sort of joke, because it was almost like playing soldier together.He first mistook me for a rebel boy scout spy."

It appeared for a while as if the general sh was obliged to collect his thoughts.He stood with his hand at his mouth looking down at the earth floor.

"I bet t ant God any sword and ride out on your peculiar adventure."He said a t last."You are indeed very---very young for such work."

"But in all his years "the Rattlesnake boy broke in"he has been training for just this thing.He did not know he was really training for this but he was. Any soldier who has been training for only a year should know his works."

He was so angry that he almost forgot what he was saying but Penrod exclaimed;

"what he say's is true."

The general nodded his head at still with anxious yes anxious questioning eyes.

"Yes,yes,yes,"he stuttered," if you are a very young boy to go on these dangerous adventures, and I don't see for ll the world much young lads can stand this terrible cold weather without any serious results.I will repeat that it is dangerous and for flabbergast me.The dandelinians are more dangerous to boy scouts than n any other children.You boys place yourselves in greater dan er than even the vivian _irls."then the venerable old general asked in a hesitating tone;||

"Will you not sit down until I do, my boy"

"o Your Excellency"answered Penrod."I would not sit down first, while my mother, grand mother or my sister, or a little girl stood."

"Then I not sit down first---and forget it."he said.

The general then passed his hand over his face as if he were trying to sweep away the sudden trouble! nzzled ,look in his e pression.Then he sat down as if he had obliged himself to leave again the old general he had been when they entered.

"All the time you were on your way to my headquarters you wondered why an old general like me should be given the mysterious mission."he said."you may have asked each other how could I have been of any use."

Neither Penrod or the Rattlesnake boy said anything.

"I am more years not fresh in my years than I appear"he went on."I'm only disguised as an old man.I am only thirty five years old, and wear a white wig and a false white beard to make myself appear older than I look.I am one of the main gu Supreme Persons of the Gemini, and the Highest Supreme person of the Gemini general Danger loves me, and as I love him I do all in my power for him."He is a leader of a strong band of christian spies, and he is also a great general and a great scout."He has ever thought all his followers to become expert mountain climbers."and he loves all his followers better than any one can believe."He seems to see me as if I and he are brothers."Some times on stormy nights he sleeps in the next room there"and he rubs a mature over his right shoulder into the darkness."He says if any of followers have great power and wish to do anything no matter how risky, he will be ill---- if he is the bravest hunter will attack the biggest wild beast, or an escort a mountain climber scale the most dangerous peak."He is one of those who can bring anything about in discomfort to the enemy."It is very safe to talk to each other in this tent."

All was now clear to Penrod and the Rattlesnake boy.It was evident that they were able to understand.Therefore no more was said about the mysterious signal.It had been given and here it was enough.The general had told the two boys that they must sleep in one of the rooms of the tent for the night was too terribly cold for them to make an attempt at return.Then the nr next morning some of the soldiers who were going down to the lower part of the camp in a covered wagon and would help them on their return.The Rattlesnake boy was knowthat the general was thinking of the extreme cold weather and he became restless.

"Tell him"he whispered to Penrod"that I am a born Scandinavian and my father has trained me to withstand all kinds of cold weather more than any boys of my age can, even men.And tell him how I and you went through that fright ful blizzard without mishap while our companions nearly froze to death.And tell him I am growing stronger every day.Tell him if he likes me to, I will show him what I am able to do.And general Greatheart would not have allowed me to come as your aide-de-camp if I had not proved to him what I am able to do.Tell him I'm afraid he thinks I am of no use."

Penrod explained and the general listened very attentively.The description of their experience in the cold thirty below zero blizzard, and how they saved the man woman and children except one, evidently amazed him, the story of the near death aroused him, and made him have a con fidence in the boy he had not felt at first.

"If your father and general Greatheart taught you to be like that, you can do your part just for the love of God and Country, and bring this awful war to an end."he said."It is more than one can really believe that a boy like you can do such things.The soldiers suffer intensely from this cold weather.That's why the armies prolong the seige more than fight battles.It's too cold to even fight, and the snow is so terribly deep, at at in many places its like quicksand."

The Rattlesnake boy was pacified and could afterwards give himself up to watching the general as closely as he wished to.In a few minutes the boy began to work out certain things in his mind.And thenwhy the general watched Penrod was what made the boy wonder.It appeared to him as if the general was fascinated, and could not keep his eyes from Penrod.He told them thrilling stories about the Mic-Whirthian Fortifications, and of the Geminis.He told them about the storming artillery fire from general Hansions christian batteries which was sometimes seemed about to put an end to the enemy's fortifications.He described the sufferings of the Glandelinians so far during the winter when the last Air snowstorm threatened to bury their encampments, and the soldiers were forced to dig themselves out or live for days under the masses of soft whiteness, glad to sleep as close together as possible, or to keep their own animals in their barracks and tents that they might share the warmth of their bodies. The Glandelinian soldiers were enforced to be good neighbors to each other, for the man whether he is he an officer or a private who was not ready to dig out a hidden tent or buried cannon to day, might be left to freeze and starve in his snow tomb next week.

While he talked he watched Penrod as if he was always asking him some question about him.The Rattlesnake boy was sure the general liked Penrod and greatly admired his good looks and strong body, and he looked glowing and noble noble. There was a sort of reverance in the generals manner when he spoke to the boy.He reminded the Rattlesnake boy of Emperor Hanson living more than once. And when he gave them a good hot evening meal the general insisted on waiting on Penrod with a ceremony that was more than respectful.Even the general would not sit at the table at his as was expected, but the Rattlesnake boy began to realize that the general felt that he himself should beawaiting to serve him.

"The general thinks it is my duty to stand behind your chair as the generals aide-de-camps"he said to Penrod"Perhaps as I'm your aide-de-camp I ought to do it.Shall I.I believe b it would please him."

"A bearer of a mysterious signal is not a general or a royal person."answered Penrod."General Greatheart would not like you to do it---and neither would I. Remember we are only two boy scout leaders."

It was indeed wonderful to see all three sitting together before the tent stove after their meal.The red glow of the hot of wood coal, and the orange yellow of the flames from the burning wood, filled the tent room with warm light, which made a nice mellow background for the fuzi figure of the apparent old general as he sat in his low chair, and told them more and more enthralling stories.

His sacle eyes glowed and his long neck held his head splendidly high as he described great feats of courage and endurance, or about some daring of soldiers sitting those in awesome peril, and when he closed most in the telling they alm always knew that the hero of the story had been some of the Geminis.

To the general these heros were the most beautiful and admirable human beings.Almost like an Emperor but so warm and tender of heart that he never forgot the long past days, when he had held the Supreme Person on his knee and told him tales of heroic deeds.He was like a son to him.

"Yes,yes"hesaid." ood father he always called me,and very often when he was of your age I used to bake him a cake on the hearth even as I did for his sister, when she was ten years old and I was teaching h him many most important things.And when he choose that a thing shall be accomplished--it is certainly done.He is a great general indeed and no one can any di fferent."

The flames had died down and now only the big bed of red coals made the to to interior glow, and the boys were thinking of retiring for the night, when the general gave a sudden start, and turned his head as if to listen to some sound."However Penrod and the Rattlesnake boy heard no sound, but they observed that the apparent old general did, and therefore they sat and remained so still that each of them held his breath."Perhaps after all I hear something, a clear silver sound of sleigh bells piercing the keen winter air.The old general sprang upright with the fire of delight in his eyes.

"It is he approaching"he cried out striking his hands together."He is coming.He has been on a scouting tour somewhere out as it is a very cold night he wants to sleep in his cool bed there.Help me put on some more wood"the to the Rattlesnake boy"so that he will see the flame of them through the open door as he comes."

"Shall we go in his way?"asked Penrod."We can go at once if you will it."

The general was going to the tent door to open it a little and he stopped a moment and turned.

"No no "hesaid."He must see your face my boy.He will want to see it.I want him to see how young you are."

He then threw the door wide open and they heard the sleigh bells coming nearer and nearer.Powwool the Rattlesnake boy had the thrown on the coals crackled and sparkled and roared into fire long flames, which castttheir light into the snow covered company street, and threw out in fine relief the old figure which stood in the opening, and looked so tall.And in another minute the sleigh was drawn up by two horses, the great general sprang from the seat afte after giving hurried orders to the driver and came into the tent. And in his great lavender coat with his scarlet hat and feathers he was more splendid than the apparent old general and he was. He was tall , and very royal to him, and hand , features handsome face, and he put out hand the old man as if he had been his own and only sons.

"See my good father"they heard him say"I want one of my good suppers and am wearied to night.And I have very important news to tell you."

He strode into thereddy glowing interior of the tent and then he saw the two boy scouts.

"Who are those two boys my dear father!"he asked.

The apparent old general lifted his hand and kissed it.

"They are the bearers of the Mysterious Signal."he answered rather softly."Emperor Alvina has left his entire army in the command of general Hansion and has sent General Ironclaw with his own to capture Jemnis summer town at all costs.He wants us to draw off and follow Emperor Hanson in his new movements upon fortress St Dominan.There is danger there.His foe forces are concentrating upon Herrington."

Then the mans whole look changed.His laughing face became very grave, and for a moment looked very anxious..And both Penrod and the Rattlesnake boy knew it was because he was startled to find that to be only two boy scouts.He made a sudden step forward to look at them more closely.

"So you are the bearers of the mysterious signal."He exclaimed. Penrod stood out in the glow so that the general might see his well.He saluted with with respect.

"My name is Francis Marcellus Schofield Penrod."he said."And general Greatheart sent me."

A greater change came upon the generals face.For a few seconds Penrod even felt and even many saw that there was a flush of alarm in it.But almost at once that passed.

"General Greatheart is a great noble man, and a greater and a braver Patriot."he said"If he sent you then he knows you are the one safe messenger boy he has.He has worked too long for his country, not to know what he is doing."

Penrod saluted him again.He knew what was right to say to him next.

"If it will be your Excellency's ordination we will leave you and go to bed.We go down to the lower encampment at sunrise."

"What next!"asked the general to king at him with interest.

"To Aurandecullio your Excellency."answered Penrod.

His gaze was still on his hand still with the same intent interest in his eyes.

"Good night find brave lad"he said."Abbie-again you must be proud of your brave sign bearer.God be with you until the ends."

He stood and watched the two boys as they went from the room in which they were to sleep.At the main door of his own sleeping quarters he apparently old general stood, having opened it for them.As Penrod passed and bade him and his companion good night he saw that he again made the strange obeisance beinding the knee as he went by.

Howeb However when Penrod returned to the lower camp he was scarcely allowed time to become settled down before he was given an opportunity to prove his reputation among his comrades. Information had been recieved that Hanleys army now seperated from Mio-Hollester Johnstone and somewhat reinforced was concentrating to the relief of the St Dominant Fortifications, and his comrade were planning to cross one half of the ice about twelve miles from the north pond, and the Angelinian armies were to be ordered for next to pro cent it, if possible. At this time a number of Penrods best boycomite all of whom returned in spite of the recent blizzard had not as yet even returned to the lines though it was said they survivied the great blizzard, yet believed too weak to come to the / lines and had found shelter and relief in some Hindoo villages. Penrod therefore with a large male of soldiers were out searching for them and they fired shots occasionally to attract the attention of the boys should they be anywhere in the neighborhood. It happened that the welcome sound fell upon the ears of the twenty boys as they lay in the torn and tattered huts only able to stir out by faint motions. When the oldest boy got clear of the hut which had been wrecked by the storm he rose to his feet with the greatest difficulty, and succeeded in climbing up to a ledge that gave him the most extensive view in that region. One of the boys who had followed him went back to the hut, but the latter remained to keep out, searching over the everywhere in every direction for some of his comrades. At last he saw the unwonted sight of many black moving objects about a mile distant which at first he thought to be wolves but he knew there were no wolves in this neighborhood. Suddenly the column of objects changed its course and the boy recognized the approach of the rescuers. He hastily came down from the ledge and found the camp, raised a the flag pole and flag which had been prostrated during the storm, and held it for about three minutes until his strength gave out and it was once more blown to the ground.

The leaders of the searchers had spied the boy and every soldier plowed through the deep snow with all possible speed, while the boy faltering in the direction of the approaching column fell at every few paces from sheer weakness and cold but rising again under the stimulating influence of hope until at length within nearly half a mile of the place where the rescuers had first been seen he fell into the arms of Penrod who was the first one of the party to reach him. The other boys who were too weak to follow out had to remain in the hut where they prayed that the hope now springing into being might not prove the delusive dream of a chaotic mind.

Penrod quickly pressed on towards the hut with his followers closely behind, and when they reached it they beheld a sight which became all description. This hut was situated about five miles in thereof the christian camp. This hut and the others had been selected because it was near scattered and abandoned provisions which they found there, and because there were plenty of forests near by from which to keep the huts as warm as possible, the party being too weak to transport them from any too great a distance. They were also close to that river which supplied them with water the river never freezing over because of its strong cure current. This scene about the entire huts was one of the most wretched that could be conceived. Partition of fabric, some wooden, something but fuel and food--covered the ground. The shacks had been some sort of military huts each standing twenty feet high, forty long and twelve wide. The first words that gave signs of life to the rescuing party were those of the very next boy who said in a feeble voice;

"Take me back home."

The front and western side of two of the shacks had been blown down and some of the beams were lying across three of the boys who were stretched out dead. All the others had been in their same condition for eight four hours. Sixty eight hours more and not one of the remaining boys could have survived under the circumstances. One of the boys was found in a kneeling posture with his body inclined forward and his head was resting upon his left hand. A prayer book was open and held in his right hand. He appeared indeed to be resting praying over one of the victims who was dead, and to another whose condition was most desperate, but cruel and critical. He was cold to the waist. All sensation of hunger gone, he was speechless, and almost breathless, his eyes were fixed and leaden. Indeed he was so weak that it was very difficult for him to swallow the stimulants from the hands of the soldiers. His inward tropical [illegible] his heart was breaking with [illegible] tenderness as the boy. This is not tender scene [illegible] helpless about [illegible] strongest [illegible] this scene was indeed one of heart breaking tenderness as one of the strongest and stoutest of those brave soldiers who stood about the [illegible] such a merciful errand of relief. Three other boys were extremely weak and hardly able to stand, they were no longer able to venture away from their hut to seek food upon which they had to depend to a great extent to sustain life.

CHAPTER TWENTY SEVEN.

[illegible] SAVED. [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] AND [illegible] [illegible] AND [illegible]

THE [illegible] hands, and limbs of some [illegible] of the boys were greatly swollen to such an extent that many their best friends were not able to recognize them. This but [illegible] proof that the entire party of boys who had been lost had but a short lease of life probably not more than sixty eight hours at the most. This, one of them, when the rescuers realized and it had come to them from their experience during that four and terrible blizzard storm in helping each other and so aiding their dying companions on one after another passed away from them among them forever. One poor boy was also found in a large potato sack where he had fallen had been and hopeless for days with hands and feet frozen off. Grasped in one of the stumps was found a large spoon which more scarcely had secured there to enable to feed himself.

It otherwise appeared to be however that his physical condition was the best of the survivors and this because of the fact that each of his companions had doled out to him from their small allowance of food something to help him on account of his complete helplessness to add everything to his own by hunting near the river for [illegible] and river [illegible]. He suffered no waste of strength in [illegible] exertion. This [illegible] the boy was over such as may have and in an [illegible] suffering with more other would have come under the most desperate circumstances, even [illegible] the boy seemed to be very much reduced though he was in some [illegible] better condition than some of the others. His work as hunter and forager for the starving party of boys made it very very necessary to increase slightly his allowance of food to maintain strength that he might continue the desperate battle for food and life to the helpless.

In his case however the effect of this desperate continued effort had told its story in the mental form of the boy. The journeys that were made became shorter and shorter and his strength became so much impaired that when the rescuers fired their rifles which [illegible] distance he had only strength enough left to stagger out of the greatest but to see if the shots had come from some distant scouting party.

His first visit to the [illegible] of rocks was indeed a bitter disappointment for he was not able to see any one at all. He made a second visit about half an hour later and this time he saw them approaching, and he rolled down the snow covered cliff and into their sight. And he informed Penrod that the location of the huts were just to the [illegible] of rocks.

And indeed the [illegible] scene was one then to [illegible] with the scene inside cool shack, desperate and desolate, the [illegible] horrors of the spot, the row of [illegible] on the rear, [illegible] [illegible] with protective [illegible] and feet of those in it, [illegible] in the frozen earth, and but allow witness to the daily increasing weakness of the small band of survivors the deserted ruined shacks near the river, with the [illegible] walls of two of them invaded by the snow blown into the wind, the [illegible] frozen bodies of three companions stretched on the floor, the wretched make [illegible] for cooking utensils found in the houses and improvised by the [illegible] their sore distress hardly [illegible] the crew, [illegible] the scattered and torn [illegible] uniforms and pieces of the land, the absence of all food save a few [illegible] of [illegible] soup, the [illegible] scene of deep snow [illegible] and small river [illegible] [illegible] and overhanging this desolate huts completed a harrowing picture to startle [illegible] as it was impressive. Penrod hoped never again in his [illegible] life to look upon such wretchedness and such complete destitution. The scene was more startling and more pathetic than he had ever dreamed [illegible] could be possible.

In beholding [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] about to swoon, but then realized if the exposition [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of snow and hail, and strun e to any accompanied by dazzling flashes of lightning and shattering crashes of thunder.The clouds been a very inky and heavy.It was apparent that a heavy Saturday storm was on, and a frightful counterpiece of the thunder storm, of wind, and lightning was unparalleled.Several had a terrible time to face the hurricane, and with the darkness coming on the storm grew so wild that the destruction of the rescued and rescuers at one time seemed absolutely certain.The storm raged fiercely some time, on for with increasing violence.At length the party, until rescued the shelter of a wood, and soon found their way to the objective lines where every possible preparation had been made to insure their recovery.After resting breath the survivors to the camp a fresh party despite the storm turned their attention to recovering the bodies which lay under the snow not far, and soon in marked and others in unmarked graves.Twenty of the poor boy who were dug out of their snow and ice beds and carried to a large one tag in the warm river, where they were dressed in becoming clothing again, preparatory to being the took to the camps for interment.Hilton Parish,Tot Ole Tom from Bolton NO. One to Long Lane Bridge had a constant and most furious struggle, all ice in almost impossible floes, and when in open water but still under circumstances with the wildly dashing waves.

However the gold hearters were nobly overcome by patience and watchfulness.

T hey lit out for a camp fifteen miles away and two miles, and for seventeen miles the way lay was forced to go its way through snow banked ice varying from four to eight feet, and also rafted together with more great. But these were also brought to an end.And this accomplished during the most violent gales and blizzards ever to sweep.Four of the rescuers lit had knocked down by flying branches were unable to walk.The remainder of the rescued bungarts was shouldered the weakest but, getting the most sturdy of the party.He had help to the shelter from [illegible] to the end of the [illegible] failing strength.

He was not even able to stand up alone for five minutes, but was about but lean except in a sitting posture, all his power of limbs had ceased, in appearance was wild, his hair was long and unkempt, his face and hands were covered with sooty black dirt, his body was scantily covered with torn and uniform, his form was wasted, his joints were swollen, a mere in a man more mummy.

The blizzard that had broken so suddenly raged all day, the wind increasing to a perfect hurricane during the night many tents within the lines being blown down or carried away every five minutes.During were of respite [illegible] and not [illegible] to a shelter, but [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] what it is myself."

"I believe the boy scout Schofield Penrodcan find it out for us Your Excellency."said the captian who with his usual promptness had determined upon a plan."They will return this afternoon about four o-clock and with your permission I'll send the lad and see what he can do, and I'll accompany him and his Rattlesnake Ike, companion."

"Very well"replied the general but upon reflection in a tone which showed that he did not anticipate his success in the interprize."Go ahead but be careful not to excite their suspicions as to any on a clandestine spy, is almost as dangerous as suicide."

Penrod was notified, and to his much chagrin on this honor was bestowed upon him which required skill and judgement was just what suited the brave lad, and having recieved his directions, and laid his plans, he and the captain felt very confident of success.At three o-clock he and the "Rattlesnake Ike" companion with the captian, all heavily armed, went tward that neighborhood. The captian walked through the pathway in the deep snow up to the house, and being heavily clothed seated himself upon the portico despite the cold, while the two boys as they had been instructed, strolled off toward the barn.There were a group of Appollinian officers in the house, and the captian had spent only a few minutes conversation with them, when the "Sorrenor" and his cowboy drove up in the sleighs.The former sprang fro the seat, and greeted the officers with apparent good cordiality, but the captian scarcely notice' him, for his eyes were upon the cowboy, who unhitched the two horses and led them tward the barn to put them up.The captian then arose from his seat and followed slowly after the cowboy.Asthe region was as yet in possession of the Appollinians and the National officers and others were accustomed to roam rno about the neighborhood wherever they pleased, no one noticed the captians move out.

Therefore when he reached the barn where the cowboy was unhooking the horses, he and Penrod suddenly entered, and closed the door shut behind him.

The cowboy became terrified, and filled with dismay when he found himself confronted so suddenly, and now he became surpicious that he had his companion had been discovered, and he looked desperate indeed.

"Ah I know you are one of the crafty spies at work."said the captian in a triumphant tone as to notice the cowboys trepidation."Come over here instantly, I wish to converse with you for a few moments on a subject that is very important.Come here you sneaking cur."

The cowboy dropped the blanket which he had just taken from one of the horses and stood for a moment almost totally undecide' how to act.Then he suddenly sprang forward like a fierce tiger, thrust the officer aside as if he were only a curtain, and made a most frantic effort to open the door.H wever quick as the spring of a panther the captian grappled with him, but the cowboy was a most powerful man, and easily threw the captian to the floor as if he were a baby, and would no doubt have succeeded in making his escape, had not both Penrod and the Rattlesnake boy sprung from their concealment in a large manger, and felled the rebel to the floor with telling blows from the butts of their revolvers.

For some time the cowboy lay insensible, and it took the boys to throw six buckets of cold water into his face before he began to recover.Soon he was ableto sit up, and as he saw the captian stationed himself at the barn door with drawn revolver to guard against surprise, and Penrod proceeded to question the desperate cowboy.

"I guess you have discovered by this time that we are absolutely in earnest, have you not?"

The cowboy felt of his head, then for his answer, and finding that also rose refused to reply.

"Now mr spy" continued Penrod" where you are willing to answer the questions I shall demand of you, I'll shoot you right here.What do you and the "Sorrenor go out so far beyond the ranch for every day, cold and stormy though it be?"

The cow boy still remained silent, and the captian growing very impatient exclaimed to Penrod;

"Here Penrod search the scoundrel.I guess there we cannot find some to make him talk, he's too determined."

"The glandelinians will kill you all for this"growled the cowboy trembling violently with rage and fury."I'll not tell you anything even if you do all to slay me, and if you search me you take things away from me, the glandelinians will turn the world upside down to get you."

"So they won't eat I'm telling the truth at that."said the captian."Then one can well have no here.But your Confederate will know nothing about this either for we will not tell him."And as the captian finished speaking Penrod drew from the cowboys inner coat pocket, what, a folded slip of paper."He opened it and then said in a low voice to the captian;

"The glandelinians are aiding every approach to the St Bernard fortresses." and Penrod glanced around him with an air of caution, as if he expected to see rebelsappear before him in some magical fashion. or through the walls as it were.

"Planting mines to all the approaches"repeated the captian in alarm."How far down the plan may they are stretched, and where does their line begin."

"In the neighborhood of Sunlake Creek about five or six miles from here."

"Who is directing the mine matters?"

"Rebel officers."

"Who are they?"

By this information the captian finally learned the truth.The enemy was not going to cross here at all.One piece of information did not trouble him a bit, and he realized an attempt was being made to blow up a whole army of attacking corps she'd another assault be made upon the fortifications.He also realized the number of mines, the manner of operating with them, and their placing, and other part particulars that would soon appear.Yet he was just as much puzzled as ever and paced the floor of the barn undecided how to act.The time set for the completion of the mines was to be on a Thursday afternoon it was then Wednesday and as the slip of paper informed of the work, and gave proof of Hanleys knowledgement of general Lyons intended movements, the question was how to keep the rebels in ignorance that their plot had been discovered, so that the work might be carried on as usual.There was apparently only one way and that was to try and hold out inducements to the cowboy.

"Well here my good fellow"said the captian kindly."Now that you are between two fires, I give you last chance"

"I curse you now that replied the cowboy well aware of his most precarious situation."I know that, but there is nothing that I can do."

"Well you must to this."answered Penrod."Have off and attend to your work as you did before have some powers with me and I'll make a duplicate of this plan and set to the original to you providing you promise so you won't be discovered.I'll positively sure you would not be fooling enough to say a word about this business to any one in this neighborhood, for if we do and everything does not appear as it is about such it would, I shall know that you have been informing the rebels and that their work is discovered and then you are a goner. But if you will aid us I swearing plot you will go free."

The cowboy who had been worked up to the highest pitch of fright at the turn the affairs were taking hesitated a while the words"all outlaws to go free" struck his ear, and Penrod who was pretty good judge of human nature, could easily read what was passing in his mind, and knew that in the cowboy he had a faithful coadjutor.

"Now sir Cowboy if you are certain that if you accept understand what I mean"said the boy"Be off, to get the best hour of the day so that no one can see you from the house, and remember that we are setting you free on your work."

The cowboy arose to the floor, and reclaimed his original place (Penrod having hastily drawn another) speedily put his suit.After waiting until the cow boy reached the house, Penrod and his companion, and the captian, slipped out the front door.Giving the barn a wide berth, they approached the farm house in a diff different direction from that in which the lad left it.The boys had been instructed to keep the affair a profound secret, for now that they had succeeded in a measure in a part of the plot they might to have the honor of completing it.After few minutes conversation with the "Sorrenor at the house the started for Norwin Run.

One of the most remarkable adventures that ever befell any one I believe, happe happened to Penrod and his whole party of boy scouts, when while out on a scouting tour near the Norwin at time to see the locks of the time, they were suddenl met upon by a company of clandelinian soldiers in ambush.So sudden was the appearance of these rebels, that in their confusion the boys were compelled to wink the water of scrub the snow, a foot and covered with a coat of ice, and the result of their scare or mistake was detached the fields or floes.

As the next one the ice was another floe from the main body clandelinians, their flight was considerably interrupted by floes in the ice, a fact that formed in every direction, and many a time it required the united efforts to pass, especially when both floes were in the clandelinians.

Had any of the ice broken asunder, all of the boys would have been lost, and even now their escape to the shore was cut off by the enemy, for the Glandelinians swarmed on both sides pouring a hot fire upon the fugitives.The boys knew the very certainity of this peril, hence despite the fire of the rebels on shore, the lads found it necessary to retain their ammunition, and with rifle in the enemy, though their being out there diminished their chances of reaching the shore.

This forced retreat of the fugitives was at once full of peril, and the hardships during which six of the boys were hit by the enemy's bullets, and being killed or mortally wounded fell into the water, and were there hit and only wounded and who also fell into the water had to be rescued at the imminent risk of life, the thermometer was thirty-five below zero, and their clothes froze so hard as to cause the boys to die.

It was fortunate for the rest of them however that just now there was a wind or storm weather, though appearance of storm was on the approach, and therefore the boys were able to cross the loose ice, and reach the solid sheet, though some of them were so benumbed by the cold that they had to be helped along along by their companions.

At that moment one of the boys was struck by a bullet, and was killed instantly. The rest of the boys managed to escape the Glandelinians or at least got out of their rifle range, but at six o-clock that afternoon they jumped onto a ice floe without expecting it to be one, the nature of the ice being none of the boys time to anticipate such an accident, Five twenty of them were left on broken bits of ice, struggling for their lives, while the remainder of the Regiment were on the main floe, wondering how they were going to get back to land as the river was eight miles wide at this point.Fortunately two of the boys had long ropes, and with these, those on the small ice floes were rescued, and then the long drifting on the shallow-ness shore of ice began.They looked in vain for a chance to escape the shore but they were held irresistibly carried away down stream by the river's current.The floe upon which Pearod and his boy scout Regiment were now floating was half a mile in circference, nearly circular and as flat as a pancake, though covered in some places with high snow drifts.

Toward evening on account of a collision with another ice floe the other one broke in two, separating one half of the Regiment of boys from the other half.Both companies were now on a piece of ice not more than five or less than two hundred feet in diameter and this was gradually lessening from grinding with the other ice.Pearod appointed some of his boys to try to secure river fish, which were their only hope to either escape the long hunger or possible starvation.It was already the night or latter of February, and the following day was much more colder but fortunately was calm, though somewhat windy, the other storm having spent off its fury and did not strike in this section.

A whole day and night went by without food, and the following day, they had no means to cook their food, and unless they reached the shore soon they would would face starvation.

Pearod felt sad over the sufferings of his boys during the following night and if they had not been mentally stirred from time to time, they would all would have froze to death.

The miserable group of boys, not yet out of sight of land, had nothing to eath out for two days, and some of them were crying like babies.One of the boys who was twelve or thirteen years old was there to cheer the others. He seemed to have a little scrap of something he was chewing on, but he looked peaked and was lying down on the ice, his head resting against the breast of another boy as he sat on the ice cake with no apparent belonging, some of the dead boys drove over him.One of the younger boys was crying a bit of chronic hunger whine.All Pearod could do was to encourage the boys a little. He had nothing that he could give them to eat or chew, more especially.If they would only drift into a big field of solid ice there would be hopes to reach the shore.But here all was open water for all the width and length as far as eye could see.Some small birds were even now and then captured and eaten, the now starving boys who were left in a more object state, the fact that they were no nearing the wider part of the river, it was more evident than before that a big storm was approaching.During the night long lines of heavy like over gathering, thundervolts spread hot flashes over the sky through calm but very dark and sullen.

The long [illegible] of the night were very cold, for they were on the river and the river was now so wide that even in the moonlight the objects on the distant shores were dimd, visible. They were drifting rapidly in the darkest night hour, light or fast, anyone could count on [illegible] below zero temperature and their clothes were frozen stiff while in the light snow fish were secured and so ravenously hungry were the boys that they ate them raw skin and all.

This lucky stroke of the boys was indeed a God send for they were upon the point of succumbing to starvation.But there was another long spell of fasting to follow. Despite the dark heavy clouds of the day the following night however became less dark for a while, and the moon was now apparently there as a rifle in the hands and though it brought no warmth the rays cheered many the drooping spirits of the starving and half frozen Regiment of brave boy scouts.About nine o-clock after the appearance of the moon one of the oldest and strongest of the boys discovered something on some cake near the floe.The ice had been formed during the early part of the evening and was not even strong enough to bear up the weight of a baby while lying on it, and yet too thick to force a small rowboat through.It was a most interesting experiment indeed but the boy scout decided to make an effort to capture it whatever it was.Going as near to the edge of the floe as he dared two of the boys supporting him he uncoiled his rope and making a loop at one end cast it flying over the smooth ice toward the object like a cowboy lassoes a calf.Whatever it was, the creature was asleep or appeared to be not was easily caught.

But the most important part of the adventure was yet to be performed, for if the creature could not be [illegible] on the thin layer of ice and if the ice fell through that would be lost.But by thankful management of other boys they succeeded in being able to reach the main floe in safty dragging the creature after them.It turned out to be a young calf frozen to death in the river and the boys devoured it raw at two meals, including even some of the intestines.A little later that night when the moon was more thickly clouded again, and a gale of wind began to rise most of the boys were almost sleeping while walking, they heard a most suspicious noise a little beyond the ice floe where they were stopped by chopped ice not close to theedge of the floe where the elder boys had camped, they not the others being a few yards distant.Pearod who was preparing to [illegible] rather soon he will lie down, on hearing the noise thought the ice was starting to break up on account of the gale, but who went toward the location to see what the situation was.He was not gone more than ten minutes before he came back pale and frightened, exclaiming-

"We are under a small Glandelinian battery.We are unsure if the Glandelinians see us."

The stranded floe was within three hundred yards of this battery and from the flare of lights on the shore it was evident they were seen.The boys kept perfectly still but lying flat with their pistols at the ready to shoot the first gunner as a runner before they could fire.Some of the boys now crept cautiously forward toward the side of the floe to get within easy range of the battery, and getting it within their view they could distinctly hear the gunners talking.

There were several guns within sight of the boys,and the boys could plainly see the gunners.But one of them was looking a way.Pearod crawled stealthily forward to where he had left the rifle, but when he pulled it forward he allowed out fell taking consternation noise.The gunners he heard it but were [illegible] that [illegible] of the boys pulled the trigger of [illegible] but the rifle did not go off.He pulled the second and even third time--- it did not go off, but the boys did, for the rebels fired one of the cannon, and a ball came right for them. The boys put fresh cartridges in and crept forward a min- ute into a position where they could see the gunners although the moon [illegible] was hidden it was very dark.The gunners gave the boys creeping forward and were in about the field piece, but this time several of the boys fired their own pieces, and the balls went straight to the mark.Some of the others boys also cracked their rifles and pistols at the Glandelinian gunners.Some of the successful and terrified Glandelinians ran for about two yards and were then shot down.Indeed there were [illegible] for the boys in the dark.For the [illegible] on the main [illegible] a fierce [illegible] with a powerful Glandelinian soldier who had risked the peril of breaking through the ice to attack the smartest boys.The [illegible] knife in his striking him on the head with a rifle butt.It was an exceedingly interesting for boys to fight with the Glandelinian soldiers on the ice floe for the Glandelinians of our work are very few in number, and if [illegible] were to use [illegible] a fate of the [illegible] boys would be sealed.Even after seeing the battery now the were afraid for on the strength of the ice breaking [illegible] the ice would break up, and the cave in current treat [illegible] their lives from drowning, [illegible] from a little stream [illegible] current, [illegible] [illegible] like this could not exist [illegible] the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] tossed by [illegible] waves and [illegible] part of the night, the [illegible] leg and scramble from one floe [illegible] another the ones they were left in on were [illegible] at their very feet.

This [illegible] state of affairs was continued so long that the boys were getting desperate [illegible].One of the boys had no words to ks their continued hunger and fright no doubt was disturbing their brains and making them almost insane.

Penrod beganvto fear that these boys contemplated something near to the desire of cannibalism.After all they had gone through he hoped his contingent of boys would b be preserved from any fatal wrong that all the boys can not must bear the trials that God sends without crime.Some of the boys had threatened to eat their dead comrades, and kill and eat some of the half frozen boys, and the latter were in constant dread of that terrible fate ,but Penrod had determined that if an attack should be made upon them, he would standby them, and die with them.One hour more passed without a catastrophe through the wind was blowing harder than ever now from the North East and the snow was beginning to fall in fine flakes but w very thick of all a sudden mingled with great big ones.The ice was still the same.One of the boys kept an hours watch through the rest of the night, though he was alarmed at the intensity of the winds increase and the heavy wall of snow growing so thick.Some of the boys were took so weak up to keep up long together and complications may set in if a great storm really arises.One of them had already collapsed during the night, and two of them had died.

The following morning was a day which none of the boys can ever forget in their lives, for from four in the morning, untill eleven o-clock the next night every one of the boys was compelled to face a fury and fight death with a nerve and endurance which only a desperate love of life could inspire.A most fierce gale of wind blowing nearly a hundred and fourty miles an hour, and probabl prob probably one of the worse blizzards of the season literally came on, the wind lashing the wind expanse of the river into tempet tempestuous billows like that of a raging ocean storm, the waves fiercely rolling over them and their floe and sweeping away the little shelters they had made from the hardened snow and nearly everything but themselves and the floe, this the boys held themselves onto with a death grip/ for it was theonly thing between them and destruction.

The storm grew in force and fury, gust after gust of wind howling down the river, the wind having grown untill it became like a fierce hurricane and the noise the boys heard on the opposite shore gave them an evident idea that trees were being prostrated to earth by the score per minute by the force of the terrible cyclone.There was a perfect blinding sheet of snow, and as it grew darker and the wild wind blew o all of a sudden a terrific screeching squall something heavy struck one of the boys, and he was thrown sharply on his back upon the ice, and suddenly there came a flash of blue white lightning like a heavily branched ash scimitar that seemed to rip the very heavens asunder.

There came a deafening peal of thunder, rolling resonant as the wind redoubled in its force and a monsterous wave almost torn the floe asunder, so s of the boys caught a glimpse of Penrod with his arms around the stump of a small tree, the boy having been blown ashore.His face was turned toard the boys on the raft of ice, and he appeared to be shouting at the top of his lungs, but he was not heard in the uproar of the Typhoon which it really was.

Then there came a more dense pall of snow and rain blown into the faces of the boys it stung like the cut of a lathers lash.Some of the boys were even knocked unconscious for a few moments by a piece of ice hitting him on the head but he was roused again by a still more awful flash of lightning.He looked for Penrod but the only thing he saw was the trunk of a great tree crashing int o the river near the floe.He closed his eyes and fainted away.When he opend his eyes he could hearin the roaring of the great storm, the wind giving a noise like a gren great audience of a million people shrieking and yelling like demons, while the snow swirled , waves, and fell like a cloudburst, and was also driven horizontally by the wind, and it was now half as dark as night.All about was chaose and tumult.

It was a wonder that the force of the almost twenty foot waves did not shatter their floe.The sensation was stupifying and the roaring of the storm all around almost seemed to burst his ear drums, a shrieking saddened tempest on every hand.He could see the leaping billows dipping through the ever increasing snow pall, the river seething and boiling like the water in a giant cauldron, and the sound of the insane tempest seemed to blend into one frenzied devilish shriek that literally swept toward from the four quarters of heaven.

There was now danger of the waves shattering the ice floe to pieces as they grew in size and force, and the floe was forced also to go through the water like a insane cult at the same time the boys were half blinded with fear.All day long they had held on to the floe which a hundred lives was in danger of being washed by the mad waver of the river, while they were assailed by windrowed batteries of ice of all sizes hurled upon the floe by the waves, which bruised their legs and bodies in a shocking manner.But the boys held on while the boys continually called loudly to each other;"Do something,for God's sake find some better footing.I cannot .Great Heavens help us." another cried as with a shock that seemed to shake it from end to end a thirty foot wave struck it the floe and almost swamped all of the boys.The ice floe rocked as though in the throes of an earthqke earthquakw earth quake, they had a blinding vision of toppling and uprooted trees, and the storm continued and increased in all its blinding fury accompanied by a thicker torrent of snow pellets yet sharpr and cruel as a hundred flails, then there came a flash of lightning and a crash of thunder that paralyzed their senses.As they struggled for life the boys a prayed desperately and helplessly, while the snow driven into their faces by the wind cut their cheeks like the slashes of a gleaming knife. Then came a black night, infinitely more terrible, infinitely more sublime than the blackness of an arctic night, and the wild storm was now at its height.Still the boys bravely held on throughout the whole night and part of the more wilder night untill the frightful window storm with datons and blizzard ceased, and by sheer good luck the floe had at last been driven by the storm a close to the shore, near where the already weakened regiment of boys were able to laboriously make their way to the shore where they had the extraordinary good fortune to meet in with a large scouting party the very morning they landed.After the snow stopped falling so thickly so that the boys were able to observe far in the distance the Angelinian sortified camps amid the maze of wrecked trees and barracks.But it was afar off and only dimply through the heavy snow mark.Four feet on the level lept had fallen that one day.All the force the boys and the soldiers plowed on through the deep snow on an wahoos, and there was an intense nervious strain excited by the hope of meeting another party of soldiers with food and provisions.In the forenoon the snow stopped falling altogether, and they entered the camp to be about at six miles distant.Soon far in the distance another scouting party came in sight.The forlorn party pushed on slowly through the deep snow with a will toward the new force untill a high thirty foot snow drift of considerable length stopped their further progress in that direction.

After some difficulty they managed to work their way around the snow mountain avoiding the maze of falling fallen trees also, and seeing the column still within sight some of the soldiers fired a number of shots from their rifles.

The sounds of the shots was soften borne to them in response and the column headed for them but was checked often by fallen trees, which had fallen by the thousand ever where.Every boys heart was leaping with rapture for rescue seemed at hand, but like a will-o-the-wisp the solo column for some reason or other was compelled to change its course, and faded away into the distance.They had encountered such a stretch of shattered trees and limbs and such deep snow in the region for a mile or more that progress for them was out of the question. They were now within six miles of the camp, where they might expect to see scouting parties more frequently as they are numerous in all kinds of weather even at this location where they were.At three P.M. that afternoon they were overjoyed by the near approach of a large sleigh driven by Abbiannian soldiers.The boys themselves instant fired their guns, while the noise of the discharge was increased by a great built of shouts which the whole party set up to attract the drivers attention. Being very near the driver soon arrieving the snow board party drove up, and all the boys were lifted up with the soldiers upon the long sleigh, and speedily brought to the christian lines.

The storm had created havoc here, one of the barracks being totally wrecked, with walls blown in, and all the tents were prostrated.Countless numbers of soldiers were seen at work repairing their tents when the boys arrived.Yet it would be utterly impossible to describe the joy felt by Penrod and his fellow sufferers at finding themselves in more comfortable quarters in one of the last ruined barracks, feasting from a boisterous table and saved from the very jaws of a terrible death.

The driver who rescued them with his sleigh was a Salvervation.This extraordinary character of this adventure, in the fringe or outer edge of a great Typhoon whose greatest force few saw out at sea, was one of the greatest wonders of thrills and entrances. A period of four days the whole re inent of boys had been drifting on the ice floes during which time they traveled by the river current about thirt, miles down, and fought their way up driven back by the force of the wind and waves.

The darkness of a Silverwinn winter blizzard storm at night is a condition of nature which especially the Canadians alone are used to, stroked with a fierce wind filled with pelting snow, but to the people such a winter storm raging at night seems to curtain the whole country like a pall of approaching death to afford concealment for the most fearful night of the year, not a current gone those of the storm and fortresses. Sometimes one or at most should sometimes only twelve hours long or three days duration or longer, but when clouds are blackest, the intensity of an arctic night and blizzard storm.

The shadows are deeper, and the snow veil so thick not one can be seen twenty feet away at times, and the distant glowing camp fires if one are sheltsheltered enough to be able to burn, in the only source of flickering light, save the signal flashes that twinkle and flare like frost setting gathering gleams from a setting sun.

The darkness of the clouds of a Calverinian blizzard storm, especially the one wind cyclonic wind generally comes on at four o-clock in the morning, and if the fri and if it is the frinze of some right a Typhoon far out at sea, increases with a steadiness that is insidious, and its advance can only be perceived by comparing with the freakish clouds appearing one day or more ahead of the storm and keeping it very dark. At night the clouds just three hours or more before the sto m outbreak may clear away at for the Moon or stars to shine through, and then cloud up suddenly again, the wind rises and the storm is on.so thick will be the darkness and so pall that even the nearest white covered hills cannot be seen. The stars that following night after this great storm looked down on a vast country side, and a big besieged city and armorious encampments and fort fications all dissolas in whiteness, half buried encampments and small camp fires here and there during the storm at night it generally becomes so dark that no one can see print and and hardly white paper and. even a man cannot view his hand beforehis eyes. And except a vague glimmer of distant camp fires that define the outlines of snow bound encampments of Fortifications all is midnight darkness. And the effects of the inte nsity of the extreme cold waves that usually follow such a sonw storm is most depressing. Even horses and other animals are hardly able to withstand it and have to be placed in warm barracks with the soldiers. Most of them and nearly all of the Glandelinian and Angelinian soldiers had already suffered intensely, thousand had already died in one month from the cold and from an anomulous of form of disease to w ich it was contributed as much as from the fierce winter storms as much as from the extreme cold.

This kind of nervious disorder which distresse so many animals and there were four hundred cases of Hydrophobia among them which was believed to be produced by the severe intensit of the old snows. While the soldiers are not so seriously affected by the long period of cold weather as are the animals even in shelter they do not wholly escape, and frequ ntly, succe cumbing if cut long. To ward off this the officers keep their troops busy at all times and all kinds of hard work and exercize as making enormious snow works and forts and other military labors and thus render the body less receptive to the effects of the dreaded weather.

In every respect a cl u cloudy Calverinia winter night, eve if not stormy, is awful, and sometimes it tries the strongest constitution constituting character upon; the clandelinians for aside from scurvy it is the most delet erious exhaustive influence which the rebels have to contend. This darkness caused or causes among the Glandelinians, and still more heavily among the lesiergers a sort of melancholia especiall to those on duty at night. To prevent this insidious disease their officers keep the night mar frequent frequently but busy at laying all kinds of l mines and other native gear times.

And sentinels are allowed to make a big bonfire as possible possible to break some of the darkness and keep themselves from freezing to death from the night duty outside.

Cards, checkers, chess, and other games also serve to occupy the mind. Beyond the stations where lie house the vast Glandelinian armies there is no sound at night, and if a blizzard storm is on any without, and if it is snowing without wind, which of course it seldom does, the snow falls as soft as shadows, and if the stillness is broken by an alli ensound, or a bello, a sound comes back, excepting an occasiltin echoes.

So perfectly quiet, lonesome and weirdly stagnant does all the world seem, that it weighs with a wonderful oppressiveness upon the brain and soul all alike, untill the uproar of a battle, or a thermal bourne or shrieking tempest would appe appear more welcome, for in the presence of death the soul finds interest in reflection, spirit would at least be company there for chaotic thoughtsand frantic hearts.

It took three days before the boys recovered enough to be able to return to General Wivian lines and finall the did in two hours. As soon as Penrod was ready he at once repaired to General Wivian headquarters.

Standing before the great soldier Penrod said respectfully;

"I have returned, Your Excellency."

"So I see" replied the General "and I heard all about you and your brave men, escaping in the blizzard, and have I supposed accomplished nothing on account of the blizzard hurricane?"

"No sir, it is not best for me to say that at all." answered Penrod guardedly. "I have accomplished very much before the storm but the storm delayed my coming here as well as beingcast adrift on the ice floe. I know the "Foreigner is no Frenchman at all but a professional Glandelinian spy, that he is a disguised general at work directing the laying of mines to blow up all christian forces moving forward to attack the St Dominean fortifications. As for his knowing a farm and a Cattle Ranch it is more than nonsense. And he has about as many Cattle there as I have. Though the deep snow may delay their purpose I know it they'll continue it as soon as the snow is removed."

Then Penrod told of his adventure on the ice floe with the one of Lyscouts and how two were lost and that.

"Have indeed succeeded in spite of all ten and the storm" in general in great measures. "Your Excellency."

"Well not a t ply Your Excellency" replied Penrod who did not know how much it was best to tell the general. "I have and also the captian learned more than that but it will take lots of time to complete the work on account of the storm the snow having laid four feet ten inches deep in eighteen hours. And before I andthe captian go further sir, I should like the full authority to manage the affair myself. After I have gone as far as I have I should not like to have my superseded."

"That was not my intention at all dear brave boy. I'll see to it that no one will be placed over you. If you and the captian can accomplish anything more do it. But for God's sake try to keep yourself out of these winter storms of they'll cause you to perish one of these days. That last one is childs play compared to other great storms I've seen. But what else did you learn?"

Penrod then related the result of the interview between himself and the Glandelinian cowboy, and then after and being left the general with respected assurances that his desperate and dare devil plans for capturing the rebel miners and engineers should not be interfered with. The next day it seemed to Penrod that the boys never or la ed with m. The sun was shining brightly but it was fearfully cold but windy, and the snow deeper than usual for a heavy squall had occured during the night. The winters of the coldest weather are about five months long at first cold waves following storms it has an almost Polar atmosphere and climate and therefore there ensued such rapid evaporation of heat from a mans body that usually the internal temperatures is materially lowered sometimes as much as three degrees while in the north there is a total absence of caloric so that snow or ice will not melt even within the closed mouth.

Penrod had often during this severe winter observed the serious effects produced upon those by the eating of ice or snow too latter particularly and he had known of many Angelinians especially soldiers suffering from thirst to for ot themselves and attempt to quench their thirst by eating snow.

Penrod observed that it was followed by results almost identical with that of a piece of highly heated iron held in the mouth, it burns so intensely that thetongue is speedily reduced to a blistered and then raw condition just as if the covering or papillae were entirely burned off, and the victim then dies.

Also morally the effects upon themucous membrane of the mouth arano less disasterous.

Scores of thousands of Angelinians had already this winter been tortured by thirst and laid down their lives in the severest cold weather after the most excruciating sufferings he not heeding the warnings being them against eating snow. General Wivian during one of his scouting tours when it was seventy two below zero had with his some excellent brandy which was no high a proof that it would not freeze many weather. Knowing that if he did not warm it before allowing it to pass his mouth and so much colder enter he had to go thirsty until he returned to camp and his suffering from thirst at that time was almost intolerable.

CHAPTER TWENTY EIGHT.

THE DISTARDY PLOT OF THE REBELS IS FRUSTRATED.

THE AFTERNOON CAME AT LENGTH, but there was no let up in the terrible cold weather. Being as heavily clothed as possible he then went toward the location where he had seen the rebel miners and engineers at their works.going tothe house near the make belief farm and Ranch he camecross the cowboy and having learned from him that everything was working as nicely as could be expected despite the big blizzard blizzard cyclone, Penrod commenced his preparations for the work he planned for the coming night.At seven o-lock that evening he again left the christian lines with the exption, the rattlesnake boy and a large brigade of soldiers all on snowshoes, while a large company of Abyssinkillian soldiers shortl followed, all on snowshoes, and all wel who well armed.

The former went up straight up the river banks twart the plains in front of the St Davinean fortifications, while the remainder went in an opposite direction.

Some of the officers of this divisions of course were very much surprised at these movements.They had not recieved any information as what was going on, and thousands of soldiers thronged the outer lines of the camp watching the exa expedition as long as it remained in sight and no matter how cold it was.

The night was very much colder, intensely dark, and very windy, and the sky covered with angry storm clouds, more like that of an approaching Terrocian Typhoon than a blizzard.

The soldiers were very nervious at the aspects of these clouds but nevertheless did notback out now.It was just the right thing for the purpose that Providence had in hand, and he was highly delighted at the handsome manner in which all his plans were working. and which promished complete success.

He held the course of his advancedup the river bank until he arrived at the edge of the plains which was concealed by overthrown trees and thick bushes.He boldly pushed on over the deep snow drifts, but had not advanced not even four hundred yards when a voice hailed loudly;

"Who comes over the prairie?"

"Death and destruction to the christian dogs."promptly replied Penrod.

"Why your an hour ahead of your time."said the voice."Did not the very Abbiennians see you as you marched up?"

"I'll wagar they did a good deal more than that."said another voice. voice.

"It would just be ourmisfortune to have the whole affair nipped in the bud.But we'll make the attempt anyway when the battle begins if there is to be one.Come up here friends."

It was so dark out here in the plains that in spite of the snow covering it Penrod could hardly see his hand before his eyes but he knew pretty sure who it was who was addressing him.Dashing on in full obedience to the order he came in line of a sight of soldiers clothed in white fur overcoats and caps looking more like human polar bears.In this lineswere over a thousand men two of whom were in the front if you please to mention, and in the distance were lines of dark objects that lay partly concealed in the snow.

"Here's the mine already but not covered yet."said one of the officers as Penrod and the Angelinians strode up until they were up to the line, and as he spoke the officer revealed a flashlight."Just take a look for yourself sir and tell me if those miners won't blow up a whole christian army that came to charge over these fields"

"Gentlemen or rather Mr Cats," said Penrod suddenly pulling a brace of pistols from his pockets."You are surrounded by a brigade of Christians known as Abyssinkillians, and therefore are prisoners. Take warning.If you resist you'll recieve no quarter."

As he spoke the Angelinians and Abyssinkillians who were the white coats, appeared on all sides, and before the rebel officers could draw a weapon they were powerless in the strong grip of those stout warriors.

Among the prisoners were the general and the staff officers of the cowboy at the make believe ranch and engineers and trench diggers, and mine tappers.some were electricians.Yet some of the Glandelinians who were of a more desperate character made a move as if about to escape but had been collared and shot down by the Abyssinians, and the rest then having the fear of so many unseen foes on such a dark and cold night kept quiet.

"What in the world do you mean by all this!"asked the general as he struggled furiously to free himself.

"It means sir,"replied Penrod in a cool voice" that you and your force are prisoners in the hands of some of the followers and I to destroy.so be wise and surrender peacefully without any more ado or you'll receive no quarter as we are all mostly Abyssinkillians here."Make their hands fast boys and be quick about it."

The Angelinians who seemed to be well prepared drew from their pockets several pieces of very strong cord with which they proceeded to tie the arms of the one thousand Glandelinians who finding it impossible to escape, submitted to the operation without any further fussing.....

As soon as they were all secured, those whowere engineers and miners of the Angelinians exploded the mines by discharging the batteries.It is indescribable to describe in words until the explosions that resulted.The explosions were terrific like as any great volcanic eruptions their force ,roving what they would have done or did to a christian army had it come across the plains.

The flashes of the explosions were extended to a mile and were blinding.After thishad been accomplished the whole force with their prisoners commenced marching toward the distant battle-ground.They had proceeded but a short distance when they recieved a challenge to which one of the Angelinian soldiers replied, when they were signal was one party of the Abyssinkillians who had been stationed on the banks of the river to capture thearies of the rebels in case they should escape from the other force of christians.The prisoners were given into their charge, and Penrod and his Angelinians and Abyssinkillians continued their march toward the ranch, congratulating themself that their work was already half done.had succeeded even beyond their most sanguine expectations.In snow covered fields [illegible] as well as all trees as it was the middle of winter, was as silent as death, but we know that the Abyssinkillians had received all of its instructions, and its many soldiers were [illegible] around him ready to spring a long to avoid a fruitless resistance if possible.

Arrived at the door of the ranch house which no light was still occupied [illegible] behind, Colonel the Angelinian officer pounded loudly upon it with the butt of his revolver.The noise was answered by the would be Frenchman who stood upon the Angelinian officer with a revolver but was pinioned [illegible] of those about him.

"I am certain you, lad, have seen you."said the Angelinian officer."You are just the one I want."

The would be Frenchman probably at once that he had been betrayed.Drawing a pistol he leveled it at the colonel who fired and shot him dead, and six of the Abyssinkillians and wounded twenty, before it before he had time to fire another shot or rush into close to terrorize himself a few from the centre in the hands of one of the Abyssinkillians who [illegible] some one who had been shot [illegible] rebels from their caps snap.

The next moment a [illegible] the would be Frenchman right [illegible] Angelinian soldier.

He [illegible] pinioned he got free, and with one blow of his fist struck the Angelinian down but before he could be tried he had once more like a spin in wheel.Then he made a dash for the rear door, but the Abyssinkillians seeing it were alive promptly shot him down dead.

The cowboy also was captured by the Angelinian escaped to [illegible] at this moment said;

"Give [illegible] to it."but two fellows pistol or we may be too late.Come [illegible] and I stand by and the two fellows a fire.All ready quick."

The order was obeyed, most five were broke in, the Angelinian white troops [illegible] like ghosts [illegible] the whole troop to [illegible] the prisoners following Penrod [illegible] the plain [illegible] the thick [illegible] the [illegible] weapon in [illegible]

"Where is the general, and [illegible] are all in a work are" [illegible] the others of the [illegible] are cautious in their movements but [illegible] already [illegible] one called out;;

"Who was there?"[illegible]

"Nationals"[illegible] the captain who in [illegible] time with a revolver in each hand."[illegible] or die, and surrender."

The rebels of whom there were fourty were so completely taken by surprise that the seemed deprived of all power of action.The result of their realize that were mu such things as prisoners untill the Angelinis counting reports in order in a more decided manner; adding;;

''I am sorry we are compelled to shoot at that distance.''

The Glandelinians evidently did not doubt this for the order to their feet, and sprang forward to give themselves up.The prisoners to it being captured, the Angelinians collected the remainder of their force and entrenched in their lines.

We will now pause and explain it all.Penrod and the captain as we have soon had learned from the cowbo cowbo that the entire line of mines would be finished on the night of the day before the blizzard that they were to be prepared as soon as possible by the general and his son who were to put the electric batteries in workin order and deliver the plans to the authorities at the Lucille Hickson Fortifications, who with a big force of men was to move forward half past eight o'clock, to note the exact position of the Glandelinian forces so that after obtaining the minor in readiness they could begin movement draw the advancing troops into the fatal trap.The man who pretended to be a Frenchman was to be in the land, and with the assistance of a powerful body of cavalry was to capture or slaughter all the Angelinians who might escape the explosions.The capture of Lucille was to capture the way to Frenchmen first, but through fear of what might disturb the plans of being away from the main rebel lines he had been compelled to give up the idea and therefore had stood started on a few earlier that he might secure the fake Napoleon after the capture of the others had been effected, but before he could have time to discover that the mine had been effected, for before he could have time to perils of the cold swep out the threatening breach of an irresistible cyclone of exceedingly violence, that the captain and Penrod were nearly blind over their success.It was indeed a very close shave for them when they brought their prisoners into the lines and conducted them to the interior army, where the guards were waiting to receive them.

The next morning explanations were given after the prisoners were ordered the Glandelinian people to their own country while the Angelinians were busy clearing away the snow fr[illegible] windermine with the purpose of [illegible] destroying all the [illegible] distant Glandelinian batteries, [illegible] place where general [illegible] in possession.These were [illegible] themselves [illegible] looks like great [illegible] Disciplined Secedlers [illegible] and opened fire at the [illegible] them out several [illegible] directions and concealing themselves in the [illegible] action would not result with any advantage [illegible] ordered the [illegible] the rebels [illegible] one one of [illegible] full power in [illegible] the pillars [illegible] cessful by officers [illegible]

A few days after the two boyscouts while returning from a scouting tour they saw upon a scene that they would never forget in their lives.The whole Christian [illegible] on the march toward the St Denis a magnificent and splendid war the advance that it looked like a continuous pageant.Even the sides of the broad country streets were lined with standing troops waiting their time to march in [illegible] the scarlet p[illegible] and splendor be dimmed by with marching feet. Ten [illegible] dreds of thousands [illegible] and [illegible] red [illegible] the [illegible] sleigh [illegible] loaded with cannons through the deep snow and the noise of countless drums, bands and bugles, there all combined to produce [illegible] of music in brilliant harmony.The Battlesnake boy was [illegible] thrilled by the magnificence [illegible] the cavalry [illegible] dressed in Lucanian uniforms, the scarlet uniformed white Abyssinian killians troops formed in great squares, [illegible] Generals and officers mounted like Emperors, and [illegible] and the [illegible] seemingly endless columns of cavalry, while he felt that all efforts of the enemy to win the war was impossible.

The cyranide of magnificiently colored flags and standards and [illegible] straight lines of bayonets to keep majestic and beautiful against the background of snowy whiteness seemed to sweep out of the work y appearance all atmosphere but that of splendid armies, of the Lord and his His vast armies pants down whose broad snow covered [illegible] rode soldier officers informed lie like kings, emperors, dukes, Lords, Barons, counts, Princes and the like, with waving banners of beautiful colors tramping, jangling rivers of soldiers before and behind and countless golden bar es blaring forth in great burst lt.It seemed as if it would always be like that, even the cavalry force was so in case that it was and as if the like would never pass by.

''I should like to stay here for a year.''he soldalmost as if he were dreaming.''I should like to see this always.''

He stood among the crowd of soldiers awaiting their orders to advance and watched the glitter of the passing army.Now and then he glanced at Penrod who also was watching with a steady eye with the Rattlesnake boy saw nothi ng would escape.How absorbed he was in everything going on. Indeed how impossible it was for him to even forget it or to remember it as a boy would.Often it had seemed to the Rattlesnake boy that Penrod was a man instead of a boy. and this great war the Rattlesnake boy knew in these days was more than a war, something more indeed and in more deadly earnest, a contest over child slavery, a wicked rebellion which was about to affect the whole world with is disaster, an intensive conflict whose interest and concern would sway all the nations of the world, and they---two lads standing in front of the ranks of waiting soldiers carried with the information that would cause a battle whose uproar could shake the whole Calverinian country.The blood in the Rattlesnake boys veins ran quickly and made him feel hot as he remembered certain thoughts which had forced themselves into his mind during the past weeks.

As is [illegible] and the trick of [illegible] things out, it had during the lasttwo days [illegible] had been following a wonderful even if rather fantastic and most feverish feverish fancy.

It had been set to work by [illegible] ore trifle but once its labor was begun things might have once seemed to be trifles appeared to be so no longer.When Penrod was asleep under his heavy covers the Rattlesnake boy lay awake through thrilled and someti as almost breathless hours even way past midnight looking backward and recalling every detail of their lives since they had come to know ach other.Sometimes it seemed to the Rattlesnake boy that everything he remembered the war from first to last---above all had pointed to he but one serious and most important thing,and then again, and all at once he would have the feeling that he had made of himself self a fool and that hereafter it would be better for him tokeep his head steady.Penrod as he knew had never allowed any wild fancie to get the best of him.He had learned too much at School and his mind was too well balanced to even allow excitement to get the best of him.He never did make any attempts to work out things.The only things he ever thought of was what he was under orders to do.

''But ''said the Rattlesnake boy more than once during these hours of midnight''If it ever does [illegible] a draw whether he is to be saved from the raving rebels or [illegible], he is the one that [illegible] must not be harmed by the Insurgents even if the Glandelinians [illegible] the war itself which it is a battle over will. Anyway whether killing takes long or not, I'll [illegible] the very last and general Greatheartsent [illegible] with him.''

These thughts passed through his mind as the waves of troops tramped by like a monsterous river.As a sudden burst of approaching band music playingg

''All Abbissania [illegible] upon his ears, his face was twisted by a sudden [illegible] queer and strange look.What caused it was [illegible] at he suddenly remembered a contrast between this day and that first morning behind the avenue of pine trees when he was drilling his ''lost company'' and looked up and saw Penrod

u in the arch at the advanced portion of the passage way of trees.,nd because he had been there so suddnly and because he had been so good looking and held himself so swell he had taken him for a rebel boy scout and had fired a shot at him. Yes indeed- co blind conciated war hardened fool that he was n and had 'compr--- his first greeting to Penrod had been a pistol shot just because he saw what he was.As they stood here in the cr wd of Angelinian soldiers in this far off center of the rebel ion in such intense cold weather and among such deep pi es of snow it did not seem as if it could e be true that it was he who had done it. done it

He anaged to work himself closer to Penrod's side though he had o push some soldiers out of his way.

''Isn't this a most splendid scene''he said.''I almost wish I was an emperor myself.I'd have an array like this also.''.''.''''''

He said it only because he desired to say something, to speak as a reason for getting closer to him.He even wanted to be near enough to touch him and to feel that they were really together, and that the whole thing was not a sort of magnificent dream from which he might awaken to find himself lying wounded on his cot for months a full year before.The immense crowds of waiting a ed soldiers swayed forward in its eagerness to see the principal feature of the moving armies, the Emperor of Abbie-annia on his horse accompanied by his highest generals and his bodyguard.The ''attlesnake boy swayed forward with the rest to look as the columns of generals passed.''e soon come.'' as Emperor ivian .He was indeed a handsome saintly looking man about thirty three yearsof age.He was smoothly shaven but wore a large heavy mustache was in a most splendid purpo urle uniform decorated with jeweled orders and with a cascade of plumes of emerald, green, and ye red yellow and blue nodding in his wide rounded military hat.

As he and his generals gravely rode by he gravely saluted the waiting soldiers on either sideAdvancing on horseback before and beh behind him if you pleanet o mention''attention'' were the ,ivian irls equally as handsomely dressed or uniformed and decorated and emerald plumed also but wearing their ordinary girls clothing.

'gree Penrods arm touchedthe Rattlesnake boys almost at the same time that his own touched Penrods.Undgr the nodding plumes, each saw that the were the seven Abbiannian ,ivian irl prinxesses, that is ,iolet n and her sisters.

''Are those really the ,ivian Girls who are riding along with the Emp emperor''Penrod asked the soldier who stood nearest nearest to him in the ranks.-he soldier answeregreadily enough.

-''Yes indeed they are, they are''he said.

,nd indeed they were the seven ,ivian ,irl princesses of ,bbie-annia, seven little girls who were the greatest heri heroines heroines of all times as well as saintly in character.hey were the greatest fa favorites of the whole nation, and were also great personages, and who during the battle of' Ophelia ,un or something like that had found strange pictures and other things in an abandoned barn.they believed the pictures belonged to some half witted man who cares more for them than anything else than even the services of his own country.''he went on shrugging his shoulders and speaking to one of his companions who had begun to listen.''But I'll tell you those little girls are shrewd, they appear to amuse themselves with many incidents which they profess does not concern them in the least.They somet sometimes look very grave and interested in nothing but it is said nevertheless nevertheless that they are wizards for knowin the most hidden se secrets of the foe and can outwit foes most dangerous to our cause.''

''Are they g going to view the assault upon the St Denisman ortifications and other points of works with their Father the emperor''''''''ske the sold or craning his neck to look after the Emperor and his ca calvacade of great generals.

''No I don't think so though they are often at the worse battle times.The Emperor looks very lonely and very anxious too no doubt and the only one way to make him forget his anxieties and his sorrows over his loss of a great friend king Gammon Procile the III is to have them with him as often as possible.''It has to been told me that when the little Princesses go out on a scouting tour they dress and disguise themselves roughly like the common boy scouts of the rebels and go into the clandelin's camps to see what the rebel generals are up to.''

''I dare say it is true.' would like to or myself come in a while just for the adventure but as I have had n experience I am not permitted to go so.''.'''''''' the two Angelinian boy scouts followed the procession until Intill the waiting soldiers recieved their own orders to advance. he boys then went on ahead until they were near enough to see the emperor and his generals and to get a f view of the far distant fortifications.They saw the beautiful little ,ivian irl princesses several times but they were always so enclosed that it it was not possible to get within a few yards of them.

Once however it happened that one of the litt le girls lookedthrough a temporary ; brea break in the crowd of mounted generals and saw a dark strong featured and remarkably intent boys face whose vivid scrunting of her courht her eye immed- iately.And there was something in the fixedness of its attention which caused the vivid girl l to look at it curiously for a few seconds and then unwisely moved Penrod met her gaze fair and squarely.

''Please look at me, pleaselo k at me.''the lo scout was saying to her centally.''I have a most important message for you and your sisters.An import- ant one indeed which you won't want to miss.'''

She lovel''ful eyes in the still faint flicker face rested on him with a certain growing light of interest, curiousity and then recognition, but the crowding officers moved closer, and therefore the temporarytrunk closer up so that the lo boy and the little Princess could see eachother no more.Penrod and the Rattlesnake boy worked themselves to the outskirts of the wave of advancing christian soldiers at once.

''Let us go to the neighborhood of the St Denisman fortifications.''said Penrod.''They will be there and we shall be able to see them again even if we can't get near them.''

Toward the St Denisman fortifications the top most made it their way through the less crowded country streets and there they waited as near to the head- quarters f yiolet and her sisters as they could get.hey were there even when the last of the advancing troops passed by but though they saw the vivian Girls girls again they were at some distance from them, and the little girls did not see the two boys.

Then followed two most singular days.They were indeed very singular days because for the m they were full of tantalizing incidents.nothing seemed easier than to hear talk of the seven sisters favorite doubters, but nothing was more impossible than to get near to them.They stood rather more than favor- ites with the Angel nian soldiers, and the common olsolier soldiers and the highest officers were given to tal- free y of them of where they went so often and what they were doing; no matter how cold and stormy the weather would be. After their scouting adventures they would sure le to their own headquarters, or their fathers, or in some big tent.There was no it difficulty in discovering that they wouldsure be sure to go out on a similar expedition, or go within the foe lines, or to attend some council, or give advice to generals and officers of other rank or to follow the plans of the m ders their fathers.

Penrod and the Rattlesnake bo heard some comon speech of them again and again and from one part of the city to the other they followed and waited for them. But it might as well have been that the to boys were chasing after the great will-o-the-w sp.s.

-hey were aside fr the brilliant and important persons to be allowed to move about alone.There were always two escorts who were to follow close on every one of their expeditions.Penrod thought that they cared very much for their com- panions and they usually seemed to be interested in what the little girls were saying.It was small wonder that on occasions the ,ivian girls were laughing a d deal, and the rose and pearl seemed to ever smile.

''Their companions are ''one kind of chaps with the trick of saying witty things as if they did not see the joke in them themselves.''the rattlesnake boy sure ed up them up'' chaps like those are always clever than the other kids.''

''An' the vivian girls are too much in favor and to out on too many danger- ous adventures not to have a powerful escort follow them out.''they heard an Angelinian soldier say to his companion ''little one at time of it.Then they were alone they give out the news that they are going within the enemys lines to spy, and at other times they remain in their rooms in the palaces they found at Ophelia run in their own headquarters and also examining the manuscripts they also found there the strange musical instruments.''

''What was left the Battles nake for some into hear to test together very pale and then violets.....He had been at a the time of his sorrow- four of his own and recovered after a long and serious ill- ness, but during the winter girls three children and [illegible] and [illegible] the [illegible] and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

They saw silent for a few moment's because there seemed nothing to say.

"We are too tired and hungry to be able to think well."Penrod said at last. "Let us go and eat our supper and then go to sleep.Until we have rested ourselves properly we will not be able to think out our plans.And until we have had a rest we must let go!"

"Yes there is no need in keeping on talking when you are all tried out."the Rattlesnake boy murmured in a softer lower tone of voice."When we allow ourselves to get too excited we don't reason straight.We must let go!"

Their meal was simple but they ate well and without speaking.Even when they had finished and undressed for the night they said nothing at all.

"I wonder where do our thoughts go when we are asleep!"the Rattlesnake boy inquired in a casual tone after he had stretched himself out under the think blankets."They must surely go somewhere.Let's send them out to find out what to do next."

"It is not an still as it used to be.You can hear many distant cannon roaring and thundering."said Penrod lowering from his cot in the far corner of his hut or tent."We must make a name for ourselves."

Indeed sleep made it for them--deep restful-- then!" Pal sleep.If they had been more resentful of their ill luck and lost later it would have come less easily, and have been less natural.In their conversations about strategy "Since they had learned that one great secret of strategy and safe guile -the secret is to know how & let go to sense "inking over an anxiety a "ll" the right moment a pass.It was their habit to "let go" for long sometimes, and wonder about looking at the rebel works, fortifications, the movement of rebel armies, and so on go on, giving themselves up with boyish pleasure and eagerness to all they had to see.

Penrod was too intimate with the "inseparable" reading and the Rattlesnake boy too curious and feverishly wide awake to allow of their minds much. The Rattlesnake boy knew one of the world had already come until it seemed to know no boundaries of left until all it want wonderful of magnificent wonders.

He wanted to go on and on but was overwhelmed. When Penrod opened his eyes in the morning, he found the Rattlesnake boy looking at him. Then they both sat up in their cots of the same time.

"I believe if I am not mistaken we are both thinking of the very same thing."said Penrod, and both of the boys found they were thinking of the same things.

"So do I!"answered the Rattlesnake boy."I guess it's that we were lost we all not think of it at all last night."

"Yes we are still in the enemy's line." Penrod said."We have both read somewhere that we heard about them go at night alone carefully the child pictures and other things they had found in that town during the battle of Ophela guns."

"I bet they're in their own headquarters now."The Rattlesnake boy answered.

"Do you feel certain sure of that too?"Penrod replied to make sure and feel sure of it the very first place."

"Yes indeed."answered the Rattlesnake boy." Are sure of them, and I am sure of it the safest."

"So did I!"said Penrod."That's what we ought to do to get back to us."

"You are right."declared Penrod!"When we let go and sent them off last night."

The Rattlesnake boy sat up hugging his knees and looking straight before him for some time after this and Penrod did not interrupt his meditations meditations or anything else if you please to make it a sentence.The day was brilliant and sunny but still fearfully cold, and a stiff northwesterly gale was blowing. The sun shone slightly through a small air hole in the wall of their tent as they prepared and ate their breakfast.After they finished they stood by the tents door, and talked about the headquarters of violet and her sisters."hey talked about it because it was so strictly guarded, and the boys had been within sight of it more than once already."he building which was a large one stood within view of the St Dunleavy fortifications.On account of the danger of encountering clandestine spies in Angelina uniform & the Vivian Girls were very careful to not to allow anyone but only one sunrise out the ten true friends they knew to saunter into the very grounds of their headquarters.

"Now we are tears for the first time I noticed."said to me."Penrod said."There is a large stone balcony which protrudes out from the south side of the building which looks on the St Dunleavy fortifications."Near it there is a row of large evergreen trees, and I saw there was a sort of hollow place inside of it.If some one wanted to take the chances of facing the fierce cold to remain under the trees all night to watch the windows when they were lighted and see if any one came out upon the balcony alone he could hide himself in the hollow place and stay there untill the morning providing he does not freeze to death."

"Is there room for two inside the shrub!"asked the Rattlesnake boy.

"No it is safer that I go alone."said Penrod.

late that afternoon there could have been seen wandering about the snow covered grounds of the headquarters of the Vivian Girls two un-conspicuous rather poorly uniformed boy scouts."hey were noticing the building, the snow embroidered shrubs and the high snow drifts close by as curious soldiers did and they kept talking about and talked as soldiers and people were used to seeing boyscouts talk and convene together.Early in the morning it had seemed to turn out to be a beautiful sunny day , but it was exceptionally cold and there were few soldiers about, the only ones being the sentinels.And these very essentials gave very slight notice to the two boys, and though they observed that two boys came into the yards, they did not observe that only one went out.In fact the sentinels did not remember when they saw the Rattlesnake boy swing by that he had entered in company with dark haired boy scout who walked so handsomely.

It happened however that when the Rattlesnake boy had passed out, that one of the sentinels had been very much interested in the aspects of the northwestern skies which was becoming curiously threatening.

There had been occasionally heavy snow clouds hanging about all the afternoon, now and then plotting out the sunshine altogether but not very often. Toward four o-clock however the snow clouds had piled themselves up in ominous ash gray rolling mountainswith a heavy sepherul sky appearance for a background.And the sun setting very early as it does in the winter times was already hidden behind them.

"It's another howling blizzard storm approaching."Penrod had said to his companion."There is to be another heavy fall of snow, and high wind to night".

And that was what the Rattlesnake boy found out while he and Penrod were strolling through the deep snow within view of the balcony and the big evergreen trees which they knew had the hollow empty space in the middle, though its circumference was very, very, very, very Exposing.

"If there should be another big snowstorm with great wind the evergreen trees will not protect you much, though it may save you from the worse of it." The Rattlesnake boy said."I wish there was room for me also."

The Rattlesnake boy would have wished there was room for two if he had see seen Penrod scrubbing to face the firing squad.As the time came for the sentinels to be relieved the boys started walking round once more as if they were on their way out.By the time they had sauntered toward the big evergreen trees only a few sentries were in theyards, and the rest of the soldiers were moving toward their tents in the distance.

When they drew near one side of the evergreen the two boy scouts were together.Then the Rattlesnake boy swung out on the other side of it & he was alone.No one had taken notice that anything had happened, no one ever thought of looking back.So the Rattlesnake boy made his way through the snow and passed out into the Company Street.And the new sentinels looked at the sky, and one of them made the remark about the snowstorm coming.

As the darkness came on the hollow in the ground between the two of the evergreen trees seemed very safe in a indeed, and to Penrods relief also it had grown exceedingly much warmer during the day and it was only up to eighteen above zero a great rise indeed from fourty five below.And it was not likely in the least that any more soldiers would enter the enclosed grounds, and if by rare chance si some special sentinel passed through he would not be in search of any one any newho wished to watch all night in the middle between two evergreen trees instead of going to bed and to sleep....

CHAPTER TWENTY NINE.

ANOTHER BEAUTIFUL BLIZZARD, AND PENROD'S STRANGE VISAGE TO VIOLET AND HER SISTERS.....

tHE THE SMALL HOLLOW was thickly enclosed with winter greenery, and if it was not still cold Penrod could easily have found room to sit down when he was tired of standing long.Penrod knew he had to stand for a very, very long time and for two reasons;;;;;;

FIR.Because it was so cold.

''Second.Because by do n doing so he could plainly see the windows opening on the balcony if he gently pushed aside some flexible young boughs.

And he had managed to discover in his first visit to these yards that the windows overlooking the enemy's towers these which belonged to the rooms occupied by the „vivian girl Princesses.Those which opened onto the balcony lighted their favorite apartments which now contained the strange locks, and pictures of children they had found.Penrod watched these windows impatiently and anxiously.

If the vivian girl Princesses had not gone out on a nightly scouting tour, if they were really in a short nightly retreat, and relieving themselves off duty from their desperate work--they would even now be in their favorite rooms, and lights would be seen.And if there were any lights the boyscout might pass before a window because since he was enclosed among the two evergreen trees he need not fear being observed by any one.

The darkness deepened with the passing of twilight, and because of the heavy snowclouds it had become extremely dense.Faint gleams of some sort showed themselves in the lower part of the house, but no lights appeared in any of the snowwindows. that Penrod kept his eyes on.He waited for a long time,so long indeed th that he began tobelieve that none of the windows would be lighted at all .

At last he letgo of the young boughs and after standing for a few minutesin deep thought began to pace up and down nd st mp starphis feet vigoriously to keep himself from getting cold.He felt sure now that the „vivian girls were not in the house, they probably were not within the christian lines, and the rumor of their making a scouting tour i to some part of the enemy lines near the Wt Damimann „ortifications had no doubt been true and true.

And he felt sure he had lost very much time in making this mistake--- but nevertht nevertheless it had been best for him tohave made the venture.If he had not made it he would probably have lost a chance.There were also too many guards around in the yards for the boy to go out now without being mistaken for a skulking rebel boy scout seeking to spy on the „vivian girls, and there fore there was no getting out of the yards until the approach of the new day.

He therefore was determined to remain in his place of concealment untill the time came when troops of soldiers approach to and for an escort of the „vivian girls. phen it would be possible for him to stroll out without attracting too much attention upon himself.But nevertheless he had the whole night to spend before him in the intense cold as best he could.As long as he could withstand the moderate cold temperature untill morning it would not matter at all.But there was no chance to lie down and go to sleep.If he did he would probably freeze to death.He felt too cold to go to sleep even if he stayed awake untill past midnight so lost long past that there would not be one chance in a ho thousand hat that anything could happen.

put the heavy clouds that made the night so dark were thickening more heavily while in the far distance low growlings or rumblings of cannons were now heard. At intervals a threatening gleam of light undulating like fiery snakes along the distant horizon could be seen.even the storm was now beginning, for the wind was rising and roaring through the trees in the yards.

while happened several times and then Penrod felt some ions of the presence of flying snow flakes.They were big flakes but few at first.Again Penrod looked toward the windows.As he looked there was a sudden dart of bluish red light in the sku and a tremendour ear splitting crash.He heard at that instant the sound of falling objects. and some of the tinest trees in the yard came down with a loud noise.A shrapnell shell had exploded . the air. Half hour more passed, and the snowstorm began to grow so fierce that the clouds appeared to turn themselves open and pour down the snow in a thick torrents tal sheet.

Soon the night became extremely wild.The elements and nature appe red to be ch a rampage t nyled with the distant and near roar of cannons, everything seemed to happen at once as if a herd of lions and cleanors had at one moment been let loose, flame a ter flame from exploding shells, roar and crash and sharp reports of thundering explosions, shrieks of hurricane wind blinding torrents of snow as if some mighty snow avalanch of the skies had gathered and rushed and burstted upon the earth.It was such a snowstorm as few people ever see in their life time and which seldom ever occurs at all even in Siberiain..the wind threat ned to grow to a perfect cyclone of the tropics.And Penrod still stood quietl, in the midst of the rage, and flooding blinding uproar of both ele elements and the desultory d artillery duel.

After the first few minutes had passed he knew he could not do anything to sheild himself..own in the direction of the distent christian batteries, he heard the sound of two great explosions.Whehh his cap pressed against his eyes because so many shells were exploding that their flashes were blinding.Their crashes, the reports of hundreds of distant cannons, and the thundering of great explosions, and the iresssant flashes of light came so close to one another, that he seemed deafned deafened as well as almost blinded.

And he wondered if he would ever be able to hear other sounds again when it was over.That he was thickly covered with snow, and that the hollow was being rapidly filled up was so small a detail that he was scarcely aware of it.He stood still bracing his body and waiting as patiently as possible.He he had been an Abissinn ian soldier instead of a boy scout, and was in the trenches, and such a storm had broken upon him and his comrades they could only have braced themselves and waited.

This was what he found himself thinking when the tumult of exploding shells and the uproar of the artillery cannons were at their worst.Then There had been segments of men who had either to the limit of endurance, and shot and shell. About half an hour after this, thought had come to him what there had occured the first temporary lull in the artillery duel.The fury of the artillery storm had probably reached its height and broke atthat moment.It appeared at that instant that a flash of yellow flame had torn its way along the distant horizon and an earth rending crash had thundered itself into rumblings which actually died away before trembling forth a din into a thousand million echoes.

Penrod took his cap from his eyes and drew a long, low deep breath.

He drew two long deep breaths.It was as he began drawing a third, and realizing the strange feeling of the almost stillness about him, he suddenly heard a new kind of sound at the side of the yard nearest his hiding place by the trees. It sounded like the creak of a door openin somewhere in the northwall of the building by a high laurel hedge.It was evident that someone was coming into the yard by some private entrance.He pushed aside the young boughs again and tried to see but the darkness was too intense thickened too much by the shroud of falling and wind driven snow.Yet he could hear if the exploding thunder of crashin, shells would not come out again.there was no sound however of any one walking, but yet he had the feeling that there was more than one person coming toward where he stood, but did not seem to be afraid of being heard or seen, merely as if they were at liberty to come in by that entrance theyh chose.Penrod kept very still.An a sudden hope struck him to felt a shout of joy.

If the „vivian girls chose to return early from a nightly scouting tour they might chose a go in and out by a private entrance..the footsteps now heard crunching lightly in the snow drew near, crishing the snow underfoot passed by and seemed to pause so near where near the balcony, and then flashes lit up the sky again, and the thunder of exploding shells burst forth h once more.But this was the great last peal for the night.The artillery duel was now accpelled to go stop soon account of the heavy snow st rm and therefore for that night at la least, the artillery duel was at an end.Only fainter and fainter rumbling booms and paler and paler flashes followed.Even these were soon over and everything became silent.but the darkness was still deep.Despite the thickness of the falling snow shroud, the darkness was deep to be blackness in the hollow between thetwo evergreen trees.

Penrod stood in it covered with snow but feeling nothing because he was thinking deeply.He slowly shed the evergreen boughs aside and kept look ing toward the place in the deep blackness where the windows must be though more on account of the snow shroud than the darkness. It was not long, but he seemed indeed to him as if the waiting must be long, but he knew it really only appeared to appear to be.He felt long because he was impatiently waiting for something.Suddenly he was able to see just where the windows were---because they became lighted.This gave him a feeling of great relief but it did not last very long.It was true that something had been gained in the true certainjity that the vivian girls had at last the christian lines at all this time.But what no next.? It would not be so easy to follow them if they always made their choise to go out secretly at night.

what next I'm spend the rest of the night in a storm like this, watching lighted windows was not enough.And probably the next night they would not be lighted. but more'helean Penrod continued to keep his gaze fixed upon them.He even tried t o fix all his thoughts and will power on the vivian girls inside the room.Perhaps he could reach them, and make them listen even though they would not know that any one was speaking to them. Penrod knew that i was said that thoughts were strong things.And he knew that if angry thoughts in one persons mind will create anger in the mind of another, why should not communion of the mind cross the line too?

"I must converse with you.I want to speak to you."he found he self crying in a low intense voice."I am outside here in the storm waiting.I intend I must speak to you vivian girl Princesse's."

Indeed he said it many times and kep his eyes fixed upon a single s all window that opened onto the balcony.Once he saw a little girls figure cross there m in a nightie but he could not be sure who it was.The last distant common r ublings had died away by now but the fury of the storm was increasing tremendously.

It was not long before another window was lighted and a brilliant glare showed itself suddenly flooding over t hup with light and revealing the thickness of the falling snow flakes to be of great size.They were big ones too."Parts of the w indow were yellow white, and the tree shadows were like gray shrouds.A bright lamp of light glared over the yellow of Penrods evergreen and struck across his face.Penrod felt tempted at this moment to throw a snow ball at the window to call them, but perhaps it was at this moment that a sudden increase of the storm attracted the attention of one of those inside the balcon e balconied room.

A little girls figure appeared at one of the long windows.Penrod saw now that it was one of the Abbinnanina Princess.She was a girl dressed, and suddenly she opened the small window and stepped out on to the narrow covered balcon balcony.

"The storm if is as fierce as ever now."she said " some one will be cold she st ol with her beautiful a face lifted looking at the great shroud of big and small falling snowflakes.She stood for several minutes as still as a statue and it was evident that she seemed to forget everything but the nature of the bliz and storm.Indeed as fierce as it was it appeared to be a wonderful storm and she liked it.But all of a sudden some sound attracted her attention, and brought her back to earth.She heard the a low but strong and clear voice and it was a boyish voice coming to her from the yellow near the balcony.

"No it is now the ev ery gratifications of St Patrons if some's a batt batt e there.There is never danger there, how my know your sweetness."said the voice and there the words ser del almost if some unseen instrument prayer.she seemed to call demurately to her, to command her, to draw her.

"That sounds to me like a boys voice, a boy I believe I know" she said in a low tone(("but I cannot see who is speaking."

She to then stood still for a few minutes in total silence.Then she knt over the balustrade.The glare had not broken the darkness below.

"You if has boys voice speaking." it answered in a way that somehow somehow moved her because it was so evidently in the landscape of your general Greatheart."you were lucky yourselves in coming to the place you plan."

"Wait a minute and I'll come down to the storm as it is it."said the little Princess.

In a few mute minutes Penrod heard a door open quickly not far from the place where he stood.He saw one of the vivian girls a girl one following so many days appeared suddenly like a fairy spirit at his side.He again had that strange shy feeling but he overcame it manfully as she asked;

"Are you there?Have you come as you said you would?"

"Before the first sentries were followed I it self in the hollow of the two big evergreen trees and answered."Penrod answered.

"Then you took your chances out here in the storm even with the danger of being discovered and detained if you did to stroll to where my and and my sisters. Self

"For this reason."

The litt le Princess stepped a little closer to the low shrubbery.I cannot see you--for it is not safe to stand in the open.Are you not cold?"

"I was not able to [illegible] answered."A e was not in the least."

There was a few minutes silence.Penrod was glad the little companion was curious to know something of his motive.

"So -o-o"she said slowly at length."We are in a very dangerous if we proceed with our plans.And you are sure to lose the meaning of warning?"

Something in her voice made Penrod feel that she was smiling.

"Light a brave plan is rare [illegible] you are..have been rarer once you realize some."

[illegible] "I think over the situation again.

"I want to go [illegible] "Here is [illegible] a gift [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

At first Penrod, whose full attention was absorbed by the others did not hear what she was saying.But after the little girls became calm, he stood quite still waiting while they watched him proudly and lovingly.The great soldier lifted his head, and placing an arm around the little girl listened.It seemed as though almost at once he was singularly interested.The lowered voice was slightly raised at last and Penrod heard the last two sentences;

"The adopted son of general Woldonia Greatheart.Look at him poor."

The great man in the chair turned quickly, and looked steadily and with questioning curiousity and admiration touched with grave surprise.He had keen and clear blue eyes.When Penrod still erect and silent , waited again.The beautiful little Princess had merely said to him",one one else beside my sisters in the room whom it might interest to see you."Penrod had intended that that whatsoever happened he would must make no outward sign of seeing more than he had been told he had or would see--some one else beside the beautiful vivian Iris.It was for him to so not the slightest sto astonishment or recognition.He felt he had been brought here not to see, but to be seen.The power of remaining still under security which the Rattlesnake boy had often envied envied him stood him in goodstead at this moment because he had seen this great chieftain not many days since surrounded by brilliant plumes of red yellow blue and emerald green hues, hungs hung with jeweled decorations, on his royal horse escorted by troops, or general I mean a troop of hussars and black helmets and whole armies of following soldiers whose tramping feet kept time to loud bursts of military music, while the lined up soldiers waited and cheered.

"He is justlike his step father"this great Emperor said to his daughters."but it surprises me that general Greatheart took the risk to send his on those perilous adventures.His looks pleases me intensely."Then suddenly t to Penrod"I were waiting outside all that while while that storm of blizzard and cannon fire was going on!"

"Yes sir."Penrod answered.When the two exchanged some words still in the lowered voice.

"You read the Angelinian news very often!"he was asked."You know how the situation stands at vivian Wickey."

"Stands too well to be retaken." answered Penrod.

"How does Abbiennain stand!"was the next question.

"I'm posit ively she does not stand."These two sections Abbiennain and Glandelinia fight as lizards are known to fight until each have already torn the other into fragments--and neither has blood or strength left.--Glandelinia now since it is captured by the wicked glandelinians is considered the mightest Gibraltar. in the world."

"And unless it is retaken the glandelinians will win the war without doubt" said violet.

The general or Emperor and the boy glanced at each other.

"A good simile indeed"said the older man."You are right."In a narrow gray powerful enough and a greater power from Abbie-nain, and a still stronger force from glandelinia did not see the chance to make any interference, and vivian wickey fell, both sides might see later on."

The Emperor looked at the boy a few moments longer and then waved his hand kindly.

"You are a fine brave boy even if you are from Canada"he said."I am glad you came over here to join us.You may go my boy.Good night, and God bless you."

Penrod made a very respectful bow, and violet who had escorted him led him out of the room.It was not before she left him in the small pret chamber in which he was to sleep that the beautiful Princess gave him a final curious but loving glance.

"I remember now"she said."In the room when you answered my fathers question, about Abbie-nain and glandelinia.I was sure that I had my sisters had seen you five days ago.It was the day of the advance of the army.There was a break in the crowd of officers and we saw a boy looking intently at us.And it was you."

"Yes "said Penrod."I have followed you and your sisters each time you had gone out on a scouting tour then, since then, but I never had the opportunity to get near enough to speak.A night second only one chance in a million."

"You are doing your work more like a professional spy than a boyscout."

was the next speech, but it was said reflectively."I was could have behaved more respectively and more perfectly than you did that you, that discretion and composure were necessary."To me after a moments pause;"I am very deeply interested and deeply pleased.Good night, and God bless you..."""""

When the next morning came the guards on a duty were relieved by the officer of the day.

ld under an escort selected by chief the vivian Iris. Penrod passed out from the yards.He was obliged to tell himself two or three times that he had not awaken ashamed from an amazing dream.After he had crossed a company street after passing around a high snow drift, the storm still raging he increased his pace as quickly as he could through the deep snow because he wanted to reach his own set of the camp, and talk to his companion the Rattlesnake boy.There was a narrow side company street which it was necessary for him to pass to through if he had the desire to make a short cut.As he turned into it he saw a man.and to see through the dense snow mark a curious snow covered figure, leaning against the wall of a wooden barracks.It looked cold and forlorn, and he wonder! if it could be an escaped child slave.As he drew nearer he discovered it was not.It was the Rattlesnake boy who suddenly saw who was approaching, and came forward.His face was very pale, and hag ard, and he looked, cold sore and frightened. As he drew off his snow covered cap, and spoke in a voice which was so hoarse it is scarcely "Good be thanked"he said as people always said it when they exclaimed a special favor from Heaven.but there was a serious tone of anxiety in his voice as well as relief.

"Side-de-camp. ""Penrod cried---the Rattlesnake boy had begged him to call him so."What in the world have you been doing?How have you been out here?"

"Ever since I left you last night."said the Rattlesnake boy shute bar at his arm with a tre chilling hard as if to make sure he was real."If there was not room for two in the hollow there surely was room for one in the Company Street.Was it my place to go off duty and leave you alone---was it!"fiercely.

"You were out in the fierce blizzard storm all night, and did not get frozen!!!!"

"Were'nt you."still fiercely."I huddled against the wall of this barracks as well as I could.,and what did I care? Storm or cold weather don't prevent a fe ow from waiting for a comrade.I wouldn't have left you if you have lyen on rders, and that we'll have long waiting."When you did not come out as soon as the sentinels had been exchanged I felt as if something had set my heart on fire. You couldn't know what you going to happen.' Are not the nerve and backbone you have' always so half mad while being anxious."

for a second or so Penrod did not answer.But when he put his hand on the snow covered sleeve the Rattlesnake boy a sensation started because it seemed as though he were looking into the eyes of his guarding angel itself.

"You almost to I like the tones of my guarding angel"he exclaimed in spite of himself."and how full and courageous as yes."

"When you are near me"Penrod said in a low voice---"then you are near ---- I feel---I feel--- I feel as if I were I royal Prince attended by an army."You are my army."And he pulled off his ea with pick boyishness and added with fervor-j-"God be ch nked."

The camp stove and made their tent a the cure, and their breakfast was ready for them, when they reached it, and the two ate heartily as Penrod told his story. It took a long time to relate it all, and when he ended he took an envelope from his side pocket and shook it in the Rattlesnake boy.It contained a flat package of money, in dollar ban bills.

"The pret test of the vivian Iris was to me before she opened the private door"Penrod explained."and she said to me"after my report to general Winderbim and give his our command, we have t general Greatheart as quickly as you can,---or pickl as you can.We will be there to meet you.!!!!!!!

"I wonder what she can be meant---what she meant!!!!"the Rattlesnake boy said slowly."A thin idea of a tremendous thought entered into my mind but it was not a thought he could grasp of to a word.

"I cannot tell.I have not it was for some reason that she did not explain to me."said Penrod.""I will do as she told me.As prickl as we can."

They looked over the crudus paper as the stove stove id away and. All that could be gathered from most of them was that before the fright ful carnage at Gralin on the or ender armies and will have reached the outskirts of horrible disaster and exhaustion. At first battle, which was the never left to take any final step which could end itself a victory. It was broken Gin to any should it had been so."The christian Iron to kill wounded and ple were on the rivers reported and over three million in which six hundred thousand were killed and wounded.In killed and wounded the men suffered over sixteen million six hundred thousand, and 10,000,000 in the more desperate trouble."never in our army to any war had many got through or in a more desperate situation as the glandelinian army under general Gaulo . . . . . disaster too terrible to comprehend for the mind and their terrible losses a great contrast indeed to that of the christian side.

"It will soon be the time for our armie armies to strike a blow against the St Dominean fortifications."said the Rattlesnake boy clowering over the maps. "If our armies would disembodiedly now, they could take the fortresswithout a blow.It can sweep over the fields and take all the works.The garrisons here are weakened in numbers, by the recent battle, by the storms and intense cold, they are half starved from want of provisions which cannot reach them on account of the deep snow, they are bleeding and starving to death, they won't resist long.If our armies concentrated here do not rise soon, and move to the attack it will give time for rebel re inforcements and provisions to arrive, and then our opportunity will be lost.And then it will serve us right."

"Let us spend the rest of the day in studying the maps."Said Penrod."To night we must be on the way to reserve Kinderbines headquarters and divisions on the right."

The next day though still stormy was not so very cold as expected.And that day that two tired and travel worn boy scouts should drag themselves with slow and weary feet in the deep snow across the christian camps between Kinderbines divisions and Emperor vivians without any suspicion or attracting attention among Glandelinian scouting parties was an usual unusual incident indeed.

This terrible seige of Vivian Vickey did not at all seem to leave the beleaguered glandelinian armies in hunger, and want or anguish, or leave that section of the territory stunned and broken."For some unknown source which was a most tremendous mystery to the Easter basiaars, that despite their most tenacious and desperate efforts the Glandelinians were continually recieving treasonous amounts of provisions, ammunition and reinforcements."This was soon to be known as the "Great Arenburg Mystery."""""Each day the worse was happening, and thewar was growing worse, no foreign nation appeared to be curious as what would befall the insurgent countries next.If the Angelinian states had become a foe or took sides against Abbiennia in the rebellion, and had sent into Calverinia hordes of rebels instead of Federal Troops, the result would be so serious that the story would have to end right here.

Angelinians is so powerful that no country outside of Abbiennia would dare think of resisting her.But so far Angelinia though suffering more in money losses and other causes from the rebels than Calverinia as yet had remained on the side of Abbiennia, and was doing the most to crush the Angelinian rebellion and crushed Glandelinians two attempted invasions in the north and south.The two boyscouts had evidently traveld far on foot.

Their snow whitened uniforms were slightly torn and stained by continual travel and once in a while they had stopped to get something to drink at the first canteen across the first lines.

Penrod had taken with him some course food in his knapsack, and when hungry the two boys would eat while walking.When they took momentary shelter in one of the barracks the soldiers would stare at them without any curiousity.

They may have vaguely wondered why such young boyscouts would take such risks these days.But they did not care to ask or know their reason.Their general had gone on a scouting tour and he was still out, so he has returned yet.

And many of these soldiers who were now in the barracks, had left wives, mothers, children and other relatives behind.Their own homes had been destroyed and their friends relatives and families either slaughtered or exiled by the cruel rebels.Even at many points the enemy had swept through the entire little cluster of towns and villages which belonged to the Federals.They were mad with rage over this that they met heavy losses in a battle or were defeated, and therefore when they swooped down upon a town they burned and killed most ruthlessly, and committed havoc that exceeded all description whatever.

Many worlds of the Angelinian soldiers never again ever saw either the burnt walls of his house, or the bodies of his wife and children, because they had themselves been killed in the severe battles that raged.Only the monsterous divisions of soldiers that Penrod still saw remained.

When the boys were entering the outer knits of Kinderbines vast encampments and works it was not difficult to keep out of sight of hidden Glandelinian snippers if necessary.The earthworks were high frontal by mountainous snow forts and batt lements and there were deep trenches by the way, trenches so far reaching and so cleverly hidden by such thick undergrowth that should the enemy make a desperate assault, and fall into this snare none would ever go back to their comrades to tell the tale.It was because of this perhaps but now, that the rebels had not use other indentions comforts."There was a great opportunity for an hero so redoubtable foe an attacking foe.

As the two boys went on they heard of burned villages and towns destroyed as the result of the mad squabble at Ophelia but these were villages and towns far from this stream.And it was true as Penrod had said to the great Abbiennian Emperor that general Robert vivinus Federal, and general Vivian Gallaster rebellious Southern armies had fought for a full day with the savage mass of two countenance hordes of hyenas until at last the enraged forces of each side lay torn and bleeding, with the christians crushingly victorious and the enemys strength, resources and supplies exhausted and many taken prisoners.

rebel army though it held its ground until it had a fair chance to make safe retreat was more weak and in a more desperate situation than the christ- ian Army.The whole world looked on the seige of Vivian Vickey with great inter- est but also with the great desire that the Christians should win and end this disorde rder which was interfering with the most important commerce of all the christ- ian nations.All this and much more Penrod and his companion knew but as they made their way as swiftly as possible through a vast fortified area encamp.They learned other things about his secure position and the reports of its massiveness and length were not more romantic. A tremendous snow made fortifications intermingled with rocks, iarn of iron, and land logs, the immense fields of tents stretched over the plains, and earth- works mounted with artillery, which could sweep many thousands of rebels by the thousand, the splendor of the vast encampments edged by excellency forr fo roots and the broad clear roadbed. A ribbon silver in the distance had a primeval majes majesty such as the floods of the Infernal Region Regions could not prevail again.

As the two boys traveled through this vast encampments, when it was possible to leave the roads.It was more safe to thread a way among huge tents and tall trees and young saplings without being seen by rebel spies, or scouting parties.It was not always easy but it was safer.Sometimes they saw an officers headquarters or a small shelter where a solitary all day re sentinel who was sheltered from the storm and cold.Each sentinel they met wore the same look of suffering in his face but when the boys asked for rations when their's gave out, as was their habit no one among the soldiers refused to share the little they had.It soon took plain that they were thought to be two young escaped child slave slave fugitives who had run away from some Glandelinian child slaveowner, and who had been wandering about with no thought but that of finding safety among the christian lines until the worse was over.That one of the boyscouts traveled in a ragged uniform added somewhat to their apparent lack, happiness, and that he happened to be unable to speak the language of the country made him more of an object of great pity.

The Angelinians around this part did not know what language he spoke.The, believed that the poor lads might have come to the christian lines after escaping from their childishness masters or had been caught like other unfortunate children into the whirlpool of war and turned out on the world without parents.But no one asked them any questions.Even desolated as they were themselves the Angelinian soldiers were a silent and noble people who were too courteous for any kind of curiousity.All of the Angelinians men women or children no matter who you would find them were always simple and stately and exceedingly kind.All doors were always open to weary and hungry travelers.Even the meaner of the poorest house utt ered a blessing and a welcome when any stranger crossed his threshhold.

It was the custom in all parts of the Abbiennian country as the Rattlesnake boy had said to Penrod.

boy had said to Penrod.

"I have always read about this ugly Country in many books but could not h hardly believe it to be true as to be true."said Penrod."I have read all about the doors where a certain welcome was carved in at one.It was this" THE BLESS ING OF THE LORD GOD, BY DEAD FRIENDS, AND MORE WITHIN THESE WALLS."I HE sold soldiers are always admitted without question unless he wears a grey gray uniforms."

"And all the soldiers are big and strong"said the Rattlesnake boy'"And though the Glandelinians are ferocious looking they have good faces.They carry themselves as if they had been drilled to be soldiers and officers of Christ. We are even more than proud of our women and children, and the children are so good here that even Heaven is super vised."

CHAPTER THIRTY.

WITHIN THE CAMPS OF GENERAL KINDERNINES ARMY, AND THE MESSAGE THE BOYS GIVE TO HIM.

IT was not through the main parts of the camps their way led them but even along the nobest of the soldiers they saw hunger and suffering.Even the biggest of the besieging armies had all they could do to get forage on account of the hard winter and on account of so many of the Glandelinian scouting parties, but nevertheless they had secured flocks and herds and many cattle ranches and so on. Yet the faces of many of the soldiers were gaunt and gray.When those who had as yet only lost crops and homes and herds to the enemy knew that more homes and lives might be torn from them at any moment they wept real tears.Only old men and women were left to wait for any fate which which the chances of war might deal out to them.When the two boy scouts were given food from somepoor Angelinian soldier Penrod would always offer a little money in return.He did not dare to offer much for fear of exciting suspicion.He was obliged to let it be imagined that in his flight from his child slave maner he had been able to snatch at and hide some little money which might save him and his companion from starvation.Often the Angelinian soldiers would not take what he usually offered..

Indeed their journey to Kindernines encampments had been a hard one, and also a stormy and cold one.They had to make it all on foot in the snow and blizzard storm and there was at times very little food to befound.But nevertheless each of the boys knew how to live on scant fare and provisions.

They had started their traveling at midnight.They drank from their water canteens and kept themselves warm by brisk walking.Toward the approach of of noon they knew they were nearing the end of their journey..

"It's nearly over now" said Penrod after they had rested themselves in a large and warm tent." The vivian girls said;"after your message to general Kindernine, go back to general Greatheart as quickly as you can--- as quickly as you can.We will be there to meet you."Violet said to it to me twice as if something very important was going to happen."

("Perhaps it will happen more suddenly than we can ever think---especially the incident she meant."answered the Rattlesnake boy.

Suddenly he sat up on his elbow and leaned toward Penrod.

"We are even now in a part of general Kindernines main camp" he said." We two are in Kindernines army.And we are near the end of our journey."

Penrod rose on his elbows also.He was very thin as a result of hard travel in the cold and storms and scant feeding.And his thiness made his eyes look immense and as black as pits.But they were flashing with fire and were beautiful in their own appearance.

"Yes indeed" he breathed quickly."And though we do not exactly know what the end will be we have obeyed their wishes.There is only one more. His Excellency , general Richard John Kindernine."

"I have wanted to see that great soldier more than I have wanted to see any of the others."decalred the Rattlesnake boy.

"So have I" answe red Penrod."His headquarters is on the east bend of the great or Normas Run River.I wonder what he will be saying to us."

Both boys had the same reason for wanting to see him.In his early youth he had served in the army and was known in a building which known only to him treasured the originial puc pictures of the beautiful vivian girl Princesses, brought to brought to be hidden there by emperor Vivian.The feeling for them was the feeling for a saint.It had been said that the artist who had painted the pictures of the vivian girls had placed a faint halo shining above their heads.

General Kindernine who had served in the army all hialife from ten years up first as a boy scout and then a soldier, had heard the most wonderful stories about them.His own home had been burned, and when becoming a great captian gener l general he had worked hard and faithfully, and was worshipped by his army.The men would follow him everywhere and any where.Only the Secret Gemini knew that his most faithful men were those whom he led and to whom he gave examples by his own brave deeds, and his soldiers were men with strong dark faces, whose generals and officers laid plans and wrought scemes.This Penrod and his companion did not know as they talked of of their desire to see him..

"He may not choose to tell us anything."said Penrod."Then we give him the message of the Vivian Girls he may turn away and say nothing as the others did.He may have nothing whatever to say which we should hear.Silence may be the order for him too.And besides if he has any answer to give to the message he will tell us to give it to the vivian Girls personally.He is a great general and when we see him We must act very respectifully before him.He is a great friend of the Vivian Girls.."

lved for many months or since he came here, Penrod had seen before him the ighty Sebastopol of the Glandelinian rebellion.The first time the boy had ever ually had a full and close view of the outer rebel fortifications was now en he entered general Kindernines works.And it was a sight that Penrod would ot have missed for any reason.On the advanced portions of the St Damieson For ifications and even beyond the extensive mounds of earth, and the high snow forts showed where the countless Glandelinian cannon were mounted, and now and then ay puffs of smoke would rise from one of these mounds or snow forts, and a remendous volley of shells would go shrieking toward the solid fortifications f the besiegers, which now was completely enclosing the rebels, while on occasion ar and thunder of many guns told them that the Glandelinian batteries kept close atch on the movements of Kindernines divisions.The right of Kindernines ssene armies rested on the northwest bend of the Norma Run River and at this oint many christian guns were out of range of the Glandelinian batteries ut had their range nevertheless.Penrod also observed as he continued on on that preparations were being made in spite of the heavily falling snow to move re big guns forward on heavy horse drawn sleighs.

he main ones selected were those belonging to general Luckwick Baldwins artillery division and they were being moved forward to be mounted in the besieging orks above H Krahl Junction, and about a quarter of a mile from the rivers ank.Indeed as Penrod and the Rattlesnake boy observed it was something of a task to move that battery of two hundred and fifty big guns that distance through deep snow even on sleighs, a hundred horses having all they could to pull one un on a sleigh, but the officers and the men worked incessantly, and a number of the guns had already been brought to the place where it was proposed to mount them.

verywhere along the line as the boys continued on they saw the soldiers although almost exhausted were working hard in the storm, throwing up batteries ut these workers were constantly under fire, for every minute shells would be histling over their heads admonishing them that their work was observed espite the thick curtain of falling snow."Many of the soldiers weary with ight work, slept soundly in their tents or barracks or sheltered trenches in spit of sp spite of the drum drum roar of so many cannon, and the rattling of musketry that had commenced as soon as day had dawned.

ut the scene of such kind of life in these , kind of trenches was a new thing indeed to Penrod and he walked through the deep rifle pits every where cordially greeted by the Angelinian soldiers and Penrod told the soldiers thathe liked the looks of these big guns, and the soldiers boasted that as soon as the main batteries were mounted and in their position, they would be ready to square all accounts with the Glandelinians.There was one rebel battery in particular that annoyed the working soldiers exceedingly, and prevented them from working in the trenches and on the battery.Every time a volley of shells flew over their heads and exploded with shattering crashes they would exclaim; "Shoot away there you confounded devils, for this may be your last day."

Penrod found that the further on he and his comrade went, the nearer the rifle pits approached the St Damieson fortifications.

" by "exclaimed Penrod in evident surprise"I did not know you had pushed your lines so close to the enemy's works."

"Yes" said a captian who had at this moment come up."Though you know it not there's a Glandelinian rifle pit not four feet from you.Here" added the officer handing Penrod a rifle with a bayonet attached"put this old hat on and hold it up and you'll see soon see how far off they are."

Penrod did as the officer suggested.The moment he raised the hat above the rifle pits a bayonet was suddenly thrust out and when it was drawn in the hat went with it.Penrod who was so much amused at this laughed until his jaws ached, and in company with the captian continued his march among the rifle pits, the latter explanning the great operations of the seige, and the various incidents that had taken transpired since it had commenced.The immense Angelinian breastworks, snow forts, and deep rifle pits made their full extent of general Kindernines full command and were close upon those of the Glandelinians, yet on account of the severe winter weather, and the fierce storms, both sides for a while were compelled to suspend operations almost completely.

If any of the Angelinian soldiers dared to raise his head, to select a mark for his rifle he would find an Angelinian rebel almost within reach on the watch for them.No of the general work of mounting the guns went on through the night, and generally would be completed in time to allow the weary men two or three hours rest before the approach of morning.General Luckwick Baldwin had charge of all the batteries, the whole being under his personal command.Therefore this very morning as soon as the enemy's lines could be slightly discerned through the snow pall Baldwin in accordinces with his promise has made to his superior the day before had prepared to commence the work of dismounting one of the rebel batteries, which had given the soldiers who were working on batteries so much trouble.

The general himself pointed one of his own guns, and gave the order to fire his whole battery.With the exception of now and then a volley of musket shots or the occasional shriek of a tumult of shells as they went whirling into the rebel lines that night had been remarkably still and quiet, and therefore the tremendous roar of hundreds of guns that followed the orders of general Baldwin awoke a million echoes far and wide causing hundreds of thousands of soldiers to start from their tents, or barracks in alarm.Shells from other christian batteries quickly followed, and the Angelinian soldiers, as soon as they learned that Baldwins batteries had opened a general fire upon the Glandelinian works broke out in deafening cheers. They always had the great confidience in Baldwins batteries for they had often witnessed the effects of the shells from these monster guns and knew that the artillery men worked them well and understood their business.Baldwin had opened the artillery storm, and in less than half an hour the artilery fire became general and furious all alone the line.The Glandelinian battery against which the fire of Baldwins best guns were directed replied briskly, but after four rounds the Angelinian battery got the exact range, and one after another of the rebel guns were struck by high explosive shells and they disappeared from sight in a smelter of terrific eruptions of flame, earth, snow and smoke.

At this there came a loud tumult of cheers, or regular ''soldier yells'' a noise that is different from every other sound, and which cannot be uttered except by those who have served their time in the army arose the whole length of the line as the soldiers witnessed the effects of the shots, and knew that this Glandelinian batery battery would trouble them never again.In obedience to the generals order the fire of this Angelinian battery was then directed tetea tward different parts of the Glandelinian works.The guns performed all that the soldiers ever expected of them for they were well handled, and the huge shells always went straight to the mark.It was not a long distance now to general Kindernines headquarters.Yet the boys felt as if they could not sleep or rest until they had seen him.go while they talked of the noble general, and passed on through the rifle pits they ate of their scanty food, and as the shells still shrieked above they kept themselves under cover as they went on. It was a long and deep trench which the broadsides of shells did not disturb. A few Glandelinians ever approached these works that the soldiers feared no attack from them at all.Once however during his progress through his trn trenches one of the soldiers stopped at his work and after looking at Penrod for a few minutes began to speak to himself.He only did it from curiosity, and because he wondered who the handsome boy scout was, but he had no time to continue it and started working again at once after which he looked at the boy again and then moved off to attend to something else.

A very large and handsome green uniformed sleigh horse stood by a sleigh near by and looked at the boys .Two or three times a soldier soldier also looked as if he recognized Penrod, but said nothing. The air had now grown colder again but was still full of flying snow flakes.When Penrod turned a bend in the trench he thought the most delicous thing on earth was to view the white wilderness from a hillside home at evening, and hear sleigh bells ringing.

It seemed to tell him the true fact that he was in general Kindernines army---that he had an important message for the general, and his journey was nearly ended.The Rattlesnake boy felt the same he did.At last Penrod said;

''I see his headquarters in the distance.We are nearing the end of our journey aide-de-camp.''

They both looked at each other.

''We are to deliver the message''said the Rattlesnake boy.''To morrow we shall be on our way back to general Greathearts army.After all the places we have been to---what will it look like?''

''It will be like walking out of an exciting dream.''Said Penrod''the neighborhood of Greatheart encampments is not beautiful---we will be again facing the Lucillia Jackson fortifications.But general Greatheart my father will be there.''

And it was as if a flame lighted itself in his face and shone through it, and The Rattlesnake boys face lighted in almost exactly the same way.And he pulled off his cap and stood bareheaded.

''WE have obeyed orders''he said.''We have not forgotten one thing.No one except those two professional spies have noticed us, no one has ever thought of us except those we know.WEve blown through the christian lines from p one part to another as if we had been grains of dust.''

Penrod had bared his head too and his face was still shining.

''God be thanked.''He said.''Let us reach general kindernines headquarters before night approaches.''

They pushed their way through the deep snow and wandered in and out through the convent company streets untill they found the company street that led to general Kindernines headquarters.The distant rolling plains beyond was thickly clothed withforests, and the company street the boys were in was wide and long but they knew that if they followed it they would at last come to general Kindernines headquarters.And yet it would be probable that the general or any of his staff might not be there.They might have to wait for him but if he would be on a scouting tour he would be sure to come back to form kinplans and scenes which he did some between times.The snowstorm was at its worse when at last the abrupt turn in the company street showed them the imposing form of general Kindernines headquarters.It was a large brick building and was surrounded by six fortifications mounted by cannons.It looked as if the bulding itself was a mere part of fortress.Yet to Penrods surprise it had he small round mosque-like summit roof the marks had brought into Europe in Centuries past.It was much a large building that it would hold a good sized garrison and close to it was a large large congregation of artillery which of course was reserved cannon.The two boys stopped to look at it.

''There is a light burning in one of the windows.''Said Penrod.

''There are guards near the door and some one is challenging us or to us I believe''said the Rattlesnake boy next.''It is getting toodark to see who it is. Listen.''

They listened and heard some one cry out loud;;;;;

''HALT WHO GOES THERE.''!

The boys saw a dim figure move forward, fix bayonet and stand still.Then again they heard the voice say; more gently this time however;

''Advance Lads and give the counter sign.But pass ye not untill then.''

''Come''Penrod said to the Rattlesnake boy after he gave the counter sign.And the two boys went forward.Despite the snow falling so heavily the guard had seen them coming as soon as he had heard them.He shouldered his musket and watched them coming.A lad with a bull terriers face expression, who moved as lightly and as easily as a bird--- and a lad who even four yards away was noticeable for a bearing of his body which was neighty haughty or proud, but not his somehow aloft from every other lad one had ever seen.He had the bearing of violet and her sisters the Vivian Girls.He was indeed a very magnificent lad and as he drew near a sudden glare of a camp fire showed his face was thin, and his eyes hollow as if with fatigue and hunger.

''And who is this handsome lad.''The guard was heard to murmur to himself.

''Who is he indeed!''

Penrod drew up before him and telling of hismessage was admitted into the generals headquarters and soon standing before the general both boys made a very respectful salute.

''I have a message from the Vivian Girl Princesses for you, your Excellency.''

Penrod said.''The Vivian Girl Princesses have sent me.''

The great general stood very still and gazed intently into the boys face.The next moment he suddenly bent his head so that he could look at him more closely. It did almost seem as if the great general was frightened and wanted to make sure who the boy was.

At the same it it suddenly flashed through the mind of the Rattlesnake boy that another general only some time before had looked frighened in something the same way.

''I am in too dark a room''he said.''I cannot hardly see your face.If I only had a light in this room.''And he glanced at a small dresser.It was the Rattlesnake boy who with one dash sprang through a door, seized a candle lighted it and brought it in.He had guessed what the general wanted.

He held it as self so that the flare fell on Penrods face.The general drew nearer and nearer.He gasped for breath.

''You are the adopted son of general Greatheart!''he cried.''It is Marcocian Schofield Penrod who brings the message from the Vivian girls.''

Then suddenly to the surprise of the two boys this great general fell upon his knees and hid his face in his hands.Both of the boy scouts heard him sobbing and praying, praying, and sobbing at once.Penrod and his companion glanced at each other.The Rattlesnake boy was trembling with excitement but he felt somewhat awkward also and wondered what Penrod would do.A great sword of very high rank, crying made both boys feel as if they did not know what to say.How must they comfort the general or must they let him cry crying.Penrod only stood as still as a statue and looked at the general with full understanding and great gravity.

"Yes Your Excellency" he said. "I am the adp adopted son of general Greatheart and at the request of violet and her sisters I have brought you their message. You are not to attack the rebel works near the St Dominent fortifications unless you are called upon by them. Your a divisions are the last ones to move to the assault. If you'll go t o the attack first you may meet disaster. I could weep for gladness too that I brought the message in time."

The generals t w tears and pronouncers smiled. e slowly rose to his feet--a hand handsome looking man indeed with a large mustachoe. He smiled at Penrod though his eyes were still wet with tears.

"You have passed from one camp to another in this cold weather and storm with the purpose to deliver this message." he said. "You were under strict orders not to say nothing else."

"Yes your Excelle ncy" answe red Penrod. "but I also have a message given me by them whic h is written in a code and which they say you will understand."

"That was all! You have nothing more!"

"I have nothing more. Silence has been the order I recieved since I took my oath of allegiance for Abbiesinias cause. I am considered not old enough to fight in a battle or reason t o much about the great things of the war. All I can do is to be silent and to train m self to always remember and to be ready for all duties when I 'm called. when general Greatheart saw I was ready he trusted me with many secret messages, and the Vivian girls with this. They told me to hand you this package and to give you their command. Nothing els e less."

The general as he took the offered package looked at Penrod with a wondering face and smiled.

"If the civin girls do not know best then who does" he said. "Who does"

"they always know what is best." answered Penrod in a proud manner. "always and so does the general."

The boy waved his hand k like a young emperor toward the Rattlesnake. He wanted every general he met to understand the value of the Rattlesnake boy scout.

"My ste pfather gen ral Greatheart chose for me this g od boy scout for my companion and aide-de-camp." he added. "I have not accomplished anything alone."

"He let's me call myself his aide-de-camp" burst forth the Rattlesnake boy. "I would be out into inch long stripes or strips for him. The glandelinians who know me call me the "Human viper, or Rattlesnake."

General kindernine looked at the Rattlesnake boy and then nodded his head.

"yes indeed" he said. "General Greatheart knew best. That I see as I happen to know about you too."

"How do you know I am general Greatheart s adopted son!" asked Penrod. "Have you seen in."

"We have known each othr for years." was the answer. "I have even a picture of hi in my room. It is indeed a strange thing that we are such close friends. I love him as I would my own father. There is a purpose also wh I keep the originial pictures of the vivian girls."

He led the bo s into his special cou cil chamber and made them rest and drink some hot milk and eat food. As he moved about the room there was a very mysterious and exulted look on his face.

"You m st be refreshed before we leave here." he said at last. "I'm going t take you to a portion f the camp within the fortifications where there are officers and men whosehearts will leap wild with wild joy at the sight of you. And when they see you it will give them new courage and power and a new and more determined resolve. To night they meet to hold a general Co ncil council with mound it will be over what this package contains. And I shall bring them the son of general Greatheart who brought this important message."

The boys ate the bread butter and chees and drank the hot milk he gave them but Penrod explained that they were prepared to follow him when he was ready.

The last fai t glow of twilight had died into a st rm s winter night and the snow flakes were falling their tyickest thicke st when they set out together. The general took with him his pistols and also a thick knotted staff in his hand and led the way brough through the blinding s ow. He knew well the way toward the secret meeting pla e and the way led throu h a ruined and cut steep path with no track n to mark it anywhere. Sometimes it appeared as if they were walking around the camp, somet ims the way led in, so it goes thy they dra,ed the selves over snow covered rocks or fallen trees, or stru,,led throu, almost impassable thickets, here they came they descended into narrow ravines, and almost at the risk of their lives clambered and drew the selves with the aid of the undergrowth up the other side. The Rattlesnake boy was called upon to use all his prowess, and sometimes Penrod and the general helped him across obstacles with the aid of a long branch.

w I got shown to night whether I can climb or not!" he said only to rod. "You can tell him about h this can you!"

y had been out about three hours in the storm when they came to a place e the undergrow s were more thicker and e a huge roc and cliffs crowding among it in such a terrific murmur storm." far from it is tree was a large e house of white gray color. On the t op of the great bulging roof of the ding was to be dimly seen in the snow h z haze above the heavy gle. The three pushed their way through the maze of bushes and trees. The two did not know where the general would lead them next, and they therefore were prepared to push on furt her when the general stopped be the entrance of the lding. He stood for a full minute very quiet---as motionless as a statue--- if he were listening to some unusual sound. But there was utter stillness.
ing was heard but the uproar of the storm. The wind however was a very stiff e, and the wind drove the blinding snow before it in horizontal sheets.

Penrod and the Rattlesnake boy stood still with bated breat h.

y did not have to wait very long. Presently one of the boys leaned forwar ring with almost unbelievable eyes not at the general or his staff but at the r himself. The general stepp stepped aside and it slowly turned as if on a nt. As it turned it gradually revealed an entrance to a large room dimly lit ted and the general spoke to Penrod;

"There are two things I like this all through Calvertinia and Miamolin, and others of her states." he said. This building is the headquarters one of the Gemini Bands. some of the members are here now. This building been occupied long by them. Come."

They had found their hearts trembling with thrill and horror.
dded the story of each of their lives had one part was all together alse quickening experience. This new aventure was still more thrill ng d ext exciting. But nevertheless the boys made their way into the hallway as refully as possible, and as they went up a steep flight of steps, both rod and the Rattlesnake boy felt that surely the general must hear the bbing in their breasts.

"The Gemini of Abbiamolin. Remember every word they say." whispered the attlesnake boy "So that you can tell it to me afterwards. Don't forget any-ing please. I wish I knew the french and English language."

At the foot of the corridor stood three men wearing black regalias and ks who were evidently the wards one of which worked the hidden lever t made the door turn open and shut. They were hir burly on with a watchful pearance and the general was them a hearty greeting, and a blessing as he took from one of them the eletric flashlight he held out. They went through narrow and dark hall way or passage and then down some flight of steps, and rned a corner into another corridor which was a hundred feet long and twenty ride. But it was also dark, so dark that Penrod and the Rattlesnake boy had walked some distance before their eyes became sufficiently accustomed to the dim ht to see that the walls themselves were of stone, the ceiling covered with black loth, and in the corners were rifles stacked closely to other.

"The Gemini of Abbiamolin!" the Rattlesnake boy was muttering to himself s if dazed or quite unconscious. "The Gemini of Abbiamolin. It must have taken years years to cur m form the powerful Gemini, and many years to gain the proper mber of members."

But the Rattlesnake boy scout remembered the story the stranger scout had old general Greatheart, of the first few Geminis members who during the fifty years before which still e slavery first originated had united themselves together. In a volume each of them had been handed down from generation to generation. The Gemini were a long memoried body of fierce implacable to be hated spites, and the fact that the Glandelinians could not find out who they really were or what their secret work was, made their a mystical and fiery burn all the more fiercely. fifty years ago the and first sworn their sacred Oath, and leaders and come and one, had died, or even shut lurid decline their duty, and some great dynasties had changed, but the Gemini had not changed, or forgotten their oath, or wavered in their belief even to the most trifling detail. As for after so many long years the members would be free and that the world would feel at the feet and kiss the hand of those of that ruled it from about their freedom.

All for those last fifty years, ever since the Abbiamolin, Calvertinia, and dred hiding places had been discovered that the Abbiamolin, Calvertinia, and Amrelinia was at last done cabled with them, and the leaders. No one neither man or woman no matter how confidential they were ever could spy on them and escape the cruel penalty stood out to a spy, and if there were after an one, they were sure to get him or her even if their fugitive was refused within the enemy's lines. And they were wai ing from lessly for general Kindernine! Then also the general knew how breathlessly and to know what he was bringing for them

Penrod and the Rattlesnake boy in spite of their fond boy imaginations were not quite old enough to know how fierce and full of flaming eagerness the breathless waiting of the powerful Gemini could be.But there was a tense strung thrill in knowing they they who were being led to them were the bearers of an important message of the Vivian girls.The Rattlesnake boy scout felt hot and cold, he chewed and gnawed at his fingernails as he went.He also felt as if he could almost have shrieked aloud in the intensity of his excitement, when the general stopped before a little black door.Penrod did not make the slightest sound.And he always looked quitecpale and stillwhen facing danger or being excited.And he appeared both now.The general touched the door and it was opened. They were looking into an immense room.Its walls and ceiling was covered with black cloth al als also and in the room were stacked weapons of all kinds., guns, swords, bayonets, javelins, pikes daggers, pistols, every weapon desperate soldiers might use in battle.The floor was full of black robed men with hoods of the same color, eachwho suddenly turned toward the door when it was opened.

They also saluted before the general and made obedience to him also but Penrod also realized at the same instant that they were startled on seeing he and his boy companion were with the general.Indeed they were a most strange and picturesque group of men, as they stood in the center of the big room, in the lurid candle light.For Penrod at once observed that they were officer of al rank, though all were dressed alike.There were generals and colonels all huge men, though still young for most were in years.Some of the stoutest were men with black bushy hair but with the bodies of giants and with utmost determination in their strong jaws. There were over onehundred andfifty of them and in each pair eyes eye and in each pairs eyes whether he were young or old glowed a steady unconquered flame.They had seen the Angelinian armies beaten so often in battles during the war, they had seen their own homes pillaged and robbed, and children oppressed, but in the eyes of each one was this flame of unconqured fury which throughout all this long tragedy of war had been handed down from father to son.

It was this which had gone on through those fifty years keeping its oath, and furnishing the most powerful Society of spies in the world, and which to day was waiting to see Penrod.General Kindermine laid his hand upon the boys shoulder and gently pushed him before him through the crowd of robed men, which seperated to make way for them at once.He did not stop untill the two stood in the very midst of the wide circle which slowly fell back gazing at the boys in wonder.Penrod looked at the general kindermine because for several moments he did not say a word.the reason why he did not speak was plain enough to Penrod.

He was too excited and could not.He had opened his mouth and tried to speak but its voice had seemed to fail him.Then he tried again and soon recovering his speech spoke loudly so thatall could hear-- even the man at the back of the gazing circle;

"My children in this staff"He said"This boy is the adopted son of general Greatheart and he came to bear me a command from the vivian girls themselves. My son"he to Penrod--speak."

Then Penrod understood what the general wished and also who he felt ..He even felt it himself a magnificent uplifting ladness, as he spoke, holding his black head high and [illegible]

"In another week the girls will [illegible] the final preliminary fortifications by an overwhelming assault Brothers"he cried."Your kindermine is to join in the attack as a reserve."

Then the Rattlesnake boy who stood apart watching, thought he that the strangely dressed men [illegible] the silent[illegible] smothered cries suddenly broke forth, men caught each other in passionate embrace embrace, they fell upon their knees, they suddenly clutched one another sobbing, they wrung each others hands, they leaped into the air.It seemed as if they could not bear the joy of hearing that the end of their waiting had come at last.she rushed upon Penrod and fell at his feet.The Rattlesnake boy was bewildered to see the tallest of those men in rank kiss his shoes, his hands, every scrape of his clothing they could se ize upon.The will circle [illegible] on swayed and closed upon Penrod [illegible] the Rattlesnake boy became afraidHe did not know [illegible] overpowered by this frenzy of emotion his own excitement [illegible] to shake from head to foot, like a leaf t and that the tears were streaming down his cheeks.The swaying crowd hid Penrod from him but he [illegible] sword in the cause his excitement increased [illegible] heart [illegible]. He scarcely [illegible] frienzied crowd of Gemini officers see [illegible] for the [illegible] [illegible] sanged [illegible] on s.Penrod was [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

Sometimes the Rattlesnake boy heard some of the men murmur a few words as if it were a short prayer, sometimes one of the men sobbed, and as a shaggy head would be lifted again and again he saw eyes wet with tears.As often as possible Penrod spoke a few words in the Abbiennian tongue, and the face of the man he spoke to suddenly flamed with joy.The Rattlesnake boy did not dare to use, as Penrod had seen that many of the faces were not of those of Abbiennians.The figures were foreign and were clear cut and pallid and of the type of Germans, Russians, French, and even Mexicans and Americans.It took them an immensely long time for all to kneel and kiss Penrods hand but no man omitted the ceremony, and when at last it was at an end a strange silence filled the big room.They stood still and gazed at each other with burning eyes.General Winderwine now moved to Penrods side, and stood near the platform that led forward and took in his hand a golden cord which hung from the nailed crucifix---he knew it and the curtain suddenly fell apart.

There stood the life sized crucifix, and the torture eyes of it seemed to be gazing at them.Around the heavy locks of hair in fact a circlet, the crown of thorns composed of gold.

"Son of General Grantheart"said general Winderwine in a shaking voice; "It is our sin we crucified Lord when the vile rebels do rule.It is to our own Blessed Lord to whom we seek help in this great need."

When every man fell on his knees.Even the man who had upheld the majesty of sabres dropped their weapons with a crash and knelt also.He was their Lord Crucified Lord, Crucified nearly Nineteen Hundred years ago.To him the Noble Abbiennian Nation went in its trouble .

"Lord Crucieifed.Lord Crucified."The voice broke into a heavy murmur. "Aid our nation in its holy cause."Andthe chanted the Litany of the Sacred Heart.

Penrod started forward slightly at the crucifix, his breath coming in his throat his lips apart.

"But, but--I"He stammered."If our Lord Crucified won't help us in this just cause, who will? Then,Let's all be like him, and we will win."

"When you will be as old as our Blessed Lord you will be like him---you" said general Winderwine, and he let the curtain fall.The Rattlesnake boy stood staring with wide eyes from Penrod to the crucifix, and from Penrod to the Crucifix, and he breathed faster and faster, his heart in his throat.But just now he did not utter a word in his words .He could not have done it if he tried.

Then Penrod stepped down from the platform as if he were in a dream, and general Winderwine fell into line with the others with a new flash sprang to their feet again, and once more formed the procession with a new flash of steel.General Winderwine and the boy scouts passed under it together.Now every eye was under Penrod.As he reached the heavy door at which he had entered he suddenly stopped and turned to meet their glances.He looked very young and thin, and pale but suddenly his fruitful smile was seen in his face at once.

He said a few words in Abbiennian in a clear and groove tone, and then saluted and passed out.

"What did you say to them,"was all the Rattlesnake boy asked him as the door closed behind them, and shut in the murmur of the impassionate crowd.

"There was only one thing to say"then the scout."I am only a boy-scout.I thanked them for the divine girls, my general, and told them, they would never never forget them or their mission."

When they got on the outside again it was still snowing--no not simply snowing, but coming down as if it meant to bury the abrutine encampments in an hour. In some sections of Calverinia it had been stated that a very fierce blizzard had been raging of such wide extent that its fulldura ion with cyclonic wind and fierce thun der and lightning in some quarters, that its full duration had been two weeks more or less, generally more and great damage had been done to many cities and towns by the one hundred and fifty mile and hour windstorms.

In the christian lines however or its immediate location and over Avian Hickey and elsewhere the storm had been only of two days duration.

When the two boyscouts with general Winderwine were about to leave the building thewaather seemed suddenly to have realized that it had so far been too lenient and must express itself in much more emphatically. So it had set about its resources, and summoned all forces in a deluge of snow.Such sur rounded even the oldest Calverinians.Here was a perfect hurricane of wind blowing steadily from the northwest and the snow pellets so hard that must their faces that it appeared rain out .

And the snow pall was so thick that with the midnight dark ness nothing whatever could be seen.The boys were determined however to make their return journey despi despite the storm, and much more rapidly than they had made the one tward Winderwines headquarters.

would of course take them sometime to trump back to general Avians camp if there was no reason for them to stop anywhere, since their mission had been completed.They had been tired sometimes, and went through some thrilling adventures, but during the rest of the storm night they had slept well in the Zenini's headquarters, and therefore on the morrow were refreshed. And one great desire was to get back to general Grantheart's camp. The vision of the camp appeared before him, even in its noisy disorderliness as the one most desirable spot on the earth.To Penrod it held his foster Father, general Manlo Grantheart.And it was general Grantheart alone that thePattlesnake boy saw, when he thought of it.General Grantheart as he would look, when he saw him come into the room with Penrod, and sant stand up and salute and say;

"I have brought your son back Your Excellency."He has carried out every single order you gave him---- every single order---so have I."

And he had.He had been sent as his companion, and attendant and he had been faithful in every thought.If Penrod would have allowed him he would have waited upon him like a servant, and would have been proud of the service too.But Penrod could never let his companion forget that they were only two boy scouts, and that one was of no more importance than the other.He had secretly felt that this kind of attitude to be sort of cousain a kind of grievance.Probably if one of them had been the more servitor of the other, it would have been more like some boyish game, and if the other had bantered a little and issued commands, and demanded sacrifices.And if the faithful aide-de-camp could have been wounded in the battle, or sent into a clandellinian prison for his master's sake, the adventure would have been more complete.But though their journeys had been full of wonders and thrilling experiences, though the memory of it hung in the Pattlesnake boys mind like a back ground of thrilling action adventures embroidered in all the hues of the winter covered country, with all the splendors of it there had been only two severe events for them.

After the two latter worse storms their weariness had not even been observed by such peril as threatened them before.

As the Patt lesnake boy had said ,they had blown like grains of dust from one car to another, through one portion of the christian line, and had been in nothing whatever.And no one had even thought of planning it but general Grantheart himself, and this was what his brave thought had finally wrought out for Penrod.If the two boys had been seen they would not have been able to accomplish their mission so safely or successfully.From the time they would be leaving general Winderwines camp to begin their journey back to general Grantheats fortified camp both of the boys were advised to keep their mission a sore secret and to keep out of sight of clandellinian scouting parties.

Now that their special work was accomplished a sort of reaction had set in.They had no more plans to form, and need not contemplate any more uncertainties.They were waiting for the storm to cease so that they could be on their way back to general Grantheats camp.Each of the boys were thinking of many things.Penrod was full of longing to see general Grantfoster Father, the Pattlesnake boy to the man he worship pped.Each of the boys hearts face and hear his voice once more.He also desired exceedingly to feel the pressure of his hand on his shoulder to be sure he still lived and was real and not only a dream.This last was because while in the stillwitch general Winderwine camps there had come rumors that the enemy had made a fierce assault upon a portion of general Grantheats and generals Avians lines, and a fierce battle had raged.

And yet everything had been all so wonderful in the reports of the struggle, the enemy assaulting general Parsons columns at Sunbeam Creek near the Gaisburg Junction, and being ref repulsed with the loss of half their number, the fierce attack upon all portions of general Avians lines,his head long counter attack gaining for him a most excellent victory, the flanking movement of the enemy being annihilated, the clandellinian assault upon Grantheart being annihilated , the great cannonading of fortifications against fortifications, against fortress Avian, the curtain of artillery fire which fell upon the assailants and destroyed all who dared to charge.

Now that they were still within general Winderwines encampments, they all seemed like things he had dreamed of.But he certainly had not dreamed them, he was going back to general Grantheart , to tell him of his orders.How glorious it would be to feel his hand upon his shoulder---- Pattlesnake boy felt it and he to feel his hand upon his shoulder---- Pattlesnake boy seemed to him a good deal.His thoughts were more wild and more fevered on his or ends a good deal.His thoughts were more wild and more fevered on him or ends a good deal.His thoughts were more wild and more fevered on him or ends a good deal.His thoughts were more wild and more fevered on him

But how he longed to reach general Greathearts camp and stand face to face with the general. The mission was accomplished. Indeed an army was saved from a trap. What would happen next. That was the question. They were ready to start as soon as they finished their morning meal. On the following morning the two boys accompanied by a strong escort of eighty five men started with the hope of reaching general Greathearts camp as soon as possible. Though at this section of the country the storm was over and a bright sun was shining it was terribly cold, colder than it ever had been before. A dreadful journey was commenced during which hope and despair alternated from hour to hour. The party had a sleight with them loaded with provisions but the snow was so deep that at times every man had to lend his strength to help the horses draw the heavily weighted sleighs. Sometimes one of the horses would stumble and fall, or the sleigh would be stopped by some obstruction in the deep snow, which would require a return of the advanced party of soldiers to relieve it so that it was scrambling and doubling back making the journey both tedious and most exhausting.

The difficulties of travel soon increased as enormous snow drifts became more frequent and which were of variable heights and widths, though not hard enough to warrant warrant the holding of a three year old child, the party had to stop or dig their way through which was a work of infinite trouble and consumed more than half their time.

In addition to this as the day advanced the temperature began to grow colder and a cold wave came began to rise with the fiercest intentis intensity from the Northwest, and this squall tends to cause the formation of immense snow drifts, and these formed to such a height, that some of them were as high as t i thirty five foot and covered large fields so that passage in that direction was impossible.

To climb over them meant burial alive and therefore the party had to make long detours around them. This kind of traveling was dreadfully exhaustive, and required the men to go over the same ground a number of times each way as the full force was needed to move a single sleigh, though six horses were pulling each.

Two of the soldiers one of them an executive soldier and the other second in command were al o almost overcome at the beginning of the journey, and this manner of traveling so aggravated their illness, that they were several times upon the point of succumbing.

The executive officer suffered principally from an affliction of snow blindness and this affliction of his eyes was so painful as to prove a severe drain upon his syssystem. The other lieutenant was still more seriously afflicted with a debility that left him almost as helpless as a helpless cripple.

Yet so great was his pluck and self - self denial that he insisted on walking instead of riding on the sleigh though he could scarcely take a score of steps without falling from sheer weakness.

PERIOD AND HIS COMPANIO S HAVE A REAL FIL EXPERIENCE OF A CALVERNIAN WINTER. PROBABLY AT ITS WORST.

chapter CHAPTER THIRTY ONE. ///.

THE RESCUE PARTY as almost exhausted from their hard journey and exposure their low spirits were suddenly revived by the discovery of several large tents far from a small creek. After the ironiest exertions through the deep snow is small c m camp was reached and found to consist of six tents of consider e size, and possessing many valuable products among which were bituminious l in great abundance, several kinds of succulent grasses, beautiful crockery, an d materials from w ich metallic paint is made and myriads of cartridges d one cannon. This camp they decided to remain in until the cold wave should t up.

They remained i this camp for two days, when a stiff southwest wind blowing se the temperature from fifty nine below to twenty above zero. The weather spite the cold had been exceedingly beautiful all be this time however d the new abrupt rise in the temperature prompted them to abandon the camp d resu e their journey before another storm arose which usuallycomes with outbreak of a southwest wind. The provisions were equally distributed among the sleighs and at eight mi A.M. the journey was resumed with six horses lling each sleigh.

ord issued an order appointing Captain Jannet to the command of one of the ighs, while the other sleigh was given in charge of Miscompanion the t Lesnake. In this order he instructed them to keep as near him as possible
t in case of a storm separating them to follow along the banks of the Yorma River up which they were to ascend until general Greathearts positions ld be reached, then to open communication with general Divina.

captain was to obey the orders of the Rattlesnake boy should they remain toether. After starting they made better progress than before reaching the ndoned camp, but their labors we re certainly not lessened for they met an ormous snow drift at nearly every hundred feet around which they fo we re ced to drag their sleighs sometimes for nearly as great a distance as five hundre dred yards, this required continual lowering and raising of the sleighs t hat in a day after leaving the camp they had progressed barely e mile. This gave the two boys very much anxiety for the party had now subsit sistence food and provisions for only another day and at the rate they were traveling starvation and death from exposure threatened to overtake the rty be ore they could reach general Kindernines positions unless they should more fort unate in securing forage than they had been since leaving general dernines camp.

r a while they met with good fortune for a s all quantity of forage was obtained fore night, and this was la enough to last for two days. The next morning on e twelvth of the Fedurary, the party we re caught in a terrible gale d a most blinding snowstorm which threatened to disable them and would have e so but for their unremitting efforts to battle the cyclonic blizzard.
Being at the mercy of the wild storm and not being able to see anything er thirty feet the sleighs became separated and soon each sleigh party was one and for a long time they did not meet again. During this storm the horses d been reduced in number by being shot as useless on account of being over-me by the fury of the storm, and four dropping dead. Despite the storm both rties with the sleighs though separated reached the banks of the Yorma nun River y the forenoon with scarcely two days provisions left , and then set out in a ster gale to find a cove to protect shelter from the severe elements.
The sleigh party entered was with difficulty a snow bank so that ll the men were forced to push and tug and wade through deep snow to lead e horses, while men had to carry the provisions to lighten the sleigh thus bjecting them to the most dreadful exposure. Toward the afternoon the sleigh was was at last lodged loose, and the party started up the river bank.
Presently one of the soldiers became serious ill, and the storm grew severe that it was impossible to make progress against it, and they had to s travel with the wind to their backs.
The s thus travelle for two re hours, [illegible] no habitable farm house, [illegible] appeared [illegible], but there was no sign of life about them. In fact, [illegible] possessio [illegible] seemed as one was remain there while se strong soldiers were sent out to find food as one was in the house. At this time most of the provisio s was ruined or destroyed by the storm so that again the gravest fears were exci ed lest starvation should overtake them.
To make it worse the next morning came and the storm did not abate. The sore trouble trouble which now afflicted them, caused Penrod and his party to leave the farm house and proceed in spite of the difficulty as they could not hope for speedy relief except by killing some gals game, or again securing forage. Another soldier suffered fro a frozen foot, his condition being terrible on account of

of the storm his foot which had been frozen, slough[illegible] away so much of the skin as to expose the sinews and muscles, so [illegible] he was forced to travel in the storm, and carry a load of nearly fifty pounds.-their provisions had [illegible] almost consumed, and nothing was left in sight.Thus they marched on until nine A.M. the soldier whose foot was frozen fell to the [illegible] and died, and was buried in the river, the [illegible] being frozen so hard, that no snow so deep th that digging a grave in that storm was impossible.There [illegible] by the whole party were in the gravest danger from starvation again, as the only food they now had left was a few pounds of horse bean for their [illegible] horses.The record for this trip was a most [illegible] one, which [illegible] excite the most deepest compassion from the hardest heart.

nd with such an absence of food the soldiers were served with half an ounce of alcohol or glycrine per [illegible].One officer whose name was Anthonie Penrod and who had been their main dependance as it was, he who had done most of the forag[illegible] succumbed from exhaustion and cold that afternoon followed by six soldiers who died from the same cause.Prayers were read over their bodies, but the remainder of the party were too weak to give them any kind of a burial.Another soldier died later in the afternoon, another fifteen minutes later, and five more within an hour.At this point Penrod began to feel himself that he could no longer continue his journey on foot, and some of the soldiers placed him on the sleigh, and covered him thickly with heavy blankets skoond coats.

The rest of this painful story can only be surmised by [illegible] scouting parties discovering some of the soldiers had [illegible] beneath the deep snow, while the sleigh with Penrod still alive but the horses dead stood in the midst of his forever gone comrades.

Generals Moore [illegible]ivingston and [illegible]ondonia [illegible] to [illegible] to locate the two parties in hearing of them on their return journey met in obedience of general Greatheart's command went out after the blinding storm [illegible] tour over a trackless and desolate white region to encounter hardships [illegible] great as those under which Penrod and the men he escorted had succumbed, all except the boy.

Having brought no food with them on departing from the camp they had to take the chances of foraging for it on their way.But hour after hour and a full day and night passed without any one seeing any signs of game, or places to raid and to stay the knawing pains of hunger they had [illegible] on one of their own horses, and pieces of their heavy bear skin clothes.This was a dreadfully [illegible] unpalat[illegible]able diet, placed them all in danger of dysentery and the fierce cold and north wind and deep snow so exhausted the two generals and their escorts, besides their horses that they all abandoned hope for those who they were searching for, and felt that death had taken them all. They had left general Greatheart's camp on the day following the great Blizzard, and so their horses and the generals and their followers took turns at floundering about in the deep snow to their extreme [illegible]ness, but by the second day they had hardly traveled two miles, but through the providence of god they reached a collection of abandoned tents where they took shelter and rested themselves, and restored the others.

All of the [illegible] fearfully of the terrible plight of the [illegible] fallen Penrod and his party, but their efforts during the first day to locate them had been unavailing, and no signs of the could be found.One of the soldiers went out to try and find provisions, and returned half an hour later, and to the astonishment and joy of the generals and their followers was accompanied by two of the lost soldiers, and the Rattlesnake boy.The reason now they were found was soon apparent, the soldier who went out to look for forage came upon another small camp, and anxious to learn if any of the party of whom they were searching was here, investigated.

A quick exchange of words were given in which the Rattlesnake boy in person told of the sufferings endured by himself and his [illegible] followers, after parting from Penrod and his column.-ring the frightful two days snowstorm he had reached the Norma nun after several narrow escapes from being blown into the ice choked river or caught by falling trees, and not exceeded up the rivers [illegible]ak bend [illegible] had found this solitary camp.He had been lucky in meeting soldiers here,just as their provisions were exhausted, and these supplies [illegible] and his party with food and his pilot him to a lower camp where three other soldiers were as like the Rattlesnake followers, and where the soldier found him.

The terrible condition of [illegible]emicle party was told to the Rattlesnake boy who without a moments delay prepared with the generals and their party to go to his re lif.

The fearful blizzard storms which had prevailed nearly every day during the latter party of the month of January and of February had so completely covered up all traces of the trail of the lost party and therefore the Rattlesnake boy had nothing to guide him in his search for Penrod who huddled up on the sleigh lay we nd helpless, while the horses and hissoldier comrades lay dead beneath a deep winding sheet of snow for twenty three hours they continued the search going on even [illegible] in the night until they were in the greatest danger of possib[illegible] exposure, but still refused to abandon their efforts to find their former comrades until some of the men became ill and exhausted from the cold refused to go any further, and two of the horses died.In this time the heroic boy and his helpers had traveled six miles in sixteen below zero weather and still growing colder, and passed within a stones throwof the place where the soldiers lay dead, but without find[illegible] the bodies or any signs of the sleigh and the dead horses.

General [illegible]ivingston saw that he could do nothing more except to send a wireless telegraph dispatch to general Greatheart, and inform him that two parties of soldiers according Penrod and his companion had been lost in a blinding blizzard near the Norma nun river, and advised him to send out extra searching parties to help in finding them.This he did as soon as possible, and then proceeded proceeded to continue the search himself.

In the mean time the Rattlesnake boy put himself in communication with general vivian and Kinderdine giving a full account by wireless of the misfortunes of the return parties.Determined to leave nothing undone to find his lost comrade he continued to search the area desperately.Before this he recieved a telegraph dispatch from general [illegible]ing and Greatheart instructing him to omit no effort and to spare no time in securing the safety of the lost survivors. This wireless dispatch being the first general [illegible]ivingston that officer with a spirit of great [illegible] seriously placed at [illegible]ivingston disposal any number of men he might be required.Being greatly facilated in his efforts general [illegible]ivingston. soon had [illegible] collected large [illegible] to pull sleighs, men and provisions, with which [illegible] speedily collected large to pull sleighs, men and provisions, with which [illegible] pushed forward on the search [illegible] no sooner started when they were forced to return by a terrible snowstorm [illegible] and [illegible] by a hurricane like gale, and in which they [illegible] came near being lost.

After the three day storm had abated they started out once more, and traveled over a large district before finding any traces of the route, which Penrod and the Rattlesnake boy had followed [illegible] length they came to the river, and going out upon a small headland leading into the river, they discovered the traces of a fire had eighteen feet in size and from its evident use as a signal they knew it must have been one of Penrods camping places

About eighteen hundred yards from where the fire had been made, general Livingston noticed the points of eighteen sticks standing up out of the snow for about eight inches and placed together with pieces of wire.He made a most careful examination of this spot and first found a large coffee pot then an arm was seen protruding from the snow, and hastily hastily scraping away the snow he was horrified to find the body of one of the men.This convinced him that somewhere near was the death camp, and a little additional efforts soon discovered the bodies of six more of the dead soldiers.

The bodies were all taken carefully from under the snow and laid side by side, there they were left under coverings, while the search for the others were continued with out intermission.It was not until the following day however that the snow bound sleigh was discovered as it lay almost buried in a deep snow drift, nearly thirty nine feet high.The sleigh was several hundred yards distant from the spot where the bodies were found and under the [illegible] wrappings of blankets between the remaining boxes of provisions, Penrod still alive but very weak and almost unconscious [illegible] was found.

Near by were the remainder of the dead soldiers.All these bodies were conveyed to the other sleighs, and there placed Penrod was carefully taken care of , and revived before the return journey began.Having performed these and duties by the indefatigable and hero general [illegible]ivingston proceeded to search for the others under the Rattlesnake boy of whom nothing had been seen or heard since the separation or the sleighs during the fatal two days snowstorm.He made a most thoroughout search, but could find no trace of the missing men. He persisted as long as there was a probability of even hope of success, and then returned to his camp sore in heart over his utter failure.The boy scout and the dead soldiers were conveyed to general [illegible]ivings lines from which a large number of [illegible] had been sent [illegible] all in the nearest and therefore one of these was directed to [illegible], the bodies of the [illegible] soldiers took to general Kinderdines camp, while the two [illegible] were placed in general Livings headquarters. where the [illegible] examination of [illegible] dead soldiers were placed in caskets [illegible] [illegible] preparation, to be [illegible] before several [illegible] special [illegible] the [illegible] were received by the general and his staff.On the following morning the bodies were [illegible] the company streets by battalions of soldiers, [illegible] bands, regiments of militia, some of the members of the Council, and a vast concourse of people who thus manifested their admiration and respect for the dead Anglonian heroes.On the following day a [illegible] was held for the repose of their souls and then they were conveyed or consigned to a final resting place.The seventeen brave men who had escorted the Rattlesnake boy were never seen or heard of again after the sleighs separation in the frightful blizzard.Thus ended the first part of the return journey that started off amid the firing of guns, prolonged cheering and the cheers of a great multitude of soldiers that waved benedictions on the two parties as the gallantly started [illegible] comp.They do our most [illegible] duties often [illegible] glory immortality,expectation and confidence, [illegible] faith, [illegible] trouble gloom and despair, but good [illegible] efforts which develop heroic purposes are never uselessly expended, for even in utter [illegible] failure they leave a spark that will kindle again the noble flame that once burned for them in vain.

It was indeed a miracle how either Penrod and his companion survived when all the men of the two parties perished from cold and great exposure in that terrible storm.Through Penrod was weakened [illegible] long stay underthe blankets on the sled he recovered very rapid, and on the sixteenth of February he was ready to resume the journey to Fort Grantheart a stop which was only a short distance a very short distance from general vivians lines.When the trip was made it was made in a covered [illegible] sleigh under a more powerful escort. After a brief [illegible] riding the sleigh drew up within view of general Grantheart's works.

"We are there now more."the Rattlesnake boy cried cheerily to Penrod.

This time there had no attempt on the other hand [illegible] to delay them.All the soldiers turned to look at the two boys on the sleigh, seeing the look of excitant eagerness in their faces. At first as recognizing them the soldiers thought the [illegible] must be a couple of boyscouts coming back to be sent after a return from a furlough.The sun was dazzling bright that day, though the weather was the coldest of the winter yet.

"Then" [illegible] boys to reach general Grantheart's headquarters now" said Penrod."and we can get there quickly now,as it is [illegible] mile away.

They urged the driver to make the horses go a little faster, each of the boysshad flushed cheeks, and it appeared as if seconds eyes were intently gazing at something a very long distance off, something like a wall of deep and thick wreathed smoke, puzzled at it, and wondering exceedingly as to the cause of it.

"We have come back to general [illegible] lines at last."said the Rattlesnake boy in a voice that seemed to be very unsteady."We have---we have suddenly come back."The [illegible] to Penrod"did it ever occur to you that perhaps [illegible] strange [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] if not true by the appearance of the smoke are [illegible] the air that a battle is going on somewhere!isn't it true,Penrod" all me?"

"Yes it certainly does."answered Penrod."It is true.I see the smoke of it far and far off."Then he added after a second or so of complete and most unusual silence not just what the Rattlesnake boy had said to himself" the whole army seems to be [illegible] unusually silent."He said this in a very low voice indeed.

The [illegible] general Grantheart's [illegible] were not [illegible] when they turned into the [illegible] pike street they heard [illegible] in the distance a noise that was like thousands of big heavy army [illegible], drays, carts, and wagons running [illegible] over a hard pavement round with heavy loads mingled with another another sound like a fierce screeching gale or typhoon raging on the horizon.

The boys also saw [illegible] columns of soldiers all excited hurrying toward that direction. The boys looked at the [illegible] something intensely exciting was going on,but never nevertheless the knew the [illegible] had arrived at the [illegible] of [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

''Boys, boys''she said to them..''The vivian girls has placed me Angelinia Aronburg at your command, but they left me with an order I was to repeat to you.. They requested that neitherof you go near thr scene of battle untill they themselv s themselves could see you again.You'll do that much for them won't you?''

Both boys fell back surprised.Why was itthatthe beautiful vivian girls took so much interest in them.

''Not go out to the scene of the battle.''they exclaimed together.''why we were just going out to learn the news.''

Indeed Angelinia Aronburg had never before been quite so reverential and ceremonious.

''Your pardon myvdear boys''she said.''I may find out all possible news at the request of you good dear brave lads and go with you on scout n scouting tours and re report such things as it is well that you should know.There have been very dark tales told of h this early mornings m battle, and there may be darker ones to come. they They ask that you would not go near the firing lines at least to day.Id If you-meet them again--when you and they meet again''she corrected herself hastily''when you and they meet again they say you surely will be able to understand.They and general Greatheart ash assi me to be your guardian' as I am theirs.I will do all things at your command.''

The boys saluted and the three returned to the generals council room together.

''Ph would you mind telling us what you heard the officer shout?''he asked politely of the Rattlesnake boy.

He told all he had heard..he story was not a long one as exact details of the results of the first assaults had not yet reached the camp.It was briefitly stated that general vivians great assaults had repulsed with enormous loss, that the Angelinian divisions under general Hendroe veldon, and pelight veden had been terribly shattered, with their generals and other commanders by the hundred killed, and the infuriated rebel Angelinian soldiers had counter attacked, and recaptured all their rifle pits.

The glandelinian army that counter charged were drawn chiefly from the Whimsie Omarians and Seeedlers and others, and after repus repulsing the Nat'onals had made a most furious and determined attack to regain their rifle pits and succeeded but suffered the most horrible and dreadful losses of regiments by the wholesale in killed and wounded.If you don't believe it ask them.The battle at this moment was gon going on with no decided advantage on either side.''

''what next?''said Penrod.''If I was only a born Abbie-arnian'' he added and th then he stopped.

Gertrude Angelina stood biting her lips but stared stonily at the floor.Both boys noticed a grim change in her.It was very grim because it was evidentbthat she was holding herself desperately under emironis control.No doubt she was tortured by a great anxiety but nevertheless had determined not to allow herself to look anxious, and her jaws were set hard with the desperate resolve and small lines w were seen in her beautiful angelis face.Each of the boys thought of this secret secretly but did not speak about about it.If she was anxious she could be so for one grave reason and even the boys realized what the reason may be.General Greatheart had gone to join general vivian in that assault to support a the torn and bleeding christian lines facing peril and utter disaster.If he had gone to to join the battle it could only be for the reason that general vivians danger calle called him to the support, and he went to face the storm at its worse.

Angelinia Aronburg had been sent to general Greathearts hea headquarters to w watch over the two boys.Still silence was the order, and what A g Angelinia Aronburg knew she could not tell them, and perhaps she knew little more that a great life might be lost.

Because the pio righteous vivian girls Princesses had admired the two boys so much this little girl hero n heroine, seemedto feel th that she must comfort herself with a greater ceremonial reverence than she had ever shw shown the boys before .she held herself strictly within call and at the command of the boys as it had been her custom to hold herself with regard to the general and to violet and her sisters.The ceremonious seri service even extended itself to the Rattlesnake boy who appeared to have taken a new place in her mi mind. He also seemed now to be a person to be waited upon and replied to with dignity and formal respect.

When the noonday meal was served Gertrude Angelina drew out general Greatheart's chair at the ha head of the table and stood behind it with a majestic air.

''My dear friend.''she said to Penrod.''General Greatheart requested that you take his seat at the table--- untill--- while he is not with you.''

Pn Penrod took the seat in silence.

two o-clock in the afternoon while the roar of the distant battle was still ng on the sun shining into one of the windows fell steadily on two boys faces ks looking and worried.The Rattlesnake boy sat upon his bed in his old fashione silence way with his hands clasped around his knees.Penrod lay flat on the iles.Neither any of th boys were sleeping, and even now they had not talked ood deal.Each had secretly guessed a good deal of what the other did not say.

''There is one serious and most important rthing we must remember'' rod finally said.''we must not be afraid under any conditions.''

''ye indeed''answered the Rattlesnake boy fiercely.''we must not be afraid. thing will happen to him.''

e are tired.'' we came back expecting t be able to tell of our experiences him.We have always been looking forward to that.We never thought once that night be gone into battle.And he was gone.did you feel as if----'' he turned ll he faced his companion''as if something solid had shuck you on the breast?''

''Yes.''answered the Rattlesnake boy hastily.''Ye''.

e were not ready for this.'' said Penrod.''We had never gone before, but surely ught to have known that he might come day be called.He went to the b-ttle mmoned he was summoned.He told us to wait.We don't know wh the vivian girls ded us not to go near the b ttle, but if we obeyed we know we did not stay y because we were afraid.To let ourselves be afraid would be breaking one of 's laws.''

od's laws.''I groaned his friend dropping his head on his hands.''Iya have forgotten about that.''

let us remember it''said Penrod.''This is the time.Hate not .Fear not.'' repeatedthe last words again and again.''Fear not.Fear not.''he said.nothing e Have him.''

e Rattlesnake boy slowly lifted his head and looked at the bunk bed sideways. did you really think.''he said slowly.''did you really

''did you really think that perja perhaps he knew where the weakest point of the ortifications s?'' rods answer was much slower.

''If any o e knows surely he would and should.He has found out so much already'' listen to hi this.''broke in the Rattlesnake boy.''I believe he has o gone direct the assaults against that point.If he does; if he could break through and win the victory all the country would be mad with joy.It wouldn't be ly his divisions.All of general vivians army would rush to a great victorious assault and follow Abbiesmnia's flag into the heart of the enemy's lines. he whole christian world is praying for thefall of Vivian vickey or s praying for the fall of vivian vickey and if Greatheart accomplishes a great success, all his men Will believe were in him, and fight like madmen for him.They could fight so fiercely that there would be no rebels left to fight.''

he boy beat his fists together in a frenzy of excitement.''It's the time.Its it's the time.''he cried.No man could let such a chance like that slip by when he has an opertunity.He must have discovered a weak spot-----he must. That is the reason he went for.He knows-----he knows----he always knows.'' and he threw himself back on his bed and flung his arms over his face and lay there pheeting.

II''It may have been the time''said Penrod in a low strained voice.''If it is and he knows the weakest spot he will lead his troops into it.''

And he threw his arms up over his own face and lay perfectly quiet.Neither of them spoke again and with the approach of darkness the moon appeared and shone in on them as if it were waiting for some new thing to happen.But nothing did.In due time they were fast alsep asleep.

CHAPTER THIRTY TWO....

IN THE TWO BOYS HAVE ANOTHER ADVENTURE WITH THE ''MUTT'' AND ''JEB JEFF ''SPINS!!.?!!

THE NEXT MORNING CAME, and the two boys waited patiently for general Greatheart's return...hey could not guess how long t hey would have to wait for him nor could they guess even vaguely how soon the waiting would end.All that Angelinia Aronburg could tell them, she told.she was very willingly to stand very respective ly for hours relating to Penrod the story of sh how the period of the absence of the two boyscouts had passed for general Greatheart and herxmle herself. she told how general Greatheart had spoken every day of his adopted son, how he had often been so anxious that he looked very pale, and very often in the evenings when he he had heard of the perils that the two boys went through he had walked to and fro incessantly in his room deep in thought as he looked down seemingly with unseeing eyes at the carpetless floor.

''He permitted me to talk very often of you two boys, you two brave boys''she said.''I saw that the general wished to hear your name mentioned ofte.. I reminded him of the time when you hadbeen so young to the serives of Abbiaannia that most boyscouts of your age would have been in the hands of instructers, and yet you were silent, and strong and sturdy, and traveled with him and the Gemini as if you were not a toy scout at all, never giving in when you were tired, and faced unseen dangers.As if you understood--as if you un understood.''she added proudly.''If through t he power of ged himself himself a boy can be like a man at less than six years of age, you were surely that boy.Indeed I must say many days since I first met you, and since I have looked int your solemn eyes, which are always so watchful, I had almost been afraid of you because that so young a boy should returns one's gaze so gravely, seemed almost an unearthly thing.and I had never been afraid of boys before..''

The ''he main thing I remember of those days''said Penrod''is that he was almost always with me, and that when he went on a perilous scouting tour, I went with him too despite his protest.''

The strange feeling that they were patiently waiting for general Greathtr Greatheart 's return was so intense, that it filled the boys with anxiety and longing. hen the officers stopped at the door each of the boys endeavored not to show any sign of excitement of being startled.an officer might come some day who may tell them--they did not exactly know what, but it may be something dreadful.

But no officer came with any news.ghenthe boys went out into the snow covered company Streets, they found themselves hurrying on their way back in spite of themselves.Something might have surely happened to cap cause exciting news. Angelinia Aronburg read the bulliten carefully, seeing that six generals g had fallen two killed, but none of them were familiar to her or the boys.and in the evening she told Penrod and the Rattlesnake boy all the news of the battle it was well they should hear.But t he disorders of this battle had ceased to occupy much space.It's description had become an old story, and after the excitement of general vivians...ivians repulse had died out there seemed to be a great lull in the events...o report over came as how the battle resulted.

The rebel generals if they had repulsed the christian attack to the last had not dared to press the advantage, not even to try.to follow the success they had ng de, and there were numberless rumors that the plandelinian losses were most terrific in theextreme...he whole country in that region seemed to be existing in a sort of night mare of suffering, devastatieb, and sorrowful suspense.

''All of Abbiaannia is waiting to strike a terrific blow at vivian vishey''the Ratt lesnake boy broke forth one hour that night as they talked together''but I'm afraid she won't wait long--she can't .If I were an Abbiaannian soldier instead of a Calverinian, and was in aAbbiaannia-----''

''My Father was an Abbiaannian, and yet I was born in Canada in Norty America.''Penrod interposed.The Rattlesnake boy flushed red as scarlet as he realized what he had sa d.

''what a fecol I am he '' groaned.''I beg your pardon--sir I beg your pardon.''

The Rattlesnake snake boy stood up when he said the last words and added the''si as he realize realized that there was a distance btween them, which was something akin to the distance between youth and maturity, but yet was not the same.

''You are a ood good Calverinian but you forget that Calverinia is qstare of Abbiaannia.''answered Penrod.

he intense grimness of Angelinia Aronburg had increased with the coming of the ext day.And another thing that she increased was her great ceremonious respect hiness of her manner tward the two boys.'And it seemed that the most and ranxious she felt herself become, the more formal and stately her bearing became.It appeare d that she was bracing her own courage by accomplishing the smallest deeds life in the council room required as if the two boys were of the dignity of services performed in a much larger place, and under more imposing circumstances.Indeed the Rattlesnake boy found himself feeling as if he were a constant companion of the vivian Girls and that therefore dignity and ceremony were very necessary on his own part .He therefore began to experience a sense of feeling of being somehow a boy scout of high rank for whom doors would be opened grandly, and who had a full brigade of troops at his command.Indeed the watchful obedience of fifty vessels embodied itself in the manner of Angelinia Aronburg.

all that my former general was very much i different.Perhaps it is making it much easier to learn things properly.If he had not talked to me about soldiers the---who have never seen places like vivian vishey this might have been harder for me to understand.''

''I am very glad''The Rattlesnake boy once said reflectively''that after when tat last they managed to call their Regiments of boyscouts together and went to spend a day at the boyscouts barracks, that large body of armed boys stared at their commanders in great and most amazing uncertainity.They felt that something important had happened to the two.what had happened they could so not really know but never heless they felt sure it was some experience which made them mysteriously differetent.The Rattlesnake boy himself did not look like Penrod but in some most strange way je he seemed more akin to him. They knew only knew that some necessity in the affairs of general Greatheart had taken the two boys away from the camp, and the Regiment of boyscouts.Now they had come back and they seemed older.Indeed at first the Regiments of boy- scouts felt very awkward and many of their leds shuffled their feet in a manner that proved they felt uncomfortable.After the first greetings most of the boys did not ass ctly know what to say.But it was Penrod who saved the situation.

''Let us drill the two companion Regiments first.''he said to the Rattlesnake boy''then we can alk to them about our experiences.''

''Attention''shouted the Rattlesnake boy in a magnificent.

''Attention''shouted Penrod.

And the two regiments of boys forgot everything else and sprang into line immediately.After the drill was ended and the closest of them sat in a circle on the floor of the barracks, while the rest stood, their council became more respon resplendid than it had ever beene.

''I g have had plently of time to read caps, and work out new plans.'' said the Rattlesnake boy scout.'' nyhow reading is just the same as if you were traveling or having the experiences.''

Penrod himself sat down and listened enthralled by the adroitness of the great imagination he displayed.without revealing a single dangerous fact, he managed to build up of their journeys and experiences a totally new story structure of great and thrilling adventures, which could have fired the whole being of any groups of lads.It was safe to discribe planes and fortifications and he so described them that all the boys squirmed in their delight at imaging themselves marching in a procession of troops attending the rebellient ion of Hesperorers Vivians army, or je n joining long distance scouting tours, climbing with knapsacks strapped tight up precipitious mountian sides, defending christ- ian fortifications, and storming rebl.worl works.

All of the boys glowed and exultated. he Rattlesnake boy even felt the same way and Penrod watched his sharp featured burning eyes face with the greatest wonder and admiration.This strange power of making things alive was he surely knew know what his father would have called Genius.

''Let us take out oath of'legiance again''''shouted lieutenant Cadwick. when the spy conversation was over for the day.

''The n papers never said anything more about the lost vivian girl Fe Princesses but we are all for them still.go let's take it.'' said another leading boyscout.

So they stood lin line again, Penrod at the head and renewed their oath.

''The sword in my hand for Abbiaannia's cause.

The heart in my breast for Abbiaannia.

The swift rees of my sight, the thought of my brain, the life of my life--for Qbbia Abbiaannia.

Here grows two Regiments of boyscouts for Abbiaannia.

god be thanked.''

It was more solemn than it had ever been before.'he Regiments of boys felt it most tremendously.'ll of them were conscious that thrills ran down their spines into their boots.

When Penrod and the Ratt lesnake boy left them they first stood at salute, and then broke out into a deafening, ringing cheer.On the way home the Rattlesnake boy asked Penrod a serious question.

''Did you see and notice how queer Angelinia Arenbur g acted tward us this morning and how when she stood at the frnt front door and looking after us when we went out this morning, she gazed at us af if we were two young princess's.?''

''Yes indeed I did.''answered Penrod.''I have seen how she acted two or three times already.and I do not think I ever saw t her that way before.My companions have never seen her though many boys have heard about her.Why has she fallen so for us.?''

''I'd like to know myself.''said The Rattlesnake boy.I've been trying to work it out, ever since we came back, and ever since we returned, she's treating us as if she was our servant.But did you also noticed a strange middle sized soldier peeping at us from round the corner of the kitchen stairs or ever balustrades, or through the cellar kitchen windows.I believe he wants to speak to us for some reason or other, and knows Angelinia Arenburg won't let him if she catches him at it..or some reason she is suspicious for when ever she is about that man always darts out of her sight ad as if afraid.''

''I wonder what it is he want's to say to yo us?''said Penrod.

''I do not like to know for first rate as I m I'm sup suspicious ofwhit myself. said the Rattlesnake boy again.

When they reached the building they immediately found out, because when Gertrude Angeline opened the door for them, they saw in the hallway or atthe end of the passageway the stranger in a dusty purple uniform and with a dusty scarlet hat on evidently having at that moment mounted from his strange subet subterranean hiding place.He had come up the steps so quietly that the Angelinia Arenburg had not yet seen him.It was he short man who had helped his companion put Pa Penrod in the attic with the Rattlesnake boy.

''Youn g Master Penrod''he called out in a loud tone of authority.

Gertrude Angeline though surprised at this sudden retort, wheeled about fiercely.

''Silence sir''she commanded.''How dare you adress the young master thus!And who in the Name of Neptune are you are any way!''

The stranger snapped his fingers at her defiantly, and then marched forward folding his arms tightly.

''You mind your own business Miss Anna Arenburg''he said.''It's Young Master Penrod I'm speaking to, and not his housekeeper and ''sweetheart''.It's ting he was spoken to about this.''

''Silence man''a screamed Angelinia Arenburg drawing her revolver.''I don't like your face.Get out of here or I'll shoot you.''

''Let the fool speak''said Penrod.Iwant to hear.,hat is it you wish to hear misterMister.General Greatheart is not here.''

''That is why I came to find out about that''put in the man.''when is he coming back.''?

''I cannot tell as I do not know.''answered Penrod.

''That's [illegible]

''that's just the thing''said the small man.''You two boys are surely old enough to understand that two big lads and a young girl like that can't go around with the vivian girls, and then remain in s this part of the camp for nothing. So may say you don't care what my purpose is and probably you don't , butspies are spies, and girls are girls, and boys are boys.If general Greatheart is coming back, and you can tell me when I may nothe obliged to keep you boys and the fool hardy vivian girls closely watched, but Iknow too much and also other things about yo 6 you two boys, and violet and her sisters to allow you out of my sight for one moment.Your foste1 Father is out of sight.The vivian girls are having me closely watched.''H SSH''Jerking his head tward Angelinia Arenbrug suspected me as a snooping traitor for the past week.Now do I know she can prove to the Nationals what I have been here for for the last three days I've reminded.''

''You are a professional spy and my prisoner.''shrieked Angelinia Arenburg.''pon my dent move away from here or I'all shoot you down where you stand.''

Indeed the Rattlesnake boy longed to burst forth.He knew what his own boy-scouts would say to a man like that, he knw knew the a exact words andphrases. but he knew they were not the words or phrases an aide-de-camp might dare deliver himself of in the presence of his superior officer or the little girl, neither were they words or phrases an q equerry ever uses in court .therefore he did not allow himself to burst forth.Nevertheless he stood with his eyes glaring his flaming face distorted like an enraged bulldog, and he bit his l ips untill they bled.He wanted to strike with his sabre.He desired to shoot the man down.The noble son of general Greatheart , a firm friend of the vivian girls.the bearer of an important message to them.there sprang before his furious eyes the scene of t he lurridly lighted black walled room, and the frinl friendsied crowd of Geminian officers kneeling at this same boys feet, kissing them, kissing his hands, his garments, the very earth he stood upon, while above the elter the Face of our crucified l Lord on the Cross looked on with the nimbus of light like a hale above it.

If he dared to speak himwind now he felt he could have endured it much better.

But being an aide-de-camp he could not.

''I think I know you now.''said Penrod.''So you want to know why?.It was only the beginning of my work in this camp when I rescued a girl scout who was shot by the glandelinian persuers..You and your your tall companion put me in a den of Rattlesnakes because I would.not reveal where she was.Is it that I'm mistaken or am I telling the truthe.Speak up now mister.''?

Gertrude Angeline had become deadly pale at hearing this.she looked like a wrat hful angel in her fury, and she looked exc edingly dangerous like some ferocious cornered wild tigress.

''Master Penrod''she said a in a voice as deadly as her paller, and she actually spoke low--this man here --''

The ''Jeff '' like fellow drew back tward the cellar kitchen steps.

''here's soldiers outside who will the m my part''he shrilled.''Young Master Penrod order that young Tigress to stand back''for she had advanced upon him with her long military knife drawn.

''No one will hurt you if you leave this building peacefalyy.If you know who the man is Gertrude then detain him.If not please replace your weapon.''

Angelinia Arenburg literally ground her teeth.But she drw drew herself up and saluted with ceremony.She replaced the dangerous weapon.

''I obey you sir since((''--since I must.''she said breathing hard.''But I'm going to keep my eye on him as long as he remains.''

Penrod had at this moment put his hand in his breast pocket , and produced a large leather envelope.It was the one contw ining the photographs of the two spies. He glanced over them and looked at the man but he looked somewhat different.

''You hear what I told you.''said Penrod.''you may go immediately, and yet if you ain't out of this part of the camp within half an hour you'll be arrested and shot as a spy.''

Angelinia Arenburg looked so like a ferocious tigress, only held back from springing that the stranger was even afraid to turn his back to her.

''If You'll say thatI'll not be trailed or w atched I'll do as you demand.''he said.''you're nothing but a lad, but you are like general Greatheart.You have got a way h that any man or woman can surely tu trust.Ifthe general was here I'll say the truth that I would not dared come here.But since you are here, and said you would allow me to go without molestation, I'll do as you commands.He'd have shot me if he was here.But he's gone, and two boy-scouts and a mad girl camp mad cap girl like that don't seem to be much to depen on.But I'll trust only you.''

''Well be good enough to hurry out of the building.''said Penrod.And he put his on own revolver back in its hostler and turned into the council roo m as if he did did not see him.

The Rattlesnake boy and Angelinia Aronburg remained in the hall untill the men was gone and then followed Penrod.

"Are you sure that you know the man?" said Penrod. "I have pictures here of two spies, on e a tall man, and another only four feet and one half tall. They are not army men, but prefe professional spies, hired by the Glandelinian government. I had suspected that he was the small man, but I was either mistaken or he changed his disguise so cleverly that I either regi recognized, or did not recognise him. When I had first met the two spies they tried to force me to reveal the hiding places of Jennie Turner. When I refused they put me into the attack of Rattlesnakes from which you rescued me. We boys know how t o face dangers. Ine does not din of it."

The big beautiful eyes under her golden brows filled with tears.

"No sir" she said "oneness not die of only facing danger. But the insult from that scounde scoundrel---the insult. That is not indureable."

"The stranger would not have dared to some here, or spoken to me as he did if general Greatheart had been here" said Penrod. "And it is true that boys like us should not trust all strangers we meet. Is there any chances of the stranger coming here again?"

"I'm afraid there is sir." Answered Gertrude Angeline swallowing hard as if she had a lump in her throat. "Perhaps he would come back with help--- so we will have to be on our guard. If general Greatheart would have left a strong guard how horse it would not have been so bad. But how could he think, or even believe there would be danger within the very christian limes? O how could he when he went away he thought---he thought that---" but there she stopped herself suddenly.

"Never mind" said Penrod. "Never mind Gertrude. When the danger grows too serious we'll go away."

"I can go out and scout round a occassionally" said the Rattlesnake boy's sharp voice "I've done it before. good steady nerves helps you to succeed in anything. The Geminie Accomplishes things faster still. I'd go out and ask some of them to keep w atch for us."

"I can do excellent excellent scouting too" said Penrod.

Angelinia Aronburg uttered an exclamation that sounded like a groan.

"boys boys, she cried" "We no, no, on't you know that I am here to go out and scout around. I too a can succeed in anything. I can even run enemis out of the camp single handed."

"We will all three begin to see what we can do to keep away secret enemies." said Penrod.

Just at this moment---exactly as what happened of the day of their return from their dangerous e journey in the big blizzard storm--- there arose in the company streets outside, the sound of many men shouting, talking excitedly, o complani complaining, uttering exclamations, and even swearing. And this time the outcry seemed even more excited and louder than before. Many of the soldiers were wounded swathed, in bandages, or limping, others were running and yelling, and there seemed more confusio[illegible] than usual. And above all other sounds were the shouted words---

"We are beaten. We are beaten."

But to day the Rattlesnake boy did not rush to the door at the first cry. He stood st ill for several mi u minutes, they all stood still---listening. Afterwards each one remembered, and told the others that he had stood still, because some strange strong feeling held him e waiting as if to hear some great news.

It was Angelinia Aronburg who went out of the room first, and Penrod and the Rattlesnake boy followed her. One of the officers who was upstairs at the moment had suddenly ran down in haste and opened to the door to go out and ask questions. The soldiers were wei wild with the greatest excitement, and many danced about as they shouted.

The news they were shouting and yelling had evidently a stirring disasterous quality. The officer was out among the crowd about this time, and was asking questions of a soldier who was talking loud and fast.

"Here'ags" he was saying in a loud excited tone. "Our forces have been repulsed in our attempts to take the St Dominean fort ifications. The Glandelinians have rushed forward to day in overwhelming nu b numbers, and taken general Kindernines works. Twix night and morning they done it. General Manley has turned up And reinforced the garrison---twix night and morning they done it. General Vivians army is shattered. We had to retreat to our own works and lose no time for the enemy almost captured them. And so off we bolted. The Fortifications held out. e General Manley did it."

It was then that Gertrude Angeline forgetting even ceren n ceremony bolted also. She bolted back to the council room, rushed in and the door was shut behind her. Penrod and the Rattlesnake found it shut, when having secured a written report of the recent battle they went down the passage slowly and silently.

Penrod was surprised when he found the door closed, and he stepped there. He did not t y he did not turn the door knob. From inside the room there came the sound of big convulsive sobs and passionate Abbiannian words of sorrow and reproach.

"Let us wait a little while" said Penrod trembling a little. "she will not want any one to see her just now. Let us w ait a few moments."

His blue eyes looked immense and he stood at his tallest, but he was trembling slightly from head to foot. The Rattlesnake boy had begun to shake as if from an ague. His face was scarcely human in its fierce voyish emotion and emotion and excitement.

"Penrod. Penrod." his whisper was a cry. "That's what he went for---because he knew poor general Vivians and Kindernines armies would be shattered and they would fail."

"Yes indeed" said Penrod. "that is surely why he went" and his voice was very unsteady as well as his body was.

Presently however the sobs inside the room checked themselves back suddenly. Gertrude Angeline had just at that instant remembered. The two boys had guessed she had been leaning against the wall during her outburst. Now she stood up right and felt somewhat shocked at the forgetfulness of her sudden frenzy. Penrod turned the door knob and opening the door slowly, tiptoed into the room. The Rattlesnake boy who followed shut the door behind him, and they all three stood together. When Angelinia Aronburg gives way to her attacks of emotion she certainly is exctional indeed. she looked as if a cloudburst storm had swept over her. she had ut checked back her sobs but tears si still swept down her cheeks.

"Boys my dear boys" she said pitiously. "Your par pardon I graciously beg of you. It was as if a great convus convulsion seized me. I forget everything even my duty. Pardon please pardon."

And there on the worn carpet of the council room, they both looked at her surprised.

"You must't ask pardon of us" said Penrod. "You have waited so long my dear friend. You have given your young life to the Good cause as my foster father has. You have known all t he suffering a boy like me has not been here long enough to see or understand. Your loving brave heart------your faithful heart" his voice broke and he stood and looked at her with an appeal which seemed to ask her to remember his boyhood and to understand the rest. If he had not stopped her she would actually have went on one knee and kissed the boys hand with adoration.

"on't kneel to me, a boy" he said reproachfully. "ou mustn't kneel." And Gertrude Angeline, losing his hand again rose to her f eet.

"We we shall hear it all." said Penrod. "Now the waiting will soon be over."

"Yes dear Penrod. Now soon we shall receive commands." answered the little girl heroine.....

The Rattlesnake boy held out the report slip.

"May we read them?" asked.

"Untill further orders sir." said Gertrude Angeline in a hurried tone o full of apology---"untill we recieve further orders, it is still better that I s should ready dread them first to you."

So long as t he actual battle is written in the story in the two chapters back the unapparaled description of the christian army against the St Dominecans Fortifications should and wi ll stand u out as one of the most startling and romantic records. every detail connected with the astonishing episode from beginning to end was romantic even when it was most productive of every result. When it was related it always began with the description of the tall handsomely unformed uniformed generals, who hurled monsterous columns against the great fortifications.

First came the series upon series of desperate assau/ts assaults upon the rebel rifle pits, then the overwhelming assault upon the left of the main works, and of the two Angelinian generals who were killed, and the seriously wounding of the other five. Then come the fierce outbreak of a counter charge by the Whimsie and Growleywog Glandelinians and supporting turmoranians which which swept the Angelinian waves before them, then the eruption of great explosions on the great Krahl plains, and the Abyssinkilian brigades rushing from their works to drive back Mis-Hollester Jeh stome Insurrectees, and finding themselves newd down by the regiment and driven back to it their own works. Then the secret movi movements of general Vivians Calvinians, and Demdobian columns to the rear of the Glandelinian rifle pits, then the earth jolting cannonade of both sides with a hurricane of shrieking shells tearing all before them and ending with the partial disablement of the batteries of the both sides, and leaving devastation everywhere. everywhere. And then the recommencement of the bitter struggle for the rifle pits and the handfuls of men left out of a brigade for every assault.

Then the pressing forward ofan ormormous wave of Angelinians, and the terrific aslughter and the wounding and killing of many officers------and always their oaths remembered urging them on----on----and on.Then the strange incident of other high officers who leading on their gallant regiments or brigades died for their righteous causebut never forgetting that their successors must press on and be ready----even though victory may not be gained.

It is perhaps possible that the whole story of this battle alol lone would fill too many volumes to admitvof its even being described in full detail.But if this could have been a real true story, and these nations and this war would have been an absolute fact fact, history could have made the statements about the powerful Gemini clear, otherwise it would seem almost to cease to be history in spite of its efforts to be brief, and speak of only dullfacts when it is forced to deal with the Message of warning sent to general j Kindernine by violet and her sisters, and brought to him by two more boy-scouts, who seemingly to be blown as unremarked as any two grains of dust, from one christian camp to another gave Kindernine the warning, so that when the counter charging glandelinians almost had his rifle pits, as from the earth itself theresprang forth millions of fresh Angelinian soldiers, ready to repel them to the last------the furmerannians and other g glandelinians swept back all the distances they had won with the loss of their own rifle pits again, and only the Angelinian forces remaining in possession to d ory aloud in ardent praise and worship of god who helped them to take the rifle pits.The battle cry of His nn Name had ended every resistance on the part of the glandelinians at this portion of the battle line.

Swords fell from the hands of many of the glandelinian cavarly men in perfect and immediate surrender.The Growleywogs and Whimsies fled in terror and dismay, the fierce furmerannians resisting to the last manbut the main Fortifications held desperately to the last man and all day long, repualing and e shattering every christian charge.

Between night and morning as the officers had said, the standards of both sides time and again hadebeen brought forward and raised, and waved to and fro on the same works.From hilltop , through forest, and across the plains, and from rifle pits to riflepits, from snow fort to snow fort, and over and acrossthe frozen gunbeam Creek, pleughing through the deep snow, and over snow drifts General

general Hanson vivians army in series of miles long lines pushed forward in the facing faces of an annihilating fire to force an entrance into the rebel portifications.The enemy's fire was most destructive in the extreme.

Line after miles miles long was shot to pieces, brigades were reduced to regiments, the thousands of explosions almost bu i buried almost buried the fallen, brown and fallen and wounded soldiers staggered tothe rear by the legions in number, officers went down by the score, regiments were swept out of existance by the score, yet on the survivors pressed, but in vain six assaults like this were made, and with t he same result.After the fierce contest was over, large trainle ds of wounded miles long began to leave the christian lines for Jennie vivian, while the aid of general Robertson vivian upon Hanson Vivian was bestowed.

His divisions numerous and powerful at leasure to send forward any amount of troops to erect fresh batteries, to reminethe ground before their rifle pits would be able to pay all back to the enemy.General vivians armies in past battles had been strong enough to gain the greatest victories, and had therefore launched upon t he portifications of St Dominean such strong forces as any other warring country would have been glad to call upon.Therefore the reports about the results of this great struggle had been the wildest of all, the great milititudes of soldiers, and many of them wounded rushing tothe assault, while watching priests, and heart sick nuns, and child scouts kneeling in the snow praying as their one salvation and security, that they would march on to Glorious victory, but the chrigtian forces bat against the long ramparts in vain, after having driven the glandelinians from their entrenched positions and rifle pits on the front.The St Dominean portifications were much more powerful or more strongly defended than the Angelinian assailants believed, besides holding an extra position about three thousand feet south of the great portifications consisting of first and second lines of rifle pits,

Hansonthat full day had launched ten of the most heavy attacks covering them with an excellent drum, drum, fire of artillery.
Driven from their advanced positions the glandelinians retreated to join their forces within the defenses of the portifications.A terrific battle for the Portifications then followed.Ten times Hansons forces rushed forward but were repulsed leaving the snow for miles stream with their countless dead or dying.
pinally they smashed through and drove the rebel forces further back, but were repulsed again.

My god.My g-d''the witness shouted in dismay as they witnessed this sight.
My had even hoped that even there these who must die in the horrible battle would forget their pass sufferings, and that the survivors would bring back to their waiting comrades news that the Fortifications had been won.But no.Thus the bulletin of the battle, the reports of the shattered armies, and Hansen whose divisions had been torn t to fragments by the rebel fire was a disscrous discouraged and wanted torresign his command, but Emperor vivian would not hear of it.But upon the whole there is in Hansons military char acter something something t hat the enemy dreads.Angelinia Qrenburg having read all the recording details, whish had reached all the cections of the christian l ines not on-Aged in the battle reru returned to report almost verbatim, standing erect before Penrod, her her beautiful eyes flowing with defiance, and still filled with a rush of tears.Yet her graceful form seemed to have become rigid with significance.she even could not be made to sit down.Meeting the stranger in the passmessage she strode by him with an air so ferocious that he turned and ran hurried back to his hiding place, almost falling down the steps in his nervious flight.In such a night she was not a person for any suspicious looking man to face without something like awe.In the middle of the same night, and would hear him.
the Rattlesnake boy suddenly spoke to Penrod as if he knew that he was awake

''He has given all his life to Abbicannia.''he said.''Then yue traveled from camp to camp, and lived in holes and corners, it was because by doing it he could escape the most professional spies, and have intercourse with the most powerful.Gemini.No one not known by them, could have made them listen.Even Emperor vivian had listened when he had known hit him.And wait for the right time to speak.He was always able to keep still when other men knew not how to keep a secret.He even could keep his face still--and his hands--and his eyes.Now all Abbicannia----may all the world know what he has done, and that he is one of the greatest patriots of the world.We both saw what the Abbicannians were like, in that night in the Gominis headquarters.They will go mad with joy when they see his face.''

''They have seen it now.' said Penrod in a low voice from his bed.hen there was a long silence though it was not quite silent enough because the Rattlesnake boy was breathing so quick and hard that it was plainly heard.

''He must be having an interview with general vivian''he said at last.
''The Emperor----the Emperor what will the Emperor of Abbicannia do to repay him for his brave deeds?''

Penrod did not answer at that moment.The Rattlesnake boy could also hear his breathing. is mind was picturing the same interview, the probable shattered headquarters the ruins of the rifle p ts, the multitudes of kneeling femi e scourged rescued child slaves, theecountless numbers of battle worn wounded and bandaged soldiery.And the Emperor.and his foster father general Maldenia Greatheart.here had he stood after the conflict.surely he had stood at Emperor vivians right hand, and the soldiers had adored and acclaimed his bravery.

''The Great Emperor vivian.''he murmured as if he were in a dream.''Emperor
Vivian.''

The Rattlesnake boy started up on his elbow.

''You ought to have seen general Greatheart as I have seen him during the battle of Tetaria h''he cried out.''He made the greatest sight ever pictured.During t he battlewhen most of his troops had hurledthe enemy back into his works, a general order was issued all along the line that the works must be taken.The works appeared unassailable, but general Greatheart shouted to his officers!!!!!!

''Get your troops a-going forear forward and see who will be the first standard bearer who will heist the flag over the works.Of you o go, run like race horses.''

Seeing they hesitated, he grabbed a flag, and shouted;

''Come on you fraidy cats,I'll race you to the works.''

The officers did not need a third bidding but orderd their troops forward, at once.At the signal the whole line with a terrific yell made a general rush for the works.Yet for a moment there was a desperate struggle among the color bearers, for if one of the men succeeded in securing a flag, he was instal instantly seized by half a dozen others, who desperately struggled to wrest it from him that they might have the honor of first first planting it upon the rebel heights, while he struggled as furiously to retain it.All discipline seemed to be at an end.

The column of soldiers wild with ex i excitement and fury, were struggling forw forward under a seathing fire, while general Greatheart in the lead was almost beside himself for fear that his division would be behind, for the brigades and other divisions of other g enerals were also rushing forward, their color bearers bearing in their hands the flags with which they were also determined to plant upon the rebel works.I stood within full view of the scene looking down upon the long line of charging troops beneath my hidingplace, regretting that my wounded arm, which continued to pain me at intervals, prevented me from n entering the battle race as a competitor when I was aroused by a captians shout ing at me;

"Hey Radcliffe, I know you want to this flag boy."

I turned and found him holding out a flag to me.

"Certainly I'd like to have it."I answered."Thank you." q and seizing the flag I and a number of other boys sprang forward.At this moment general Mis-Cantler discovered me and shouted;

"Hey you little dare devil.What are you about.You'll get shot as sure as I'm living.It'll be the death of you of if you a mere kid attempt to follow after that race charge."

But I was excited and without waiting to answer sprang forward.I was shot and wounded immediately.General Greatheart seemed so anxious to be first that he ran with all possible speed.Crowds of soldiers from every division were falling as thick as crowds in a big citys streets before the enemy's terrific fire, but the color bearers no t yet struck were running at the top of their speed toard the works, all bent on planting their flag on the rebel works for the possession of which they were fighting so long and desperately.

But far in advance of the whole charge, I saw one of the Abyssinkilian officers .I was bothplessed and annoyed that this Abyssinkilian officershould have the honor of hoisting the flag over the rebel strenghold first, and annoyed that general Greatheart could not be the person who was to raise it.

But I soon realized it was not my disposition to be discouraged.I saw that general Greatheart was most determined to overtoo overtake the officer, and if possible to beat him if he was not shot down.As soon as he had covered half the distance he commenced running like the wind(if there is any) and was soon ahead of many of those who were far in advance of him when he started.....

The Abyssinkilian officer in the meantime meantime also proved that he had once been a racer, and the flag which he was carrying waved far ahead, dancing about among the swarms of running soldiers like a will-o-the-wisp seeming to recede as Greatheart advanced onward.

Soon he had passed all his competitors with the exception of this one, and the race was now between them.Atthis moment eighteen of the color bearers fell but others grasped the flags before they trailed to the ground and the race continued.On and on the two leaders ran.Greatheart soon discovered that he was gaining at every step.Few Presently he was so close to him that he could he hear his quick heavy breathing.They were both rapidly nearing the works and Greatheart redoubled his efforts.The Abyssinkilian did likewise.It seemed as if those flaming fortified works had infused new life in him for he ran at a rate that astonished himself.and Greatheart, and when the latter reached the works and planted the banner on the breastworks his rival lay on the ground ground mortally wounded by a round r shot.The troops swarmed up and the works were carried, amid long and loud cheers, who in their joy in seeing the flag planted on the fortifications by Greatheart, caused the Angelinians to forget all the sacrifices they had made to win the works.The works were won.It is a real fact, it is real.Penrod I don't believe you hear, or believe me.I can prove it by the vivian girls who also saw it."

A GREAT SURPRISE FOR THE TWO BOYS...

"THIS IS DO, I believe everything you say.''answered Penrod''but it is almost more of a dream than a real fact."

"and anot w another thing the greatest par patriot in Abbissannia is like an emperor himself.''declared the Rattlesnake boy.''If there is no bigger honor to give the Rattlesnake boy or general Great heart I mean, he should be made a great Prince,.or commander in chief, Prime minister, or chief guardian of the three Vivian girls.Can't you imagine you hear the armies of Abissannia shouting, singing, and cheering.?You can imagine that you see it all.Do you remember when general vivi n vivian said to you that a great day will soon come when he co ould show you to all his highest generals.It will come.He'll surely show them. and I know how they will like it.'' is voice suddenly dropped as if it had dropped into a deep pit.''You yourself will soon see it all.But I'm sure that I'll never see it at all.''

At this Penrod awoke from his dream and suddenly lifted his head.

''hy do you think so?''he demanded.Indeed it sounded like a demand.

''Because no one knows better than I that I cannot expect it.''groaned the Rattlesna e boy.''You have taken me a very longa long way, but I know none of the generals not even Greatheart, would allow you to take me to the headquarters of th the great emperor of Abbissannia.I'm not such a fool as to kick that---even of your foster father--''he broke off suddenly because Penrod did more than life lift his head.He sat upright.

''You served your country more than I ever did.''he said.''and we both bore the rog rigors of this fierce winter together in accomplishing our mission."

''ho would have listend to me with my bulldog like face?''criedthe Rattlesnake boy.''And you are the adopted son of general Meldonia Greatheart."

''ou were his second adopted son too''answered Penrod.''You want with loving willingess at the command of general Greatheart.You were as if you were my own army itself.''That I have always told you many times.Where ever I go you surely must go, and shall.But let us say no more of this--- not one word."

And he lay down ag in in an silence of an Emperor of the world.And the Rattlesnake boy knew that his friend meant everything that he said, and that general Meldonia Greatheart also wound mean it.

And because he was a boy he began to wonder what the gutt and Jaf f characters of professional spies would think or do when they heard what al had already happened---what had already been happening, that general Meldonia Greatheart had put in his time in his dingy looking headquarters and been closely watched le last he should go away and give them a chance to ransack his headquarters.The Rattlesnake boy saw himself standing erect, while he told the spies that it was in none of their affairs where general Greatheart was, or who he was, or whether he would be the friend of Emperor Vivian, or his daughters, or had been madexa commander in chief--or a Prime minister, cause there was no higher rank or honor to give him.and his adopted son--whom they had so cruelly insulted,was Abbissannia boy idol, because he had been so highly favored by the beautiful Vivian girls and also that if they are detected n and caught they will be facing the firing squad, and serve them right.

The next day passed and the next, extremely cold days indeed, and then came an officer bringing a note.It was from general Greatheart and when Angelinia Aronburg handed it to him, Penrod fearing it was bad news turned suddenly pale. However Angelinia Aronburg and the Rattlesnake boy went out of the room at once and left him to read the letter alone.

It was evidntly a very long letter addressed in the handwriting of general Greatheart himself, but written by Emperor Vivian himself.It was the first time in his life that Penrod had ever recieved a l a letter.from any important personage and so when he recieved this one from Emperor „ivian hewas surprised as well as almost embrassed.....He opened the envelo e and took out a large yellow sheet, the words being in red printing and in large letters.It ran as follows:::::::::::::

To Mas ter Marcocian Schoefield Penrod;
Commander of boyscout Regiment.
battalion.II..

In three a days hence, three general friends of Major general Greatheart will come as messengersto transport you and your companion to general vivians headquarters.You and the Rattlesnake are to come.Angelinia Aronburg will guide you t there.Greatheart will be waiting to recieve you, and also my daughters.

Your Friend, the emperor of Abbie-anna.
robert A gelisVivian.
Abbieannia.T. O.S .D.

In a few minutes Penrod returned, and called the boy and girl into his room. ''In a few days, generals, messengers,------friends of my foster father will come to take us to his headquarters.You and I, and Angelinia Aronburg are to go. with me''he said to the Rattlesnake boy.

''God be thanked.''Said Angelinia Aronburg.''''''God be thanked.''''''.

Before the messenger generals came it was close to the end of February.Angelin ia h Aronburg had prepared the provisions, and on that day a strange tall man with an ugly Gump face, and Neck, and gutt form was t o be seen hovering at the top of the steps leap leading up from the basement, especially when Penrod and the Rattlesnake left the back room to go out the front door.

''You are a pretty girl all dressed up in uniform and with your golden hair all about your shoulders, but just the same you do not need to glare at me.''he said to Angelinia Aronburg who stood glowering like a great phanter ne near the door which she had opened for them.''Young Master Penrod I want to know if general Greatheart will return.''

''He will not come back to day I'm sure.'' said Penrod.

''He won't won't he.''Well how about telling me where you are going.''said the tall man.''Your sister is packing up someprovisions I see. You three have not much to carry away but you won't pass through that front door untill I obtain the information I desire.People than can pack up privisions so easily think they can get away as easily, and kids like you be the most closest watching.The whole of general „ivians army is withdrawing from its position to day.''

Angelinia Aronburg wheeled and faced him with a furious haughty gesture.

'' Get out of this house, how dare you come in here sir.''she cried.''even get back down the cellar where you belong or some frim o come from and stay there. Look what is coming up to the house.''

A handsomely formed sleigh which was stopping, a very perfect sleigh of dark green, drawn by four horses.The drivers were uniform overcoats with gold liveries, and one of the drivers had leaped down and stood beside it with respectiful ceremony.

''They are friends of general Greatheart coming to pay their respects to their his son and hero''said she.''Are they to be offended by seei g you here?Get away from I here I tell you.''

''You'll get no information from me I can tell you that''said Penrod to the man.''You had better leave us before t they get here.''

The tall man gave a sharp glance at the sleigh, and the three handsomely unfir uniformed officers who had entered the gate.They were of an order that proved they were of an rank that even surpassed that of general Greatheart.They l also looked as if the sleigh and their uniforms were properties of the Emperor himself...

''At all events they are more important than two boys and a girl without a single panama.''he said.''If they are your fathers friends they'll be sure to give me the exact information and I can also find out whether my purpose is safe or not.'''

The three visitors were soon standing at the door.hey were indeed men of certain self contained dignity of type, and when Angelinia Aronburg opened the door they stepped into the shabby entrance hall as if they were too blind to see it.They lookedpast its strange homelinass, even past its dinginess and pass the tall stranger through him as it were at the two boys and Angelinia Aronburg.Penrod advanced toward them at once.

''you come from general Greatheart f my father.''he said and gave his hand first to the elder m n, and then to the two others.

''Ye we come from your father general Maldonia Ore Greatheart.We have been sent by emperor „ivian himself.I am Baron Radcliffe Antonio.This is present De Biff and the Duke of Lords.''said the elder man bowing.

''If they are Barons, and Counts, and Lords and Dukes, and such things and friends of your fathers and Emperor „ivian, they have been in the service long enough to be responsible for your welfare---''said the tall man rather flurrsely because he was somewhat overawed by their presence, and resented the final fact.''It's a matter of where general Greatheart is Gentlemen.I want to know when he is coming back.''

The elder general looked atbthe stranger with a swift cold suspicious glance.He did not speak to him but to Angelinia Aronburg.

''What in the name of Neptune is he doing here Gertrude ?''Hedemanded.

Penrod answered him.

''He wishes to see general Greatheart with the reason to obtain certain information.''he said.''He declares it is of the greatest importance to him that he should be sure.''

''Chase him away out of this place.''said the Baron to Angelinia Aronburg.He did not even glance at the man.He drew something from his inside coat pocket and handed it to the Girl here a heroin heroine.''Chase him out of the building.''

And because it seemed as if he were no longer a person at all the stranger actually shuffled down the passage to the cellar steps at the end.with her long knife drawn Angelinia Aronburg di followed him and she did not leave him untill she too had descended into the basement kitchen, where she stood before him like some infuri infuriated tigress.''

''To morrow he wi ill be on his way to Emperor „ivians headquarters you dis orable spy.''she said.''It was you and your companion who plaged Penrod in that barn, attic, ir hayloft, with the Rattlesnake.Before he goes it would be well for you to implore his pardon If I had evidence against you I would make you my prisoner.''

But the strangers viewpoint was not hers.He had reciv recovered some of his breath and breath

''I don't know where in the damnation Emperorer „ivians headquarters is you confounded raving iwild cat''he raged as he struggled to draw something from his pocket but was not successful.''But I'll warrent it is in the center of the National Line in such a little „irong foriegn spot you can scarcely on see it on the 1 worlds largest map with a star reaching microscope..or all I care he can go and see that Yankiocker as soon as he likes, so long he keeps his mouth shut before he does it.I've got here in my hand a vial of nitric acid, and if you attempt to arrest me, I'll hurl the contents into your pretty face, and destroy it.Emperor „ivian indeed.You talk as if he was the King of the wholeworld itself itself.''

NITRIC ACID.For a moment she was horrified, shocked.That kind of acid would destroy the clear pale skin of her face, leave hedious red scars where it had been touched.It works quick, and the pain it causes is so severe it overcomes the victim.Angelinia Aronburg had seen once when a young woman spy had been captured by Glandelinians.They tried to make her confess the things she had discovered, and the things she had learned. he was a very beautiful woman, more beautiful than any ever seen before.The wicked Glandelinians took advantage of this and after threatening one of them became enraged, took out a large vial full filled with nitric acid, dipped a sm small brush in it, and while o ne of them held her tightly with firm hand, the rascal despite her desperate struggles drew the brush across her white brow and her cheeks, and over her lips and on e nose.The acid burned as though bars of white hi hot iron had been lain across her skin.and where pale clear skin had been were now crimson welts most hedious and terribly disfiguring.Of all her excellent beauty that remained it was only that of her eyes.Tragically they an stared at the cruel rebel soldiers.No man Angelinia Aronburg believed could have been as cruel as these. She remembered when the agony of the eating acid grew so intolerable that the poor woman gave a shriek, and dropped fainting to the floor.The Glandelinians even r prevented medical aid from reaching her in time so that the deadly liquid had eaten deep almost to the bone.More human „landelinians taking charge of her did all they could, and that could then be done and bandaged and still unconscious she was taken to the army base hospital a martyr to the cause of Abbieannia.

Angelinia Aronburg had seen all this. She had also seen what had been revealed when those bandaged head has been taken off. he had seen the poor woman all swathed in bandages from neck to brow, and had wondered what horrible disfigurement would meet he eyes when these bandages were removed, wondering too whether it would be so great that all men would turn from her. This brought to Gertrude Angeline the fact that she was facing a very dangerous man down here in the cellar. he evidently was not at all pleased with the situation. he rascals frown was growing blacker and blacker, his retorts to her more and more curt and angry. At first, at the sight of that viril, she was both amazed and frightened. What could she do to frustrate him? what was the matte with these above. Why did they not come down and investigate her long stay.

She was soon enlightened however that he would not really hurl the acid at he her unless she tried to frustrate his escape.

"But what have I done that you should butt into my affairs" the stormed. "hy are you still standing there glowering at me like an angry trig tigeress. pe you defy me to throw it?"

"Because I recognize you as one of the professional spies who locked Penrod in the attic with the Rattlesnake." she cried. "And surely you would not dare throw that acid. You would die burning at the escape. Your escape would be utterly impossible if I was even only disfigured slightly. you would not, surely would not dare disfigure me, only a little girl and make me so hedious that every one should turn their a faces from me if you really know your horrible fate."

"YES. YES." he shouted. "Yes. Better that than to allow you to cause my capture. And for a little maddap you are too beautiful. I would like to see you shut up in some awful places to which I only have the key. your very presence drives me mad. I even know you. You are so strikingly beautiful that I'm surprised you are not requested to veil yourself heavily, when ever you appear in public in order that the number of your boy lovers and admirers do not interrupt the progress of the armies."

When a small party composed of two small boyscouts attended by a lovely little girl and three big officers, and accompanied by eighteen distinguished looking soldiers of a marked Abyssinkilian type appeared at the sirisleigh they attract ed immense attention among the crowds of soldiers. Indeed the way one of the lads carried his body so well, and his good looks with the thick black hair, would have caused thousands of persons in a moment to turn their eyes toard him even if he had not appeared to be regarded as so special a charge by the very important ones who were with him. But in the vast Abbiesnnian armies, all soldiers are unusually accustomed to seeing al manner and forms of persons even Foriegn, however young or old, who are set apart by the fortune of high rank and great distinction, and where the soldiers also rather enjoys the sight of such great demeanor, but this time it was inevitable that hundreds, may thousands of the look looker on with quich quick sight, started to comment on the fact that what they saw was not an ordinary group of individuals.

"ee that fine beautiful little girl over there with the two boys" said a Second Lieutenant. "she must be a Relation to the Vivian girls or I'll eat my hat. Take a good look at her." to the first lieutenant who was standing close beside him.

The officer took a long sharp look. The two lieutenants were of the descent polytechnic---educated type, and were very shrewd at any observation.

"Yes it's Angelinia Aronburg, the army's great little wildcat" he said. "I know her by sight."

Then he sized up Penrod. "He is some sort of a young boy scout". he summoned him up. "But he is not an Abbiesnnian by any means. He must be a young russian or a French or American lad come over to see the war or to join us. His face and body looks it. All but the chap with the bull dog like face. Wonder what he is?"

At this moment a guard with a good natured looking face, and who was now off duty was slowly passing, and the first lieutenant suddenly hailed him:

"Have we got any special boy scout officers traveling with us on the advance this morning" he asked jerking his head toard the group. "they look like it to me. Any boyscouts of high rank leaving our camps to cross over to general Viviens lines to day?"

The sentry looked with a curious expression for a moment and then nodded his head.

"They look like something more than you think." he answered. "There are very few that don't know anything about them. Every division is safe within our armies on account of them. They are Angelinia Aronburg, and Marce Schofield Penrod and his companion known as a "Rattlesnake" by the rebels."

An observer it is true could have mistaken Angelinia Aronburg for an ordinary attendant, escorting two firm boy friends. Yet she had refused to reveal much about herself. As it was she bore herself as if she was a grenadier instead of a little girl, and stood by the two boys as if across her dead body alone could any enemies appra approach the lads.

"Untill we reach general Viviens lines" she said with passion to the counts and the Baron---"Untill I can stand before my boy friends and also before general Greathsart and behold him embrace his son, and behold him, I'm determined not to lose sight of dear Penrod night or day. I had implored this favor of the Vivian girls on my knees to traveled armed at his side. I have made myself his guardidan and have no right to occupy the same place in the sleigh, but at their request I'm to occupy the same seat with them. I promished them I would be deaf, dumb, blind to all but himself. I have asked them to only permit me to be near enough to give my life it if if it need be. go when I return to them again, I will be able to tell them I never left him."

"you may do just as you desire" "said the Baron" and if you are so anxious you may sleep in the same room with him when we spent the ni night in some house or tent."

"I don't think I will sleep" said Angelinia Aronburg "I must watch. suppose there should be dozen spies of Manleys armies loose within the christian lines and infuriated in general vivians. he knows!"

"It is very seldo seldom that Abbisinian spies of the pur pure ursur iantans ever gi get within the christian lines. and those who succeed in doing so never escape." was the answer the Baron made her.

But neverph nevertheless Gertrude Angeline kept he guard unbroken. hen they would rest themselves in some generals headquarters at night she would occupy the same room with Penrod, and stood on f guard throughout the journey. hen they reached places where there would be an exchange of horses, she fol followed alone at the heels of the two boys her eyes at or on every side at once and her hand on the pistol in the hostler or on her dangerous knife hidden in her broad leather sheaf. or sheath. when they stopped to rest in some big tent she planted herself on a cot by the tent door near her two boy friends, and if she slept she was not aware that nature had betrayed herself in doing so.

And if the journey of the two boys had been a strangevenes beefrethis new o one was more strange by its very contrast.

throughout the first journey it would have appeared that two uncared for boyscouts in worn out uniforms had traveled from one camp to another mostly on foot, occasionally in jolting diligencies sometimes on broken down sleighs but more often on foot, by side roads, and within range of the rebel fortresses and forest ways in the face of fierce blizzard storms, and cyclonise windstorms.

Now two boys in handsome boyscout uniforms in the charge of splendidly dressed clothing of the class whose simplest orders are to o be obeyed, journeying with the most favorite fbgirl firned of the Vivian Girl Princesses in a sleigh belonging person lly to Emperor vivian himself, their traveling apputnappuntenances supplying every comfort that the military luxy luxury could provide to the emperor or his highest general. The Rattlesnake had even never known in his life that he or his companions would have the chance to travel in such a manner, that wants could be so perfectly foreseen, that generals soldiers, military police, and police could be by a seeming magic transformed into active and eager servants.

To have the chances to lean against the upholstered back of the sleighs carrage in perfect ease, and look through the small windows and at the late winter scenes outside, and then ti find find his beautiful girl friend at his elbow with her arm around him and Penrod, to have excellent meals appear at regular hours, no fierce storm to hinder them, and the weather only moderately cold, these unknown perfections made it n necessary for him at times to desperately pull himself toget her and give all his emag energies to believing he was quite awake. Indeed he was really awake and also had much on on his mind to work out, so much indeed that on the first day of the journey he had decided to give up the struggle and allow time for opportunity to make things clear to him, especially such things as he was allowed to underst understand of the mystery of his experiences. What the Rattlesnake boy realized most was the fact that the adopted son of general Greathrsar Great Great heroes was being escorted in private state to general Viviens lines and this was never a moment forgotten.

The Baron and two Co Counts were of the dig diginit y and courteous reserve which marks men of the greatest distinction. Pe rod was not a mere boy to them either, he was the son of a great and n famious christian general, and though he was a foriegner, and they Abbiesnnians, they treated him as if he was a kings son. They watched over him carefully, not in the manner that Angelinia Aronburg did. but with a strange kind of gravity and forethought which somehow seemed to encircle him with a rampart.

They even constituted themselves his loving attendants without any air of subservience. ll his best comforts, all his pleasures, even his entertainment, whe were this most private care.The Rattlesnake boy felt sure that either the Emperor or his beautiful daughters had intented that if possible he should enjoy his journey and that he should not suffer the slighrest fatigue.They do conversed with Penrod in a manner that the Rattlesnake had not known that men of high rank ever conversed with boys——until he had met general Greatheart. And indeed it was evidently plain that they knew what he would be interested in most and that they were aware he was as familiar with the history of Abbissnnia as t hey were themselves.When he showed a disposition to hear of events which had occured they were as prompt to follow his lead,as they would have been to follow the lead of the Emperor.That the Rattlesnake boy argued with himself was because Penrod had lived so long with his foster father, that from his training he had lived the life of a man than a mere boy, and general Greatheart had trained him in mature thinking.

Penrod appeared to be very quiet quiet during the journey, and it was evident that the Rattlesnake boy knew he was thinking all the time. he might before they reached general vivians lines they slept in a big tent in the outskirts of general Concentinian Aronburgs lines or camps some distance probably a mile from general vivianslines.

''o morrow ''said Penrod when the Rattlesnake had prepared to leave him for the night;''''To morrow we shall see general vivian, and my f ther.God be thanked.''

''God be thanked''said the Rattlesnake boy also.And each saluted the other before they parted.When Morning came Angelinia Aronburg made her appearance at Penrods beside with an air so strictly solemn that it seemed as if the garments she carried in her dainty hands were the commencement of some great Cathl Cathelic Religious Ceremony.

''I am at your command sir''she said.''And I bring you a new uniform.''

She carried in fact a ruchly decorated Abbissnnian unfire unfirom, and the first thing Penrod had seen when she came to his bed was that Angelinia Aronburg was in a new uniform too, her very own and her's was the uniform of a girl scout general.

''vialet and her sisters''she said''asked that you wear this on your entrance to general vivians lines.I have on my own uniform too, and one for your aide-de-camp.''

When the Baron and the two Counts appeared they were still in the same uniform.but they were uniforms which a had a touch of the Orient in their picturesque splendor and designs.A short furbordered, mantle hung w by a jeweled chain from their shoulders and their there was much magnificence in the embroidery and color and cold.

''sir we must drive as quickly as possible to the new sleigh carriage waiting for us.''''the Baron said to Penrod.''he crowds of soldiers at this part of the camp are getting very much excited and too patriotic and His Majesty and the vivian girl Princesses wishes us to remain hidden as mus much as possible, and avoide all the chances of a strong military demonstration upon us untill we reach general ivians lines.''

They passed rather r in a very hurried manner through the company street. to the carriage sleigh, which awaited them.And the Rattlesnake boy observed indeed that something very unusual was happening in the camps.soldiers were scurrying round street corners in swarms, and soldiers were coming out of their tents, or barracks, and even hanging out of the windows.As Penrod got into the sleigh carriage he suddenly caught sight of a boy scout a little older than himself who was peeping behind a big oak tree.suddenly he darted off, and Penrod alone saw him tearing down the company street tward general vivians lines as fast as his legs would carry him through the deep snow.But he was not able to beat the horses to it.The party quickly reached the outer limits and was escorted as quickly as possible to a place where a long special sleigh carriage awaited it.As the sleigh made its way out of general Con centinian Aronburgs lines, Penrod saw the same boy who had run before the sleighs rushed on into general vivians lines, waving his arms and shouting something with wild delight.

The many soldiers who were standing about turned to look at Penrod and the very next instant they had all torn off their caps, and thrown them up into the air and were shouting and yelling also.But it was not possible to hear what they said.

''We were just in time''Said Count De Biff and the Baron, and the other Count nodded.The horses ran as swiftly as the deep snow would pem permit them and stopped only once before they fairly entered general vivians lines.This was at a small section of the camp in whose company Streets stood lines of Abyssinkilian soldiers with big baskets of garlanded flowers and evergreens.

They put them on the sleigh carriage, and soon both Penrod and the Rattlesnake boy saw that something unusual was taking place.

''''Listen''''said Penrod suddenly, as the old carriage sleigh started on its way slowly and carefully through the deep snow.''They are shouting to us in Abbissnnian.''TheMessengers of the vivian Girl Princesses.The Bearers of the warning.''What is what they are saying to us now.''the Bearers of the warning.'' the Boy Friends of the Darlings of the Nat inn.''

They were being taken to general vivians headquarters.That was what the baron had said and explained.the Emperor wishes to recieve them.General Greatheart was there also.The main camp was majestic and noble.It was also somewhat Oriental in the fashion of the tents, just as the uniforms of the Angelinian soldiers were.Some of the tents had roofs almost like immense domes others were like those of a circus, and still of the ordinary fashion.They soon passed within sight of the distant works of Kindernines fortified positions.And in the emultant crowd of soldiers were to be seen haggard faces myriads of men with bandaged limbs and heads or hobbing on sticks or crutches or arms in sling, or bandages over an eye.the richly colred unir uniforms of every soldier were in rags.Many color bearers were there with their standards, but the flags were torn with bullets.But all the soldiers had the faces of creatures plucked from despair to be lifted up to heaven.

''Hurrah for the vivian Girl Princesses''they cried.''God bless their friends.''and sobbed with rapture.General Greatheart headquarters was a most wonderful building being a domed pillared structure of white stone and marble there were great ardhes toward the entrance way and a most handsome gate. some parts of the buildings were half in ruins on account of the recent battle especially from the shell fire. It was also half unroofed standing in the sunshine surrounded by the deep snow, still in all its disaster one of the most beautiful structures outside of vivian wickey proper.The immensely wide steps of marble were guarded by soldiers armed to the teeth.and the huge square in which it stood was filled with soldiers whom many of the guards held in check.

''' am he son of general Greatheart''Penrod said to himself as he descended from the stately sleigh carriage, behind the vivian girls, and began to walk up the stairs with them, the stairs seeming to be so enormously wide that they appeared almost like a street.Up he mounted step by step with the vivian girls, the Rattlesnake boy and the others following him.As he sturned from side to side to salute those who made the deepest obeisances.as he passed he began to realise he had seen their faces before.

''those who are guarding the steps''He sh said quickly under his breath to the Rattlesnake boy''Are the Members of the powerful Geminis there were to be seen the rich uniforms everywhere when he entered the generals Headquarters, and soldiers who bowed almost to the ground as the vivian girls led him and his followers forward Indeed Penrodwas a very young boy to be confronted with such an adoring adulation, and seemingly Royal Ceremony but he felt sure it would not last very long, and that after he had had knelt to the emperor and kissed his hand, he would see general Greatheart his foster father once more, and hear his loving voice.

Just only to hear his voice once again, and feel his hand on his shoulder.

Onward he was led by the vivian girls, through vaulted corridors to the wide open door of a ma magnificent room whose end seemed to be a very long way off.He entered as the vivian girls led the way.there were many richly dressed generals who stood in line as he passed up the canopied dias.The strain of excitement , the close presence of the vivian girls, now surrounding him, with two of them leading him by the hand made him appear to grow pale, and he began to have the feeling that he must be walking as if in a beautiful dream as on each side all the soldiers and the generals bowed low and even du curtisied to the ground.He realised vagually that the Emperor himself was standing awaiting his approach with his daughters in the lead.But as he advanced each step bearing him nearer and nearer to the dias the light and color about him, the strangeness and ma ma magnisicfence, the wildly joyish acclamation,of the crowds of soldiers outside the headquarters, and the presone of the vivian girls made him feel dazzled and he did not see clearly any one single thing or face.

''His Majest y is Awaiting you''said a voice behind him which seemed to be the Barons.''Are you Faint sir ,or Ill?You look rather pale!''

But Penrod drew himself together and lifted his eyes.After he had lifted them he stood for one whole moment quite still and straight looking into the deep beauty of the royal face.Then suddenly he knelt and k issed the hands of the emperor he held out to him, kissed them both with great passion of boy love and worship.Next to the Great emperor stod the general he had longed to see, the generals hands were those he had longed to feel again upon his own shoulder, for beside the Abbissnnian emperor stood his foster father, the great general Meldonis Greatheart who was probably one of the best Abbissnnian generals who had fought for and served Abbissnnian all his life sinc he had first entered the army, though f few knew him untill now.To Penrods surprise he stood on the Emperor vivians right side, a commander in chief.

At one time an officer standing on the narrow outside platform of the sleigh was plainly to be seen securing garlands and handing up flags to men who were working on the roof of the sleigh carriage.

"It's looks as if they are doing something with Abbiesmnian and Angolinian flags and alot of green things and garlands of beautiful flowers, mostly roses, Carnations and many others which it takes too long to name." said the Rattlesnake boy.

"Sir, I believe they are decorating the outside of the sleigh" said the Baron to Penrod. "All the soldiers and the officers obtained permission from Emperor Vivian and the Vivian girls, declaring that the son of general Greatheart shall not be allowed to pass their tents, or barracks, without doing homages."

"I understand everything now" said Penrod his heart thumping like a trip hammer in his breast. "It is for the sake of general Greatheq Greatheart, my father and for the sake of the Vivian girls."

At last the carriage was embowered, and beautifully garlanded, and hung with hundreds of brilliantly colored flags, and thus handsomely decorated, the carriage sleigh finally drew in at the chief section of the center of the christian lines.

"Sir Boyscout" said the Baron as the sleigh drew up into the main Company Street. "Will it please you to stand up that the crowds of soldiers will see you more plainly? Those on the outskirts of the crowded soldiers will have the merest glimpse, but they surely would never forget."

Penrod obeyed, and stood up like a young boy prince. The Rattlesnake and the little girl and the others groupes themselves behind him. Then there rose suddenly a most tremendous uproar of voices, which ended in an almost earsplitting roar or shriek of frenzied joy, which was like the shriek of an Abbiesmnian Ty-h Type T yphoon Tempest on the Calverinian Seas. This was accompanied by loud volleys of musket shots, the firing of pistols, the waving of countless flags, the tossing of hats into the air, and the booming of distant cannon.

Then there burst forth the loud blare of brazen instruments, playing the National Hymn of Abbiesmnia, and countless mad voices joined in it as loudly as t hey could. If Penrod had not been a boy of strong will and nerve, he would not have been able to bear all he saw and heard. When the carriage sleigh i finally came to a full step in front of general Vivians headquarters, an and the door was the thrown open, even the boy's or the Barons dignified voice was unsteady as t hey said:

"Sir lead the way. It is for us to follow."

And Penrod arose! in the carriage doorway, stood for a full minute looking upon the roaring, aclaiming, weeping, singing and swaying multitude--And saluted just as he had saluted the Emperor, looking just as much a boy just as much a man, just as much a thrilling young human being. Then at the sight of him standing so erect, it seemed as if the crowds of soldiers went completely mad--as the Gemini had seemed to go mad on the snowy night in general Kindernines main headquarters. The tumult rose and rose with a most tremendous noise, the crowds of soldiers rocked and leaped, and in its frenzy of emotion threatened to crush itself to death. But for the lines of guards there would have seemed no chance for any one to pass through the surging mass alive.

"I am only the adopted son of general Greatheart" Penrod said to himself in order to hold himself more steady. "I am on my way to my father."

Afterward he was slowly moving through the guarding sentries to the entrance where two great stately army carriages stood, and outside waited even a huger and more immenseer friendsed crowd than that left behind. And to his surprise as well as awe, there in the most stately carriage sleigh what appeared to him seven most beautiful creatures in lavender uniform dresses. He saluted there again and again, and again on all sides. It was what he had seen the Emperor do. He was not the Emperor but he was the son of general Meldonia Greatheart, who by a warning had saved general Kindernines army from destruction and defeat.

"You must salute to them too" He said to the Rattlesnake boy when they got into the carriage sleigh with t he vivian girls. "Perhaps Emperor Vivian has already told them. It seems as if they knew you well."

The Rattlesnake boy had been placed beside him on the seat of the carrgage carriage sleigh. He felt much a rapture of exultation of being allowed to sit in the same carriage with Violet and her sisters, that he inwardly shuddered. It almost gave him anguish. He believed Penrod felt the same way also. And the crowds of soldiers and officers were looking at him—— shouting praises at him!—surely it seemed like it when he looked at the faces in the nearest part of the crowd. Perhaps general Greatheart—"

It was not that night, nor even the next nor for other days and nights that the telling of the story was fully completed. All the soldiers knew that their general Greatheart and his adopted son were rarely seperated from each other, that the suit of apartments for Penrod were connected by a private passage with general Greathearts. Indeed the boy and the general were bound together by an affetion of singular strength and meaning, and their love and respet for the soldiers added to their loving felings for each other. In the History of what their absolute pass past had been there was indeed a romance which swelled the emotional hearts of the Abbiesmnians near to the bursting point. By thousands of great camp fires, in tents and army barracks, under the stars in the fields camps, and forest fortifications, all that was known of the brave boy and his foster father, and the great favor of the Vivian girls for them, was t old and retold a thousand times with sobs of joy and prayers breaking in upon the tale. But none knew it as it was told in a certain quiet but stately room in general Vivians headquarters where the soldier whose known as only general Greatheart, but whom the Angolinian History would call the first major general of the Abbiesmnian armies, told his share of the great battle to the boys, whom the Abbiesmnians had a strange and superstitious worship for because he seemed so surely like a young broubrother of the the Vivian girls restored to them in body and soul. Some of them even believed that when he stood in the sunshine there appeared to be a halo i on topof his head.

It was a most wonderful and intense story about the battle of the St Dominean post fortifications, that of the commands of long duration, the extensive lines of wild assu assault, and of his saving Kindernines rifle pits from being taken by the counter charging Landolinians, and of the close hiding of the d dange dangerous secrets. Among all those who had known that a general who was an impassionate par patriot was o sacrificing his army to save Kindernines from destruction, and using all the power of a great mind and the delicate ingenuity of a great genius to compell the rally of panic stricken troops, the quick hasty mending of breaks, and save the army of his unhappy co n country from a disaster too complete, and from which they would never recover there had been but one who had known that general Greatheart had a claim to a higher rank.

He had made no higher claim, he had sought——not a higher rank—— —— but the safty of Kindernines position of which love for the general had been like a regio religion.

"I asked for no higher rank" he said to the boy generals generals as they sat at his feet like two school boys——not a higher rank. The life of my life for God, and for Abbiesmnia. That was why I saved general Kindernines army, for that we all should do. If there had come a wiser man in Kindernines time of need it might not have been for me alone to rush to his rescue. Though of course I could not have remained out of the squabble. But no, other division was near enough. If I had failed to do my duty our seige of Vivian wickey would have been tri crushed. The crucial moment arived. As I came up with my divisions everything was in great confusion, Kindernines troops streaming to the rear like stampeding sheep. I could see the immense Landolinian columns coming like an immense tidal wave. It was the 1 flower of John Manleys army. I threw my divisions in his way, Kindernine rallied, and Manley was swept back all the distance he had come." He put his hand on the thick black hair of Penrod's head. "There was a thing of which we never spoke of together" he said. "I believe always that the Vivian girls have bitter fears for you and t and the undying strains of them. The Vivian girls are very young and loving, and love you very much, and fear often when you pass from them that they would never see you again. When they had been to see us they begged me to promish that your boy hood and youth should not be burdended by the knowldiege they had found it so terrible to bear. I should have kept this secret from you even if they had not so implored. I for one had never meant that you should know the truth untill they told you themselves. If I died from battle or from sickness a certain document would have been sent to you as soon as possible, and which would explain all to you. You would have known then that you were to be chosen to a higher command of boy scout troops who must take up his country's burden and be ready when general Vivian called. I tried to help you to train yourself for any kind of task. And you never, never failed me either."

"Your Excellency" said the Rattlesnake boy" I began to suspect the truth and felt sure that it might be true about the friendship of the seven Princesses that night when we were with them in general Vivians headquarters. It was the way they looked so lovingly at his Excellency general Penrod."

"Just say Penrod" he requested. "It's easier. He was as good as if he was my army father."

General Greathearts grave eyes melted.

''I Yes just say Penrod''he said''You were indeed like his army--and when we both needed one, you were more.It was you who helped Penrod give general vivian and Kindermine the timely warning.''

''Thanks your Excellency.''said the boy Radcliffereddening scarlet.''You do me the greatest honor.but he would never let me wait on him when we were traveling.He said we were nothing but two boy scouts.I suppose that's why it is so hard to remember everything at first.But my mind went on working untill sometimes I was afraid I might let something outat the wrong time.When we went into general Kindermines main headquarters where the members of the Gemini were gathered, and I saw them go mad over him---- I felt sure it mustbe really true.But I did not dare speak.I knew you meant for us to wait, and so I waited as pait patiently as I could.''

''You are indeed a most faithful friend.''said the general.''and you have already obeyed orders.t'

A very great and beautiful full moon was sailing in a cloudless sky that clear cold night.by a clearer light of this late winters night splender drew them nearer the balcony also--- looking out on a broad field covered with snow.the pure radience of the moon fell upon all they saw spread out before them, the lovely but half ruined fortifications of the great ensame encampments of Kindermines distant works, the great tents and the splendid ghostly appearance of the snow covered evergreen trees, whose high forms towered into the sky. they stood for a long time and looked at the beautifuly scenery and there was a great still mess in which all the world might have ceased its breathing.

''what next?''''said Penrod at lastspeaking low and in a quiet tone.

''hat next father.''

''Great incidents in this war will xome one by one.''said general Greatheart.''Ir wehold ourselve at a readiness.''

Penrod turned his face from the lovely bright lan winter scenery and put his brown hand on his fathers arm.

''Do you remember the day I attempted to enter the enemy's fortifications'' he said.''Father you remember''.?''?

General Greatheart was looking far away but he bent his head.

''Yes the time may come when you willenter with us.Can you believe it?''

''Yes''said Penrd Penrod.''and so can my assistant.We have suspected it a hundred times.We believe good things will happen bye and bye.and if vivian wicky y is ever captured by general Mansion I'm sure Glandelinia's wicked rebellion will be crushed.''....

THE BOYS RUN INTO ANOTHER BIG SNOW STORM.
THEY ARE ALSO ATTACKED BY GLANDELINIANS, AND HOW THEY ESCAPED THEM!!.

DESPITE THE FACT THAT the Abbieannian, and Angelinian armies had ined considerable adventages along the Sun beam Creek, and near Jennie Vivian,, ey had failed to make a dent in general Mis-Wellester Hes lines at any other int.he portifications of St Dominean had held out, general vivians army was riously crip led, and Hanson had refused to make any further attempts on the al lines without proper support.

The Evangelinia grania blunder, which prevented Hanson ivian from ut uring the fortified heights ofvThumbelinia and caused the salugh er of twenty illion of is his best men in half a day made it seem probable that it was just impossible to capture the besieged city from that quarter.however large inforcements had arived, from the Mobolisation camps at perothy Gale City and o Angelinia A'athia, and the armies were strenth strengthened.The divisional itions of his armies which had made grand advances since December, still ained the positions they had captured, while those who had been repulsed ained in their old positions..

was now general ivian's purpose to move his main armies forward by sheer rce, but at St Dominean lay in the way and extended for fourteen miles in ries of fortifications and fortresses and earthworks and millions of rifle its and as it was found unassailable he decided to try his l s luck on the mush rer portifications called Adelaside Aurandecallie.These portifications were re less extensive than the St Dominean, but treacherously built.On the outirts there were long high palasades making the appearance of stockades that the allest cannon could batter down.but beyond this wall thirteen hundred feet beyon were countless hidden rifle pits, six foot deep and sixteen miles long, made the fashion of the trenches used in the late world war.These besides those defending the palasades could hold more than a million rifle men.Beyond the rifle its were a seried line of abatis and defenses formed of wagons, all kinds of chijery millions in number, barb wired fences, and other materials manned great machine guns that were manked.Beyond these last of all were the main sitions, treastworks thirty feet high, and defended by ten thusand cannon all sizes but very large and long range guns.

Under the ground but safe to its defenders only were as many adly mines as tyere were numbers in artillery.On the outside it looked very sy to capture.It was in one way easy to capture.The enemy intended it to be. t inside it was a gigantic trap.10,000,000 garrisoned this apparent stockade nder general Commondon Nicknell.

w that he had been made a higher commander of the boy scouts, Penrod also feared at general Greatheart who also rose in rank would be one of these ordered to sault these unassailable and treacherous works.He felt sure of their treacherou haracter, but the works were unapproachable for scouting parties of any size, d even spies could not enter.Yet Penrod being a boy had the ways of an American dian and he determined to do what he most shrewd Angelinian generals and other fficers declared impossible.And he only took the Rattlesnake with him though e had ordered his regiment to be where they could come to his aid if needed.

K owing the way,to the immense fortificationa, and that the easiest approaches re by the Worm un river but tward the north Bend or Delight's junction, and ing overdone with the desire and the welvfare of the christian cause prompt g him to go, he consulted neither of the generals, nor even send them word of , neither consulted the weather conditions, but leaving them to hear of it , as they might, defying the threatening elements as a hurricane was rising, d having no consideration of circumstances or consequences, and in al ill ur on the twenty first of Feburary he started out with his companion on foot, in spite of the fierce wins windstorm thenraging.

Never in all their own experiences had misfortunes be an sconer for the brave vivian girls than it did for these two boys.It was not the enemy it was the weather.They had no cos sconer started out when a Feburary hurricane and blinding blizzard of the wildest fury, beyond description broke loose.As the storm continued, the windobegan to rise in the most r frightful manner, the clouds grew heavy making it quite dark, and though the two boys had been caught ut in great winter storms before they had never been caught in such a storm as this.The force of the wind they had to face made the boys inexpressibly sick this. sick in body, they had to support themselves with long sticks to keep from being blown down, and the roar of the wind through the twisting writhing trees, and the falling of trees, and blizzard of branches mingled wityh the flying snow almost terrified them.

After they had dared to face the storm and continued on for an hour in the greatest difficulty the fury of the wind increased steadily, making it almost impossible to proceed any further, and the snow fell at the rate of five inches an hour, and they could not see thirty feet ahead of them.Now as the storm grew insane the boys began to think of finding shelter if they wished to save their lives..However theycontinued to work their way forward through the deep snow, holding on to great objects between each wild squall of wind, or taking protect on behind a great stone, untill near noon time, cold and wor worn out, but yet found no shelter, and it was almost as dark as night.

And by thistime though the blinding fury of the snow storm had slackened o considerably the wind was very furious and and strong indeed blowing doubly as fierce, trees were falling every minute by the score, and er ernormous snow flakes as big as ostrich feathers began to fall with the finer flakes.The wind was screaming like a thousand demons/ and making all the well known sounds of a great tropical typhoon or hurricane of the West Indies and blowing equally as strong.Being able to at least see a house in the far distance the boys made tward it as fast as the deep snow would allow them, but made such slow progress, that it was two o-clock before they reached it, being beaten and thrashed by flying branches and knocked down by boughs all the time.

Their situation was terrible but they finally reached it, though both boys were injured considerably.By this time it was a most terrible storm indeed, the wind blowing a howling tempest, while now even the big flakes fell so thick that objects fifty feet away were dimly seen.And thewind was blowing with such terrific force that each bow could see terror and amazement in each others faces.What if it was the beginning of one of those terrible Typhoons they had heard about that sometimes strikes the Calverinian shores with such dasor a disasterous effects.Tward three o-clock the boys had a rearing fire in the hearth, but the shrieking wind was shaking the house so much that the boys became alarmed.

Penrod decided at last to bar the windows believeing if he did not, the windows would be blown in.

And o me must believe what a condition the boys must be in at all this.Tward night, and to add to all the rest of their distresses, a sudden frenzied gust of wind howling like a mob of wolves ble blew the door open with a resounding crash that shook the building, and prostrated the boys to the floor on their backs from the vibrations.A thick cloud of snow poured in.It took all the strength of the two boys to close it again, and once it was blown in open with them holding it, and both make to an unsuccessult over the entire floor.And finally as they got it closed Penrod said as he nursed a bleeding nose;

''I'm afraid we'll be snowblind snowbond snowbound.It looksxas if there is four feet of snow on the ground already, if it is not only a snow drift.''

''And the cyclone and snowstorm shows no sign of abating.''gasped the Rattlesnake.

The boys worked desperately to keep the door closed, but every now and then it would fly open in a manner as if it mea meant to fly through the building from its hinges like a bird.

The fury of the wind was increasing so that the two boys feared the house would soon be giving them a ride above the earth, but nevertheless it was apparent that the snow storm itself began to abate a little, though thewind reared like thunder through the masses of still remaining trees.

Yet as it was not possible for the boys to go out through that deep snow alone even if the storm would come to an end, they shot off their guns for help, but they were not heard.And far in the distance during a moments lull in the screaming cyclone the boys heard dreadful noises, like the barking, rearing, and howling of millions of creatures of they knew not what kind.It was the storm doing that in the distance where the wind was blowing its wildest but the boys at that moment were not sure of it.So great was this strange noise that the boys felt they were ready to die with fear, for they never in their lives, heard such howling and yellings.

''Maybe it's the storm doing that.''gasped Penrod.

But his companion for a time did not believe it to be so.He was as dreadfully frightened as Penrod, and both were more frightened when they imagined hedious creatures coming in by the doors, such as wolves or other animals/ Indeed it was impossible to describe the horrid noises and hedious cries and how lings that were raised in the distance with every fierce squall of wind. They finally knew it was the noise of the gale, and this convinced the boysthat there was no sleep for them that night, and how to venture out in thecday in such deep snow even if the storm was gone was another question too for to have fallen into an unseen snow bog would be as bad as to have fallen into quick sand.

a litt le while a ter this the storm apparently reached its o worse, and during the remaining hours of the night the boys expected every minute to see the house go to pieces about their ears, nor did they expect to save their lives.

Toward morning the storm abated the lill little, proably a lull, and the boys made an observation of the scene as best as they could, and found that the snow actually really lay four feetvin depth now, and that they had been mistaken as to the depth in thevnight.Now they began to cul consult on what they should do for the house was shaky, and very much torn by thestorm though it had been a very extra streng building, and solidly bui lt.

The Rattlesnake boy was for going direct t o the lines, but Penrod was positively against that, for he was resolved to remain untill the storm fully abated, and then to make the way back on snowshoes, which they might easily perform, as they hoped in about ten hours, whereas in the storm they could not possibily make the trip through such deep snow without some assistance, both on the part of the Angelinians and to themselves. With this design they prepared to start out in order to reach the nearst section of general Avians lines where they hoped for better shelter, but their purpose was was frustrated, for the second sex section of the storm came upon them.The wind being from the northeast before, newschanged to the northwest, and then west, and then southwest, but blew with the same impetuou l up impetuousity as when at its worse but was coming more sudden, and drove the two boys back into the shelter of the house.

In this distress the wind b,ew blowing harder th n than ever now Penrod suddenly cried out''My god there goes a big Hemlock tree, we're goners''and he and no sooner shouted this when the Rattlesnake ran to the window to look out in the hopes of seeing whereabouts in the world they were when the great Pine tree in falling, struck the house with terrible force, wrecking it was the crash of a loud explosion, and in another moment the wind blew in such a manner that the boys expected they would perish immed immediately as wreckage of all descrk description came down near where they stood.

The boys did not even know in what part of the country they were, and thos could not so much as hope to see their broken shelter hold together minutes longer without being torn in pieces unless the winds by a kind of miracle should slacken in its terrible force.

Nevertheless the two boys managed to go to a more secure part of the shelter, and committing themselvrs to the Mercy of god and the wild Bt Blizzard hurricane waited for another lull in the cyclone.

After they had waited for about half an hour a raging wave of falling snow driven horizontally by the shrieking wind came rushing past like a dense cloud, hiding objects completely at the distance of twenty feet.At the same time the wind blew with such an increased fury that it threatened to p tear the house to pieces it seme, as sections gave way at some part every now and then.

Though the boys were in the new shelter of the house they could not escape from some of the cold wind, and they felt almost breathless with surprise at the rate the snow was now coming down, but after four hours of insane fury of wind and uproar of the elements this snow wave spent itself suddenly, and the air became so clear that objects could be seen plainly at a hundred yards or more.

Believing that the blizzard of the hurricane had let up quicker than they expected the boys got upon their feet and endeavored to see how far they really were from the camp, desiring to start out before the storm broke loose again, but they soon found it was still dangerous to go out, for they saw another snow wave coming forward as thick as an immense white smoke cloud.

This wave of snow that came from the clouds fell at such a rate and lasted so long that the boys feltvalarmed and feared the house would be buried, the wind blowing now with a mighty force, and driving the snow before it in great clouds.

The ground was covered half a foot deeper with snow now, but this did not seem to deliver the country from the fury of the storm, the snow came pouring down th still as thick, and twice more the boys felt sure the wind would deprive them of their shelter.

The recent greatsquall of wind had well nigh been fatal to their shelter, for the gale dashed ag another tree against the building, caving in more of the upper section of the structure, but the boys recovering a little from the effects of the shock, and resolved to remain where they were untill the terrific storm should spent itself.Now as the snow was not falling so fast as at first, the boys had expectations thaw that the storm would soon abate.But no hope.

However thewind had abated considerably, and therefore the boys began to look up and thank ed for sparing their lives in a case where in there had been some m n minutes before scarce any room for the slightest hope.

After the storm had abt abated a little more, the boys began to look round them to see what kind of a place they were in, and what was next to be done, and they soon found their hopes turned to despair for they were cold, had no heavier clothes on, no fuel or anything to eat and drink, neither did they see any prospects before them, but that of perishing of cold and hunger, or being devoured by wolves. They had nothing but their weapons and ammunition. There were snowshoes in the place but they were man's size. Night would soon come again, and the boys began with heavy hearts to consider what be their lot if any of the savage Mandelinians came upon them on snowshoes. All that they could think of at that time was to get into the upper sect ion of the unwrecked portion of the structure where they resolved to remain all night, and consider what to do the next day if the storm was over.

Now just as they had been deciding on their plans, they almost had their very lives scared out of them at once and narrowly escaped being killed. They were terribly frightend indeed with a most dreadful surprising thing for all of a sudden in the far distance there was a v olcanic sound and din, and the boys found the plaster came tumbling dow down from the ceiling and two of the walls cracked in a frightful manner, while the wind suddenly came on with an uproar that was deafening. They ran forward to another room, and not thinking themselves safe there either, rushd outside almost burying themselves in the deep snow drift to escape the frenzied force of the wind. They were no sooner outside than they pla nly realized it had been a great wind squall raging so fiercely even as to somewhat produce an minhute earthquake shock of great force fo the ground even appeared to shake at the uproar of the storm, and with such a shoc cas would have overthrown the strongest building in the world if it had lasted long enough.

Both of the boys were stupified and the noise of the wind, and the secondary motion of the earth made their stomach sick like sea sick travlers.

After the shock was over and the wind squall had ag abated to its normal fury, and the boys heard no more such uproar for some time they began to take more courage, and yet though they had not the heart to go into the building again they had to nevertheless, for the wind arose again so that in less than half an hour it was again blowing the mightiest hurricane.

This continued for about three hours more, , and it was snowing harder as ever. All this while they remained inside their shelter very much terrified, dejected and discolculate, when on a sudden it came into their thoughts that when they aft awful earthsk earthshaking wind equl squall came the storm had probable l reached its worse and highe highest sts stange stage.

This encouraged them somewhat but yet the wi l was now again becoming so violent that again the house was threatened with ruin, and they were forced to go into their inner shelter though very much afraid 't also would fall on their heads.

It continued snowing fiercely a long time after t a that but with much less thickness, but the weather was becoming colder. The boys decided to wait untill morning, concluding that they must try th s the snowshoes no matter what their sizes were.

It continued snowing at a wild flurry a great p part of the night, but the boys were sleeping by the hearth, but when they awoke the next morning they saw the storm had stopped but the sky was dark and gray, and the weather terribly cold. But it was still windy, now from the northwest. And five and one half of foot of snow had fallen on the level depth.

That day however Penrod felt quite ill and shivering, being the effects of the exposure, the weather as I ment ioned before being very cold. Penrod had not been able to rest or sleep the last night of the storm, and he had violent pains in his head and was very feverish. Therefore both remained in the shelter all that day, the Rattlesnake boy ministering to his wn wants.

The following day also dark and cloudy but not stom stormy, Penrod was very ill and frightened almost unto death, with the fears of his sad conditions, to g be sick and no help, and therefore he prayed to God more than he ever did in his life before but scarcely knew what he was saying, this thoughts being all confused.

Toward evening he felt a little better, but the weathe r had become much colder and they were compelled to remain a little over night, and the following morn ingwhich was still dark and unsettled in t he weather he was very bad again. But again toard evening he felt somewhat better, but found himself very weak, and for half an hour had a violent attack of the ague so severe that he lay abed and neither ate nor drank.

If it was not for the care of his faithful companion Penrod felt he would h ave been ready to die of cold and thirst for he was so weak he had no strength to either stand up or get himself any water to to drink.

Penrod being desperate prayed all the harder, crying out;;;;;;"Lord Jesus, look upon me. Lord Jesus, have pity on me. Lord Jesus have mercy on me."

He did nothing else for tw o or three hours till the fit wearing off he fell asleep and did not awake untill far into the night. When he awoke he found himself refreshed but weak and exceedingly hungry, cold, and very thirsty but as he still li his comrade gave him some mlted snow. At this time as Radcliffe was standing by the window he saw in the direction of the horizon a rolling black cloud of smoke singledwith a bright flash of fire, and there came a report like an explosion that stunned him and the earth shook shook again.

Then it appeared the sky in the horizon was all over as bright as a flame that so that he could just bearto look upon the scene, everything alon the horizon appearing to be most inexpressibly dreadful, impossible for any amounts of words to describe, then again there was a roaring crash, the ground again trembled just as it does in an earth quake and all thwair lookedto his apprehension as if h it had been filled with great flashes of fire. The sounds that followed the two crashes was so frightful and terrible yh that it was utterly impossible to express the feelings of the two boys.

Neither could I be able to describe the horrors of the boys souls at this terrible vision so early in the morning. Even it would be beyond any ones power to describe the impression that remained upon them afterwards.

"Wow" said the Rattlesnake boy aloud—"The warning of the yivian girls are come to pass, t he too great a perils, have overtaken us and we have none to hear or help us, and we are snowbound, far from the very christian lines. We rejected the w warnings of the yivian girls that a gre t storm would come and interfere without with our purpose. We left the camps only to mourn over our folly, and under the consequences of it. We foolishly refused their help and assistance in our adventure, and now we have i difficulties to struggle itwith too great for even nature itself to su pport, and no assistance from the outside, no help, no comfort, and facing starvation as long we remain here.""""

Then he cried out aloud!

"Lord Jesus, be our help, for we are in great distress."

This was the most urgent prayer, if I might call it so that he had made for many years. Having been somewhat refreshed with the sleep he had had, and the fit of illness being entirely off, he got up at last, and then through th the frightful terror of the scene was very great, he did what he could to overcome it, and the weather being warmer, and the sun shining they decided to ake the chances and venture out in the big mans size snowshoes, or remain where they were and face starvation and exposure.

Therefore as the sun was shin shining brightly and it was not quote so cold, the two boys put on the large snow shoes, there being two pairs in the house (how do I know) and started out. Their progress on account of the over sized shoes was slow and difficult but thry were able tomake it over the deep snow without mishap.

It happened that after they had been out for more than an hour, and had traveled only half a mile they were exceedingly surprised to hear the sound of ten shots from the distance to their right, and bullets to whistle dangerously close to them. The boys quickly threw themselves between two stout trees, and there stood with thir pistols drawn, being thunder struck and feeling as if t he y had seen some ghost.

They listened for the sounds of the shots again, they looked around them, but could hear nothing more, nor see anything whatever, they carefully climbed up a pint or Hemlock tree to see further, they went to the very top, but it was of no use they could see nothing, and yet just now the shots were not repeated. and they had seen no smoke to shew whee the shots came from. They came down and dared to go out into the open once more to find out if the hidden snippers would open fire again, but no shots came.

At first the boys believed it might have been their fancy, but then it was not for they had exactly heard the shots, and the whistling of the bullets, and from whence they ca came they knew not, not could they in the least imagine.

But after innumerable thoughts like two boys perfectly confused, and out of their recollection, they slowly continued on their way toward the christ ian lines, terrified to the last degree. All the while they labored on they formed nothing but dismal imaginations to themselves.

Sometimes they fancied it must have been bees some foragingparty taking them for some kind of game, and reason joined in with the two boys upon this suppositio for how could they resemble anything else at a great distance to men.

But then to think that a party of Mandelinians should mistake two boy scouts for game in such deep snow as this, where there could be no manner of occasion of it, for no small game could go through the deep snow and yet to be fired on, and that for even no offense at that was an amusement in another way.....

Penrod easily argued the Rattlesnake boy out of all facts of the shots, being fired by Angelinians and both boys presently came to the conclusion that the shot musthabe been fired h by some hidda glandelinians or scoodler marksmen who may have also wandered out on sh snowshoes on a fr forage of their own, and.either fired on the boys with murderous intent, or mistook them also for game. hile these reflections were rolling upon their minds, they were very thankful in their thoughts t hat they were so lucky as not to have been struck by the bullets, or that the snip pers did not have the windage to aim as perfectly well asthey had desired to do.

- Then terrible thoughts started to rake their imagination about the glandelinians having observed them, and discovered they were boy scouts, that they may have learned something about the intentions of their general, and that if so, they should certainly come up in great numbers and capture and kill them, and that if they should not find them, they would nevertheless make it impossible for them to ever get back to the christian lines, or find shelter or food, and the boys should perish from exposure and want. Thus the fears of the two boys banished all their hope, all that former confidence of saftyly reaching the christian lines.

While the two boys were filled with these thoughts about their danger from the appearance of glandelinian snipers, they found it discompased them very much, untill Penrod suddenly thought of these words!!

"Call upon Me in the day of trouble. I will deliver three, and thou shalt glorify Me."

Upon this Penrods heart was not only comforted but he was guided and encouraged to pray ernestly to god for deliverance from the unseen foes.

Andcit is impossible to express tths comfort this gave him. and then in the middle of these rel reflections it came into his thoughts that the shots may have been fired by some signal squad. He considered that the men could tell by no means for certain where the bullets would go, and toward where they had been aimed and that if this was the truth, he and his comrade had played the part of those fools who write stories of specters and apparitions, and then are more afraid than those who read them.

Now he began to take more courage and felt like laughing over their foolish fears, when all of a sudden there came the sound of shots again.

Andthey were much nearer. hen this occured, it appeared evident to the two boys that the moment they left the ruined shelterthey made themselves too conspicious to be mistaken for small game, secondly, when they came to be fired on a second time, the truth loomed up for sure.

They were being tr iled by the Glandelinian snipers. Both these things filled their minds with new imaginations yet, but they continued on again filled with the belief that they were persued by rebel soldiers on snowshoes.

Now they began to sorely repent of having left their shelter but it was too late now. As they continued southward, Ra dcliffe looking behind him thought he saw the forms of two men moving over the snow at a great distance.

He had a field glass in his possession but before he could bring it into use the two figures had disappeared, and this scene was so remote that he could no tsol what to make of it though he looked in that direction till his eyes were not able to hold to look any longer..

He was presently convinced that the shots was not such a stestrange thing of being fired on by mistake, and that it was but a special favor from heaven that they were reaching a more wooded region where many persuers could never get through on snowshoes except by single file.

When theyhad progressed for about aother mile the two boys were perfectly amazed and confounded, nor would it be possible for any one to express the horror they felt at seeing a small stretch of rising ground spread with dismembered head hands and feet, and mangled bodies of children, girls and boys and patr particulary they observed half sunk into the deep snow what at first resembled slimy serpents a d and other objects. but what they really were made it impossible for the boys to remain in the place a moment so they made of with all the possible speed they could tward the direction of the christian lines.

The boys were pensive and sad, and as they walked on they used more caution, keeping their eyes more about them than they ever did before less they should happen or be seen by any of these vile murderers in the uniform of gray and particulary they were more cautious not to reveal themselves too much less any of the glandelinians should be within good range, and seeing them would at once shoot them down....

The terror of the by terror of the boys were in the sight they had viewed and of the approach of persuers diverted their intentions to their own convenience, and now their thoughts were all of how they might destroy their persuers if they came too near. But none as yet came in sight.

They had progressed slowly for another mile however when they were surprised with seeing a cloud of smoke probably of some distant fire at probably twenty miles from them or about sixteen miles tward the point where the north section of Virginia lokay might be, where theyhad observed the flash of explosions the morn ing before the y started out and not of the strange noise out to their greatest dististion the fire appeared to been their their part of the camp.

This caused the boys were terribly surprised with this strange sight and filled with the usual apprehension that a large force of the glandelinians had attacked the Virginian camp successfully and set fire to the tents and barracks. The boys also had the dread that some of these glandelinians may have trailed them and were the rascals who had fired the shots.

In this extremity the boys commended themselves to the Devine protection of god and determined if persued to defend themselves to the last breath with.Two hours more of slow traveling and the boys mounted to the top of a rising ground, where Penrod with his great perspective field glass discovered no less than one hundred dark fu figures moving over the snow far in the distance, which by being as he supposed the ferocious yum yumerannians. It surely would be very difficult to im imagine what dread and confusion this sight brought him to feel but when he considered that though they were approaching tward him and his companion they were more than a mile away and also on snowshoes he became more easy being fully satisfied that he and his companion could continue on with safty unlbe time the insurgents were at that distance if they had no others far ahead of these.

As they continued to approach he could see by their postures and gestures that the glandelinians were moving fast and they were probably after them. hen he saw they were much closer he told the Rattlesnake boy of it and he looking also discovered two such swarms, and then saw that there were three columns, more of the glandelinians in another direction which were making tward him and his companion with all possible speed. So filled with with indignation at this sight were the two boys that they began to premeditate taking revenge on the first of the persuers that came within range, let them ever be so many.

As they werecwatching the approaching soldiers, they were suddenly surprised at hearing the rolling noise of the distant o n cannon as they thought fired in the direction of Fortress gurandcallis. The boys were greatly startled by this sound and seeing the soldiers approach closer the boys started away in the greatest haste imaginable and reaching a very high snow drift mounted to the top, the very moment that the sound of cannons again rent the air, which accordingly in about another minute began to roar incessantly, and by the sound knew it was from some other direction, and considered that this must be some kind of artillery duel in progress. The boys had the presence of mind to take shelter behind the high snow bank at that minute and anxiously awaited the approach of the soldiers.

Two squads of these soldiers led by a queerly dressed soldier or officer all of a sudden started ru n running forward as if for their very lives, and came racing tward the snow dune which concealed the two boys, or where they had hid themselves, and that the boys seeing this column alone and not perceiving that o two others 3 were coming from an opposite direction.

Upon this threatening danger the two boys finally decided that the only way to attempt to make an escape should there be enemies, was to try to secure the officer, take him prisoner and kill him if he did not order his men back.

Therefore Penrod resolved if possible to get this strangely uniformed officer into his hands, cost what it would. The next thing was to contrive how to do it, and this indeed b was very difficult to resolve upon, but as he could pitch upon no means possible for it so he resolved to put himself upon the watch to keep his eye upon them till they came near enough, and leave the rest to the event, taking such measures as the oppertunity should prevent. As he looked again however, he was surprised to see that they were coming on his rear, while those in front had suddenly disappeared out of sight as if they had either dropped dropped into a snow bu beg or into the earth. Upon seeing somany soldiers appear in his rear as suddenlyvas these had disappeared in front, and knowing that they were coming in squad formation, Penrod could not tell how to take his measure, for to attack thirty or fourty soldiers single handed just to secure their leading officer was almost impossible, without risking certain destruction.

Therefore he felt perplexed and discomfited. however he and the Rattlesnake boy put themselves in defense against their probable attack and therdore were ready for action if any of the soldiers charged them.

Having waitrd a good while at length, and becoming very cold and impatient, Penrod carefully clambered up to the t op of the snow drift but lying down however so that his head did not appear above the snow dune therefore not giving the advancing soldiers any chance to perceive him or his friend friend.

Here he observed by the help of his field glass that th s those advancing h oh on his rearwere no less than fourty in number, hile he was lookingon them thus he perceived by his glasses two of the men start swam in the lead far ahead of the rest and run with incredible swiftness far in front calling on the others to follow, and they came directly toward the snow drift. both boys were dreadfully frightened when they perceived these o soldiers run twgrd them, when as they thought they saw the small column followed by the other swarms. however the boys kept to their post and their spirits bean began to recover when they found that not above twenty of the fourty soldiers follow their leaders, and still more was the boys encouraged when they saw saw the leader outstrip the rest exceedingly in running, and gained ground on them. there was between the snowdrift and the boys the gunbeam Creek which at this point was frozen over, but which in ice did not appar solid, and this the boys plainly sawthe glandelinians must necessarily cross over at risk of breaking through, but when the officer came thither he made nothing of it but started over.

The ice however broke under his weight and he and some of his nearest followers plunged into the cold water. powers they recovered from the shock and swam across in about fourty strokes leanded, and again calling on the others to come on e ran with exceeding strength and swiftness.

When the other landelinians came to the creek, Penrod saw that none of them would dare to cross at that point, and that standing on the other side they at first hesitated, lookd looked further up the creek, and then started over at another point. Penrod however observed that those who crossed the creek at the other places were more than twice as long in going over the ice thanthe fellows were that swam across.

This gave Penrod a sudden thought, and one that came upon him irrestibly, that now was the time to bring their leader down with a shot. but he was evidently rushing up the snow drift already, and ther fore Penrod and the Rattlesnake boy knowncoedh im down with their small rifles, being loathe to fire for fear the rest of the glandelinians would hear. Having knocked this rebel officer down the others who followed him stopped as if they had been taken unaware, but they soon advanced, and as they came nearer one of them stopped and hallood to about or aloud to the rest to come on, but they seeing their lieutenant knocked down, and not knowning how many more were behind the snow drift were at first as much frightened as their comrades, but soon they r3 recovered, and the glandelinians who were nearest aimed at the two boyscouts tofire but the boys shot first andkilled and wounded six of them at the first fussilade.

The glandelinians behind being surprised with the firing, and the noise stood stock still, too frightened, and confused to advance. This gave the two boys ample time to retreat further untill they had reached the strip of woods behind them. After they had reached these woods, the Rattlesnake boy decided to go out a little and see if the enmmy were following. He had not been gone long, when he came back hastily, running as fast as he could in the awkward snowshoes, and made for the nearest tree like one who did not even feel the tree or the snow shoes he had fastened to his feet and before Penrod had time to speak to him or ask him what was the matter, he cried out to him;;;

"Oh my god. Oh my god. Oh my arm. Oh drat those landelinians."

"hats the matter Radcliffe?" askes Penrod. "Are you wounded.?????"

"Yes I'm hit in the left arm. And yonder there" he exclaimed" re three columns of glandelinians coming after me."

"Well Radcliffe" said Penrod. "don't be so excited. He will frustrate our escape."

He saw that his friend was most tr terribly excited if not frightened, as he bit his finger nails like mad, for to him it seemed nothing else but that the whole army of glandelinians were after him. So Penrod said wih with determination;

"We will continue our retreat, but if we are hard pressed, we must resolve to fight them . Can you fight desperately if nece be?"

"Yes I can" he answered. "But there are coming a terribly great number of them at that."

"That does not make any difference!" said Penrod "we are armed with enough weapons t to pour an incessant fire upon them and will probably rout those we do not kill or wound. This will probably be our first real fight with the wicked glandelinians. Will you if I resolve to defend you, you defend and stand by me to the last and do just as I bid you?"

"Yes" answered the Rattlesnake boy. "I will die if you do Penrod. I lost my company of boys and I ll not live o if you don't." And both boys shook hands heartily. Both of the boys were well armed. Besides four brances of pistols each, they had two fowling pieces apiece, loaded with large swan shot as big as small musket shots, nd a,l their weapons were fully loaded. They had thus prepared themselves in this manner when leaving camp. Penrod after the hand shaking took his glass and climbed to the top of the highest trees to see what he could discover and he found quickly by their help that there were one hundred and thirty glandelinians, four high officers, three of them colonels and from the way they were advancing it seemed that their whole business was to go after the two boys and nothing else. Also Penrod had observed that this column of soldiers were not coming from the same direction the others had, but nearer to the edge of the woo s woods and the creek, where the ground was low, and where the thick woods came down almost to the edge of the frozen stream. This with their by inhuman reason, the rebels were coming ad after the two boys. and this filled Penrod with such indignation, that he resolved to try and shoot them all down.

With this bit of fury the boys made a hasty retreat to try and lure the rebels on. the two boys made a circle to the left hand of nearly a mile as well to get over the frozen gunbeam Creek as to get into a more secure position of the woods, so that they might d draw the persuers with in within easy range of them before they should be discovered. While the boys were making this slowkind of retreat, Penrod began to have thoughts which made him ask himself on what occasion, much less what necessity he a foriegner was in, to go and dip his hands in a most bloody war to attack and fight glandelinian soldiers who as to him their masters was none of his and whose wicked and bloody customs were their own disaster being in the insurgents a sort of token indeed of gods or of god himself having abandoned the landelinians and left them to such wicked and barbarous customs, but did not call upon him a mere boy and a foriegner to the Abbisannians to take upon himself to be a judge of th their action much less ansexecutionper of his justice.

Somehow these vert very thoughts so pressed him that he was resolved to go only on a retreat as long as there was chances without a fight and then act as god Himself would direct him. While he was making this resolution, the two boys entered a more thicker portion of the woods and continued the retreat till they came to a skirt of the woods on the side which was opposite the gunbeam Creek. Here Penrod called softly to the Rattlesnake boy and showed him a wide oak tree which was b nearest the frozen stream, he bade him to go to the tree and bring him word if he could see plainly at that point what the pursueing glandelinian soldiers were going to do. He did so and in a few minutes came back to the tree behind which Penrod had concealed himself, and told him that the glandelinians were making a movement with the purpose to surround them or cut off the ir retreat, and that another column was coming into the woods from an opposite direction. He told Penrod they were not Omarians, but consisted of the Scoodler Gargoylians whom he had often heard of as the most fierce and cruel Glandelinians of all.

This fired Penrods very soul. there was another big tree a large popular which by going a little way avout, he saw he might reachewithout being discovered and that he should be within half a shot of them, so going back about fourty paces, Penrod got behind this big trees which stood behind some thick briar bushes and which stretched all the way to the big oak tree and then came to an unusuallythigh snow drift which gave Penrod a full view of them at the distance of a hundred and eighty yards. Penrod now saw that he did not have a single moment to lose, for nin nineteen of the dreadful Scoodlers were within one hundred yards of him, but all closely huddled together as they advanced, and the others were spreading out, when Penrod turned to the Rattlesnake boy and said;;;

"Now comrade do just exactly as you see me do, and if you fail me not we will stop them sure."

Penrod set one of hismuskets down, and also the fowling piece, and the Rattlesnake boy followed his example, and with his other musket Penrod took good aim at the advancing glandelinians bidding his comrade to do the like and then asking;;

"Are you ready?"

"Yes." he answered.

"then open fire upon them." he said and he and his companion fired at the same time.

The Rattlesnas boy killed four of them, and wounded six more, and Penrod killed three and wounded eight. the glandelinians I may say for astonishing reason for were for a moment in a dreadful consternation. A number of them fired a fussilade but the trees protexted the boys. Penrod threw down the empty rifle, and t ook up the fowling piece, and the Rattlesnake boy did likewise.

"Are you ready to fire again?" Penrod asked."

"Yes indeed" he answered.

"Let fly at them then while they are in confusion" said Penrod and with that he fired again among the amazed glandelinians and so did the Rattlesnake boy, and many were killed or wounded that the survivors began retreating in a panic yelling, cursing and blaspheming like mad demons. Taking advantage of the confusio Penrod forgt forgetting his own safty rushed out from his place of-concealment and the Rattlesnake boy was close at his heels. Some of the other glandelinians seeing only two boys and not a regiment as they expected immediately gave chase shouting and yelling and swearing as loud as they could and defying the boys to stand and fight.The boys seeing their danger began to run as fast as they could but two of the nearest glandelinians made directly at the two boys.The Two Scoodlerw who were officers, one a captian and the other a luclsantenat were just aiming their pistols, when the Rattlesnake boy fired first and killed both of them.while the Rattlesnake boy was firing at the two officers, Penrod saw some of the other glandelinians open fire in return, and the Rattlesnake boy fell at as it appeared evidently hit.Disregardding the danger Penrod made directly tward his fallen comrade and lifted him up.He had not however been shot as believed, but evidently had tripped on the root of a tree do concealed by the deep sjow.so stunned was he by his sudden fall that the Rattlesnake boy for a fewm inutes felt so weak andcfaint, that he could scarce stand or speak.Helping him to getvbehind a tree quickly, Penrod took his bottle out of his pocket and gave it to his comrade, ti telling him he should drink which he did.No sooner had he recollected himself, he took hold of his rifle and as if it had put new vigor into him, he flew on the nearest surviving glandelinians like the fury of q wild beast just cornered, and had knocked down six of them in a moment, and crushed the skull of a seventh.

Penrod kept his p piece in his hand still without firing and calling to the Rattlesnake boy bade him run up to the tree w from whence they had first fired, and fetch the guns which lay under the snow that had been discharged, and which he did with great swiftness.

But before he reached the tree another rebel soldier of medium size attacked him and there ensued a fierce engagement between the scoodler and the Rattlesnake boy scout, the boy making at him with his clubbed rifle.but the Scoodler being a sout k lusty fellow had thrown him down into the snowand was wringing his rifle out of his hand, when the Rattlesnake boy wisely quitted the rifle, drew his pistol from its hosl hostler, and shot the Scoodler through the left temple and killed him upon the spot...P!!!

The Rattle snakeboy being freeonow of his assailant, persued the nearest of the remainder of the flying Scoodlers and with no weapon in his hand but his clubbed musket, dispatch all he could come up with without running into the main body, and Penrod having secured the other weapons lso persued the retreat ing glandelinia s and killed or wounded them all butvtwo of the others who plunged across the river midst the floating ice and swon with all their might, tward the oppowite shore,,,,followed by some of the others.

And only four of the were left out of the thirty three Scoodlers. Those who had crossed the stream worked hard to get out of gun shot, and the Rattlesnake boy would have fain have continued the persuit, and indeed Penrod was very anxious about their escape, less carrying the alarm to their comrade of the maincolumn and they shu should come back with two orvthree hundred of the other advancing rebels, and capture him and his comrade by mere mulitude, so h he refused to persuechim or them, but suggested it was wiser to retreat untill they reached a better positiob to resist the sedond column.It was no less than three hours after the boys had escaped t hese glandelinians that a most strange and unseen incident p occured.Penrod had went on h ahead a considerable distance when theRattlesnake boy came runningu p as fast as possible in his snow shoes and cried out;

''Penrod, Penrod, the whole glandelinian army is advancing tward us.''

Penrod regardless of danger hurried forward in the directionh his comrade indicated, when looking that way he saw an ernormous swrpent like formation of men about a mile and a half distant and advancing with great speed.He observed that this column which extended as far as eyecould reach did not come from the direction of Aurandscallio, or either from Vivian Vickey, but from the northeast, but nevertheless , moved tward Vivian Vickey.Penrod bade the Rattlesnake boy scout to stand still and make no noise, or either show himself for these glandelinians it was efident did not come from Vivian Vickey, but from Calverine, and he feared it was a new glandelinian army comeing to strike the besiegers in the rear is possible.

Parod then climbed to the top of the highest tree within his sight to take a better view,with the help of his perspective field glass, he plainly discovered another erh r ernormous column, and a third coming into view at about two leagues and a half distant from him and coming straight from the east. It appeared to Penrod to be an ernormous glandelinianarmy and the army appeared to consist of what the Nationals dreadedthe most glandelinians known as Americoannians.Pejrod could tell by their deep blue uniforms and their traitor banners.

The surprise of seeing such a vast army approaching from a direction that flabbergasted, him was such as I could not describe myself, and yet some secret doubts hung about him------he could not te l from whence they came--- but nevertheless this scenebid him to keep on his guard.

It was not long before Penrod saw the van guard of the column o come ver tward his hiding place and the officers in the van stopped for a moment s if they looked for a place where they might camp with great convience, and at t they continued on again, though the swrpent began to spread out as if ying for itself great legs, and a body like a dragon.This formation of the huge hmen tok took place about a half mi e mile from him.Now he was fully satisfied t as a new glandelinian army from the northwest somewhere, the first column as rod believed having eleven m illion men in all, three thirds of which were i fierce wheeler Cavarly..On the side of the column in the form of a smaller rpent was a troop of either girl and boy scouts,, or child slaves for they ared to be guarded.

When the van guard came within easy sight, theforemost of the ildren began to disperse with officers and men ordering them this way and that, d one of them as Penrod could perceive must have discovered the fallen ndelinian soldiers for he used the most passionate gestures, while the ldiers and the officers running up showed the greatest concern indeed.Penrod d not t all morow the meaning of this sight, and both he and the Rattlesnake were greatly perplexed..He then said;;

''P My heavens Penrod those glandelinians have a troop of boy and l children or scouts with them.If they are scouts and see us we are in greater nger than ever.''

''Why Radcliffe''said Penrod ''do you really think they are girl and boy outs??????''

''Tosh''said the Rattlesnake boy.''I'm sure they are.''

''No, no'I don' think o so.Radcliffe I am afraid you are mistaken indeed for I am sure they are child slaves disguised by the glandelini ns to decieve the Nationals.''

All the while Penrod had no idea whatever the su situation really was but stood trembling with excitement at the sight, expecting every moment that the disguised child slaves would be brutally treated or massacred, may twice the boys saw some of the gl ndelinians lift their rifles to strike some of the poor children.After the boys had bobserved this our outrageous treatment of the child slaves by the insolent glandelinian,,, they obe observed the rebels halt a general, if there in is such a thing as halting under such condition in such forlorn spot as this white wilderness.

They observed evidently that the child slaves apparently had liberty to go where ever they pleased, but after coming up towwithin fifty feet of the boys hiding place, they all stood around very pensive, and looked like boys and girls in despair. nd none of them appeared to be armed either.It was just at eleven o-clock, forenoon, when these boy and girl child slaves came no near woods hiding place and the two boys heard one of them say;;

''Why go near the woods, Jennie, and you Jesse,there are no Nationals in sight here to rescue us.''

Penrod knew it was no less than an hour before the glandelinian army would be on the move again, and from where they were the two boys would be able to see their motions, and to hear their conversation if they had any.In the meantime Penrod had in his mind a most desperate scemes.If possible he would run away with all these child slaves, if they proved to be such, and if he did so he must use great caution as he knew that if they were really child scouts instead of slaves he would have to deal withsword worse enemies, than the rebel soldiers themselves.

It was Penrods purpose as I have already mentioned to make the attempt at any cost but as he and his comrade saw that the glandelinian army was starting to move on again, he believed the chance would be easy if indeed the small column of apparent child scouts, appeared distressed, and too anxious for their condition to go any furt her, and most of them had grouped a behind the shelter of a high snow drift at about fifty feet from Penrods point of observation, and as he thought out of sight of the main column of inburgents. Upon this Penrod first mentioned his scems to the Rattlesnake boy, and the latter agreeing, both boys reson resolved to show themselves to the children, and first learn something of their condition, and therefore he and the Rattlesnake boy immediately marched out of their place of concealment and they went as near to them undiscovered as they could and then before any of them saw him or his companion, Penrod called aloud to them as loudly as he could in the Abbissannian language;

''What are you boys and girls?Child slaves or scouts?''

They started in surprise and alarm, but were ten times more confounded when they saw two boys in purple uniform armed to the teeth, and making almost smouth figures so thickly were they covered with hard snow.The apparent boy and girl scouts made no answer at all at first, but though Penrod thought he perceive them just going to fly from him and his companion when he then spoke to them in spanish!!!!!!

"Boys and girls" he said "do not be surprised or scared of me, perhaps if you are real child slaves you may have two friends very near, when you at leas expect it."

"You two boys must be sent directly frok heaven then to deliver" one of them sai to Penrod very gravely "for we are sure that with such a large army of rebels near us, our condition is past the help of any human beings."

"I'll help can from come from heaven my friends" said Penrod. "but dan you trust two strange boy scouts to lend you aid, for you seem to be child slaves in some great distress. I saw you with the Glandelinians when they approached and when you begged for mercy to the bu brutrs who had you in their possession I saw some of them lic lift their muskets to strike you down."

The boys n and girls looked very astonished indeed and one of the boys said in answer;

"Are we confronting two celestial beings, or two human beings? Are you real boys, or angels?"

"Be in no fear of that my friends!" said the Rattlesnake boy. "If Gos has sent two se speicls celestial beings to relieve you or rescue you they would have come in heavenly art qttire instead of in unf uniform, and armed in a different fashion than you see us, so pray lay asids your fears, we are two boyscouts of the Nationals and desire to assist you as far as we are able. you see we have arms and ammunitiob, tell us freely can we serve you? what is your trouble pray?"

"Our trouble friend boy scout" said one of the girls "Is too long to tell you here in their this dangerous positio n while the murderous Glandelini Glandelinians are so near us, but in short we are real child slaves. General Raymond Richardson Federal is the commander of that big Glandelinian army. The Glandelinians had first deided to murder us because we were on the pontvof point of being rescued by the Nationals, and at last they have turned us loose in this desolate region to shift for ourselves or freeze to death."

"How near are the Glandelinian forces!" "Asked the Rattlesnake boy. "Do you not know to where they are going!"

"They are advancing to reinforce Manley who has placed himself between general Fabian and general Mansions besieging forces" said another of the child slaves pointing in the direction of the besieged city. "But my heart leaps with the fear that the nearest Glandelinians have seen you two with us, and heard you speak, and if they have they certainly will come after us, and take possession of us again, which is worse than being killed."

"Are they really Amerid"nian Glandelinians" ?" Asked the Rattlesnake boyscout. At this one of the handsome little girls answered;

"That is what they are called, but they really consist of the Amerscanians, Mic-Hollestinians and the dreaded Scoodlers."

"Well then" said Penrod "leave the situation in my hands, and I and my companion here will take you all t h to the nearest christian camp. I see some of the Glandelinians approaching. It is an easy thing for us to kill them all, but shall we rather thank th take them prisoners and disarm them!"

But the Rattlesnake and the slaves feared these Glandelinians were too ferocious to be made prisoners by two mere boy scouts, that the Amerscinians w were villains and toosavage to be safe enough to show any mercy to them, but if they were surprised they might be more easy to secure. Penrod then asked one of the child slaves what kind of Glandelinians were those that were coming teard tward them. but none of the slaves could make them out at that distance.

Nevertheless the child slaves were willing to obey Penrods orders in anything he or his companion would direct.

"Well" said Penrod "Let us all retreat out of view and hearing of the Glandelinians less they charge us in the open, and we will resolve further".

All of the boys anegirls there being fifty of them in all the one thousand who were or appear old enough to carry arms went willingly with the two boys till the thickest maze of trees and bushes covered them from the view of the nearest Glandelinians. Then Penrod said to them;

"Look you here every one of you. If I and my companions deliver you from the yoke of the Insurgents, are you willing to make conditions with us." ?

"They all anticipated his proposals by telling him and the Rattlesnake g oyw cout that they would willingly allow themselves to be commanded by the two boys in everything.

"Well" said Penrod" my conditions are but two only;

First-- that while you follow us to the christian lines that you will not disobey in anything no matter what we ask;

Secondly-- that if you are saftly there, you will join hoin my command of boy and girl scouts."

Every one of them gave the two boys all the assurance that unfortunate children could devise, that they would comply with all these reasonable demands providing t hey were no more slaves.

"Well then" said Penrod--here are some pistols for six of you elder boys, and here small rifles for three girls providing you know how to handle them. Then tell me what do you think it is proper to be done when those Glandelinians come upon us."

All of the child slaves offered themselves to be wholly guided by the two boyscouts and then the Rattlesnake boy said to Penrod;

"I believe it is best for us to fire at the Gland elinians at once as they come within our range, and if any of them were not killed at the first volley, and offered to surrender they might give them quarter, providing they tell us what we wish to know."

Penrod was very loat he to kill even the worse rebels if he could help it, but nevertheless these kind of Glandelinians were far worse than any kind of incorrigible villians, and if they were only taken prisoners, they would be undone, for they would only break away, and return to their comrades in their main army and bring a whole brigade of soldiers after them, and destroy them all.

In the meantime during the middle of this discourse the whole troop of children heard voices approaching, and they looking in that direction, saw a large swarm of Glandelinians very close to their very heels. Penrod realized they were the ferocious Mic-Hollestini ns and Amerians together, and said to those who were armed by him;

"When you open fire for God's sake do not miss your aim. They are the real worse Glandelinians of the lot, those Mic-Hollestinians. If you miss them and it results disasterously, it will be your fault n and not mine. You know hose Glandelinians kill girls and boys."

The Glandelinians who were nearest suddenly saw the armed boys and girls, and the latter seeing them coming leveled their rifles. The Glandelinians who were behind seeing this cried out a warning to the soldiers in front, but it was too late for them then, for the moment the soldiers cried out; "To cover comrades quick" the girls and boys opened fire, and aimed their shots so well at the rebels in front, that fivof them were killed on the spot, and seven others wounded. Some of those who were not badly wounded, started up on their feet, and called eagerly for help to the other Glandelinianscfar behind, and then rushed forward with clubbed muskets with the purpose of knocking the children down with the stock of their rifles, but Penrod and the Rattlesnake boy fired so rapidly, that all of these Glandelinians were either killed or wounded.

The leader of the Glandelinians, who was a lieutenant was only slightly wounded. By this time the rest of the Glandelinians had come up, and when they saw what had occured, and their lieutenant's danger, and that it was some of the child slavesarmed with rifles and commanded by two boyscouts in purple uniforms, an a they cried out;

"You little kid rebels it is in vain for you to resist further. Surrender and we will be merciful. Resist us further, and heaven help you if we come off the victors."

The rebels promished they would spare their lives if they would allow themselves to return to slavery, and be brought back to the place from whence they came. Penrod answered haughtily;

"We are not child slaves you see here, and neither are we the surrendering kind, and neither are these children with me any slaves any more. Come and beat the boy here you call the "Real RATTLESNAKE". You may know him as well as I do."

While Penrod was thus defying the Glandelinians the Rattlesnake boy had sent one of the armed slaves with orders to draw the unarmed girls and boys out of the zone of if firing, while he, Penrod, and the others would cover their retreat, in case the Glandelinians would attack too violently. The Glandelinians were terribly incensed at seeing the children, who before were their slaves, were now shooting down their comrades, and were determined to recapture them at all risk and consequences.

The main thing decided on on the part of the la children was a hasty retreat. There were sixty six of the other Glandelinians who were so desperate that they would give their lives to regain the runaway slaves. And Penrod and the Rattlesnake boy also hardended by despai desperation, by hardships and exposure would carry on their desperate re resistance, knowing that if they allowed themselves to be subdued the child slaves would be retaken and slaughtered as soon as they were in possession of the Glandelinians, and that therefore it would be suicide to surrender to them, after the numbers of their comrades they had all already shot down.

While they were cautiously making their retreat, the rebels hesitating to advance Penrod mused for some time upon what commands he had given, and found it a very rational conclusion, and that therefore something was to be resolved on more speedily speedily as well as to draw these fierce Glandelinians into some kind of snare for their surprise, as to prevent their coming too suddenly upon the children and destroying them all.

Upon this it presently occurred to Penrod that in a little while the whole Glandelinian army would be on the advance, and their generals and other officers would be wondering what had become of their comrades in the van and the child slaves. And therefore would certainly want a large force of mounted men to look for them, and that then perhaps they might come in such numbers, and on such swift horses that escape would be impossible despite the deep snow.

And a bloodlust fatal. Upon this Penrod suggested that the girls and boys who were not armed were to race for the thick trees and hide behind them, as it was the rebels would not see them quick enough to carry them off, & shoot them down likewise. And as the Glandelinians do take everything but their bodies and leave them to lay to decompose in that fashion, the bodies of the girls and boys who were armed retreated slowly after the bloodthirsty after they had gone about five hundred yards, they heard some of the Glandelinians fire their guns, probably as a signal to the others that the two boys and the children had escaped them!

None of the children at all stirred from their hiding places behind the trees, and they heard probably the same Glandelinians fire their signal shots several times. And one of them saw three Glandelinians make other signals also. At last after the signals stopped, Penrod observed them by the help of his glasses become united by another party, and move toward the direction of his hiding place; and he found as they approached nearer that there were no less than a hundred and ten men among them, and that they were armed with excellent rapid repeating rifles.

Some of the child slaves knew the persons, and the characters of all the Glandelinians, of whom they said there were thirty three very fine and brutal Americanians among them, who they were sure were the best great shots of the whole world, but that as for their leader who was a captain. Captain and who it seems was the main commander of them and all the rest who we re Mic-Hollistinians were more formidable and cut throatthan the worse Indians would have ever been turned upon the first appearance of these dread ful Mic-Hollistinians coming into the woods, considered that the best plans of separating the child slaves who we re armed: Two of the child slaves who were boys of twelve years; and of whom Penrod was more amused than anything, he went with the Rattlesnake boy about and one of the girls to make wide trees where they left them fully armed. The others of whom they had still better idea usage were placed closer to Penrod upon the recommendation of the other slaves, and upon their solemnly engaging to live and die for the cause, as with them and the well armed boys; there were eighteen boys and six girls, and Penrod had no doubten that he and his band should be able to deal well enough with the whole swarm of the Mic-Hollistinians that were coming, considering that the Rattlesnake boy had said there were many fleet Americanians among them.

As soon as they got to the edge of the woods where their fallen comrades lay, the foremost of the rebels ran forward, while these stopped who were to mind, brandishing their weapons like madmen. Being among their fallen comrades, the first thing they did, was to run back to their main columns and it was easy to see they were under a great surprise and alarm to find their comrades who had been slain & have been stripped of all their arms and ammunition, or all they had.

After they had waged a great an is upon this, they set up a volume of great shouts, hallooing with all their might to try if they could to make the soldiers of another detachment hear, but all to no purpose, then they fired a volley of their rifles. They were so astonished at receiving no answer to this that it was soon they were preparing to retreat back to their army, and let one of their regiments who that over fifty of their comrades had been murderously slain, as their red bodies stripped, accordingly they immediately treaded their steps. They had not been long in reaching the army, when Penrod perceived them all coming forward again but with a second detachment, but with this new measure in their conduct which it seems they committed together upon it to leave to leave thirty men by those who had fallen and the rest to go forward to investigate and to look for the cause of their being slain and stripped. There were over seven hundred men now advancing into the woods, while the thirty who remained among their fallen comrades stood in a line at a good distance from the woods, to wait for their return so that it was impossible for Penrod and his small party to come at them at his point. So that advanced into the woods kept close together marching toward the right, but not in the direction where the child slaves and the armed band of children lay. When they came up to the shore of the Gunhoom Creek, where they could see a great way i to the wood woods beyond which extended to the southwest, and where the slight rise of ground lay toward, they moved back and forth until they were weary, and not caring it seemed to venture too far into the woods them, some of them who appeared to be officers stood together under a big popular tree to converse among themselves.

At length Paul & saw them all start to forward and march down toward the edge the woods for it seemed they had dreadful apprehension of the dangers of falling into a deadly ambush; so they resolved to go to the mid n army, & up their other expeditions for loot, and so go on with the army to its [illegible]

As soon as Penrod perceived them going toward the main rebel [illegible] he believed they were really giving up the search, and leaving the region wholly, and the Rattlesnake boy, as soon as Penrod told him of his thoughts was ready to think from apprehension of it; but Penrod presently thought of a [illegible] stratagem to fetch some of these Glandelinians back again, and secure them [illegible] ammunition for the rest of the slaves who were able to use them. Therefore [illegible] red & one of the boys with two others to go over to the westward side of [illegible] Creek and fire shots as frequently as they could, and as soon as they [illegible] some of the Glandelinians on account them they should return it again from [illegible] some trees and then keep tightmouthed but all of their might and range;; take [illegible] about retreat; always answering the fire when the Glandelinians f [illegible] to draw them far into the woods; and then wheel again and join the [illegible] children by such ways as the Rattlesnake boy directed.

They were just starting their retreat to the rebel lines when [illegible] boys saluted for the rest;;; went to the place where they were directed and [illegible] behind some trees fired toward the direction of the Glandelinians and they [illegible] the sound of shots; and seeing the puffs of smoke from the edge of the [illegible], and answered in a perfect volley; and then ran along the shore toward the [illegible] the shots hadden from which they were presently stopped by seeing a [illegible] of their comrades fallll fall.

At this point the creek was not frozen over as solid as at other points, and the [illegible] surprised Glandelinians found that they could not get across, and therefore [illegible] & their commander stood up toward the more solid ice, just as Penrod and [illegible] expected when most of them had crossed over, Penrod observed [illegible] that only four men were left to guard that spot. This was what Penrod waited for, and therefore he took the rest of the armed boys and girls with [illegible], and crossing the creek at a secure spot surprised the Glandelinians before [illegible] were aware of their approach.

During the character of the other two boys the Glandelinians did [illegible] resist, but surrendered without a protest.

In the meantime the other armed boys and girls secured their [illegible] as well with the rest of the rebels that they drew them on till they left [illegible] where they could not retreat to the creek in a hurry. Penrod had nothing [illegible] to do with the prisoners as he disarmed them, and kind bidded them and then allowed them to go free. The most probable thing was to fall upon the other [illegible] Glandelinians and disarm them also.

It was half an hour after when the boy slaves came back to Penrod before the [illegible] they had trapped came into view and they could hear the foremost of [illegible] insurgents complain as how lame and tired they were from tramping so far [illegible] the deep snow which was very welcome news to Penrod and the [illegible] the woods in the deep snow which was very welcome news to Penrod and the [illegible].

At length they came up to the desired spot but it was impossible to express their [illegible] when they suddenly found themselves fired on from behind and a number of their men go down. The children could hear the Glandelinians all but commands to one another and amongst the wounded blasphemy in the most [illegible] manner; others telling one another that they had been lured into [illegible] and that they should be killed down.

After some minutes after answering a fi fusillade the boys could see through the smoke the Glandelinians retreating in a panic; and [illegible] running about in all directions wringing their hands like lost souls in [illegible] as thousand girls who were armed would have been very willing to fall upon the retreating Glandelinians and shoot them all down without mercy, [illegible] Penrod could have only given the order; but Penrod knew if he allowed the [illegible] to have the advantage over them either to capture them all as Penrod ordered the Rattlesnake and a number of the best boys to keep forward upon their [illegible] and kneel as close as I may could and secure the annihilating and guns [illegible] of the fallen rebels before the others rallied an and opened fire.

They however had not been long in that posture when one of the retreating Glandelinians who happened to be the principal leader of the partners [illegible] killed some of his Glandelinians and were rushing forward with two other officers, with the purpose to prevent the Rattlesnake boy and his followers from securing the guns and ammunition of their fallen comrades.

However the Rattlesnake boy and fourteen ran to the shelter of some [illegible] trees and is opened a withering fire upon these Glandelinians, [illegible] which officers of these Glandelinians was killed [illegible] immediately, the other officers were shot through the body, and the others [illegible] a hasty retreat. At the noise of this sudden fire Penrod and the [illegible] of his force immediately advanced from tree to tree, while Penrod told [illegible] Rattlesnake companion to try if he could to bring the retreating Glandelinians to a parley, & beckoning with a white flag he called out as loudly [illegible] to the Glandelinians who had halted!

"surrender.You cannot escape.You are surrounded on all sides."

One of the Glandelinians answered immediately

"Who's that, that hail us!" for it seemed he knew the voice very well.The Rattlesnake boy answered;

"Aye,aye, I'm the boy you rebels and traitors call a "RATTLESNAKE",It's better for you to throw down your arms and yeild or you will all be dead men this moment.Do you hear?"

"If we do surrender, who must we yeild to?"he are they!"said the same Glandelinian again.

"To colonel Fenrod.We are now fifty to your ten.Your leader, and many of your comrades are killed= mortally wounded wounded, and if you do not remain you ten rebels are all lost."

"Will you give us quarter then if you surrender."said the rebel.

"If not we will not yeild."

"I'll signal to Fenrod if you promish to surrender!"asked the Rattlesnake boy.

"Yes we will" was the answer.

The Rattlesnake boy held a momentsary conversation, with Fenrod and the then the latter himself sailed out;

"You Glandelinians know who I am.If all of you lay down your arms immediately and submit to come to the christian lines as our prisoners, you wise will be permitted to live though you are not worthy to have your lives spared."

Upon this one of the other Glandelinians immediately cried out;

"We would never surrender under such a condition as the soldiers knowing us would not give us any qu quarter."

This however was not true for it was positive the Angelinians would not refuse quarter to any Glandelinians no matter what they were unless they were caught in the act of murdering children.However Fenrod told them they must surrender at discreati discretion, and trust to the general's mercy by which he probably meant general Brentheartgoave However seeing themselves surrounded by desperate and armed child slaves which were more dangerous than Angelinian soldiers once they got the upper hand, they all wisely laid down their arms and even begged for their lives(if they had any)

However receiving all the arms Fenrod sent the Rattlesnake and a number of boys to tie the hands of the prisoners behind their backs, and when this was accomplished, Fenrod and his army of armed boys and girls no sixty in number came up, surrounded the prisoners, and seized upon them, and started to move forward through the woods.

Fenrod ordered the Rattlesnake boy to have the worse of the Glandelinians or=those the least trusted to be kept seperated from the others. Yet some of the glandelinians wished to enter into a parley with Fenrod and his aids=de=camp, saying that though the boys had given them quarter for the present yet if they were brought into the christian lines they would be all hanged for they had been forced to surrender while attacking children, and the penalty for attacking children is death.

Fenrod however stated that he would intercede for them especially if necessary if they said nothing of the matter.any one may guess how such a proposal would be received by glandelinians in their position, some of them fell down on their knees in the snow to Fenrod and promished with the deepest impressions that they would go willingly and not try any tricks.

Fenrod now made the necessary arrangements for the return to the christian lines.He furnished more of the slaves with the surrendered weapons. That their advance might be very secure, Fenrod told the Rattlesnake boy to choose fifteen boys out of the group and tell them that the others would not be the main body.The advance therefore was continued with the fifteen boys acting as the van guard until close in front of them they encountered the other party of searching Glandelinians.

The child slaves came up quickly upon them that these Glandelinians were taken so completely by surprise that with the death of their leader who was shot through the head, they dropped their arms and fled for dear life.

Nothing remained now but to determine what to do with the prisoners for real, for Fenrod found that the Rattlesnake boy was very uneasy about taking the Glandelinians prisoners with him even if they their hands were bound.Fenrod told the Rattlesnake that he would undertake to bring the rebels to make it their own request that he should leave them behind unarmed.

"I should be very glad to do that but they may not even be trusted in that way also."said Fenrod.

Nevertheless Fenrod caused the prisoners to be brought before him.He told them he had heard a full account o of the willainous behaviour of all rebels of their sort, and pointed out to them on how Providence had snared them in their own wicked way, that they thought they had left the child slaves in a barren country to perish of cold and hunger, instead of being rescued by the christians but it had pleased God so to direct them slaves to him and his Rattlesnake friend.He asked them what they had to say why the Rattlesnake boy himself should not order them to be executed as child murderers last end of soldiers which they could not doubt he had full authority to do.Most of the Glandelinians declared it was their order to massacre children, that they had nothing else to say, but that he had promised them their lives, when they were their prisoners, and they implored his mercy.Fenrod told them he had resolved to give the child slaves to the christian lines but as for the soldiers he could not take them, as he would have to take them only as prisoners to be tried for they would be murderers of children for which they would either hang or face the firing squads.The only whay way by which he could see they might escape this was for them to be liberated here a unarmed, but as necessary precautions should be taken they were all to leave their belts behind so that they would have to hold up their pants with their hands as they found their way back to the Glandelinian army.

If they desired that, Fenrod had some inclinations to give them their lives,if they felt sure they could reach the army in this fashion.They said they would rather venture to remain behind in that fashion than go with them to the christian lines to face the firing squads, and we re thankful to have the liberty of going.Fenrod then talked with them seriously of their circumstances.when they declared their willingness to remain behind, and he relieved of their belts, Fenrod relie released them, the belts being carried by one of the boys.

The boys had now travelled with the slaves until darkness set in.The weather was cold, but the sky was clear.Suddenly they all suddenly they all saw far in the distance, an enormous flash of fire, and heard a sound like a number of great g berthas fired.Soon after they saw a very great ruddy glow light in the west, and as vivian said they was in that direction they knew it must be some fire in the city which could not be far off as they felt sure they had heard the sound of great guns.The wind being boisterous it increased as the children continued on their way, and in half an hour they could plainly see that it was a great fire some where in the rebel encampments.On a sudden to their great terror, there was a most terrific explosion like a colcanic eruption of great volcano of flashes and smoke shot y up high into the air, the fire was almost out for a moment, then flared up with redoubled brightness.

The sound of guns continued and when they were thinking of looking for shelter for the night they saw by the reflection of the conflagration, that the snow covered ground far in the distance was thronged with moving objects.

They had seen Fenrod and his followers, and had done their utmost to make them aware their approach, and in half an hour they proved to be a bunch of boyscouts returning from some night work.After a junction, on inquiry they found it was a column of Abyssinnian boy scouts who were just escaping from the rebel lines an account of the fires.It would be hard to describe the scenes that took place when the two columns met.There were some in tears, some suffering from the cold, and running about stamping their feet, others exercising their hands to warm them, some were overcome by the cold, and ready to faint , some were quite much,singing or laughing, and some were Crossing themselves and giving thanks to god.

Among them was a girl whom Fenrod and the Rattlesnake boy believed they had seen somewhere before who was labouring to quiet those around her, persuaded, entreated, argued with them, and did her utmost to keep them within the limits of their reason, and with some she had success, though others for a time were out of control of them selves.

Most of these child scouts appeared to be almost starved for want of provisions. One of the poor boys were so weak that they could hardly walk much further. Fenrod ordered some of his rations to be given them, and they rather devoured than ate it.

There was a little boy and girl whom the young girl admit said she thought must have died on the way, but she had not had the heart to go near them, for she had nothing to relieve them with.Fenrod went to where they lay and found they were faint for the want of food, and at the very brink of death, but on being fed very carefully, they gave evidence of a speedy recovery.At the request o of the little girl they all looked for shelter for the night o

They found a hut close to where the two scout forces had made a junction, and it was just big enough to hold them all, and with a fire going in the fire place made it very comfortable for them indeed.However Fenrod found himself very uneasy and could get no sleep, though he suffered no effects in his exposure.He lay still in the floor for some time, but as he did not feel any sense he got up and I took a look on the outside.But as it was too dark to see far, and he heard no noise he returned and laid down th on the floor again, but it a was all one he simply could not sleep his thoughts were too the last degree uneasy and he knew not for whats the noise he made waked the Rattlesnake boy, and Penrod explained hw t had been with him.

"Say you so!" said he. "what if some mischief was brewing near us. Let us go and look around."

They then set voff to the t op of a high rise of ground and observing the view by the help of a bright mo n light, were so surprised to see south of them the light of another great fire, and hearing somewhat nearer the voices of a great nu ber number of men. Penrod and the Rattlesja e boy being surprised at t his sight ran back immediately and aroused the whole force, and when they heard the news they could not be persuaded to stay within, but mi must all run to see how things stood outside. They were in the greatrst perplexity for at first they did not know what to do, but at last Penrod decided to send the Rattlesnake boy out to spy, it being now very dark and cloudy to try and learn who they were and what t hey were intending to do. After he had been gone for about two hours he returned wi h the word that he had v been very close to them without being discovered, t hat they were a la very large foraging party of Glandelinians, and that they had come into contact by mere chance with a squadron of Federal cavarly returning from a scouring t our, and that t he two forces were engaged in a bloody fight.

The fight went on for two hours and at t he end the rebels were conqured and fled tward their camp precipitately. The victorious Concentinians did not make any pursuit, but drawing t hemselves int o a body had returned tward their own lines. The fright being over, they all retired agai n.

Soon after this one of those who had been on guard saw by the whiteness of the snow covered grond ground and the reflection of the far distant fires, five or six columns of soldiers solo slowly approaching. All of those inside the place were apparently sound asles p. This was indeed a very great surprise. There were se enty or eighty men in each column, and just now there were about two miles from the small nightly shelter. The sentry had observed these columns while they we were still a long ways off, so that it would be an hour before they would reach t the habitatio n. Now having a great reason to believe they were betrayed by the prisoners they had set free, the first thing he did did was to arouse t he others, and they all were at once up, and Penrod caused the Rattlesnake boy to lead the girls and boys who were not armed and whatever they could carry away with them to a place of defense in the woods.

Then Penrod and his followers took their arms and retreated tward the part of t he woods, where the unarmed party had gone, but keeping a watch on t he approaching soldiers to see which way they went. They had not gone far when they could see from a riding ground the swarm of soldiers come direct ly to their habitayion, and in a few moments more could see the whole building go flaming up like a huge torch to their greatest mortification and grief. They kept their station for a while till they observed the rebels spread themselves all over the region outside of the burning building like wild beast looking for prey. Then the brave children went on, and they did not halt untill they came to a think grown part of the woods, where a large number of trees were found to be hollow and large, and in these trees they all took their posts. They had not been there long when ten of t he Glandelinians ran tward their hiding place and a little way back they espied thirty more coming after them, and fifty more beyond them all running as if t hey knew their hiding place. The boys and girls who were armed made up their minds to let the first of the Glandelinians pass, and then take the thirty, and fire this line, as they came up but to fire one volley after another and shoot them down all if possible. So the boys and girls who were to fire first put seven bullets into their pieces, and from holes in the trees, took a sure aim and waited untill the ten rebels came so near that they could not miss them. They soon saw that one of the ten was an officer of high rank, and they resolved he should not escape their fire, nor either his followers. At the first discharge nine of the rebels fell dead or mortally wounded, and the last one had a scratch in the right shoulder and being dreadfully surprised, and frightened, though not so much hurt, ran down tward his other comrades, blaspheming and yelling.

When the fifty men that were behind heard the sound of the volley, and saw the flashes of the guns in the darkness, and heard the savage cries, they stood still at first as if bewildered. So all of the boys and girls fired into the midst of them and routed the survivors. Then seduring the weapons and arms of those who had fallen, they went to the place where the other children were, and found that though the rebels had been quite near the place they had not discovered them. They gave the weapons to them and told them all to retreat into the woods in case the rebels should rove to far after them.

CHAPTER THIRTY FIVE...

ANOTHER SEVERE STORM. BACK IN CAMP. THE CONTEST WITH A MAD DOG.....!!!"A NEVER THE MAIN COLUMN OF THE GLANDELIN(ANS, appeared, about eighty seven of them, all armed with long rifles with bayonets attatched, and such like implements of war, and all of the children were then put into the utmost consternation. As they came forward all of the best of them began to consult and consider what to do. And as they knew that their being concealed was their only safty, they resolved first of all to make a defense for themselves. As soon as possible all that were armed posted themselves near an old abandoned child slave plantation to w await the coming of t hese rebels. All of the boys and girls guessed so it happened this new part of the party of Glandelinians came swarming through the woods directly tward the plantation. When they came within range of the guns the boys and girls who were armed let fly among the crowds of Glandelinians with six or seven bullets in each charge. The surprise among the Glandelinians was most inexpressible, they were frightened to the last degree, to see from unexpected points so many undulating rifle flashes, and to hear such a dreadful noise, and to see so many of their comrades killed and hurt, but see no body that did it.

The rest of t he Glandelinians recovered from the surprise and knowing the trees the flashes came from, rushed forward in ind incredbile fury and fell upon the boy and girl defenders in three bodies using the butt ends of their muskets, and laid about them sl well that for a moment the children who were younger and not armed w wet up a dismal screaming and fled to save their lives which soever they could. As the Glandelinians did not care to risk it to pursue them in the dark woods they did not continue on, but all got together and retre retraced their steps taking their w own wounded along with them.

But the disaster for the fugitives was not at an end, for twqrd midnight it blew a terrible wind and blinding blizzard storm from the direction of the besieged city so that it was impossible for t hem to make any headway, nay the storm continued to rage the rest of the night, and the fugitives were so bufft buffeted by the wind, that it required infinite toil and courage to make any progress, and they all felt sure if they did not reach or find shelter soon they would all perish. Many trees were dashed to the ground by the force of the wind, branches were dashed to the ground, and the fugitives had many narrow escapes.

At day break the storm abating considerably they had hopes of finding shelter for they were all in, suffering from cold and hunger, and almost overcome from exposure to the storm. They felt like distracted children and the snow mark was so thick they could not see hardly a hundred feet. Yet no shelter was in sight and the christian lines were still far distant. However on account of such a se ere severe storm they did not believe the wicked Glandelinians would be around to bother them, but three hours after day break had started, the storm abated considerably and they saw the snow covered ground as it were in the far distant covered with something very dark moving forward. But for some time they were not able to discover what it was till after some time, Penrod going ahead a little way took a look at the moving object with a perspective glass, cried out that an army of Glajdelinians was advancing, and strong in force also. The Rattlesnake boy could not imagine what he meant by an army, and tawarted him a little hasty.

"May Penrod" said the Rattlesnake boy "Don't be angry if I contradict you, for it is not an army of rebels, but of Angelinians, and a big force of them too, for I believe there are a thousand sleighs with the column."

Penrod and his force being snow bound by the blizzard he gave orders to his followers to take shelter where ever it had been offered and await the coming of the strange army. As for the force if they were Glandelinians, Penrod told them they had nothing to fear but too heavy a fire of musketry, and therefore they all should, get behind objects of protection, but not to be too close to one another in and as they fired to aim their pieces well, and await the issue in th that posture. This they all did, that all the boys and girls that who were armed mifht be ready to stop any attack that tyis force might endeavor to make upon their little position. Emma took up a position behind a tree or rock, a hundred feet from each other, and in this posture they aly for the approaching force, and in a little while the army came up.

within plain sight.When the Glandelinians came nearer to the hidden ambush they seemed to be struck with wonder and astonishment at the sight of half covered foot prints in the deep snow, and seemed to intend to work their way around their hidden positions, but by Signal Penrod called to his boys and girls not to let the foe come too near them.This very order brought them to a very severe engagement with them, without their designing it for fify or sixty of the soldiers came t soo near their positions, and so fa far around, that Penrod beckl beckoned with his hand to his comrades to slowly retreat, but which signal they did not understand on account of the heavy snow mark, and instead of retreating they opened a heavy fire from their concealed positions, and fired so rapidly and incessantly that all the fifty Glandelinian soldiers were killed or very much wounded.

And Penrod had called to them not to fire yet by any means.This astonished the other Glandelinians but nevertheless the main body rushed forward and so near that Penrod easily found they were Omarian Kurds, the same sort of foes he had been used to have adventures with, in and in a very short time the foremost of the spread out a little further to the left, till tyey almost came directly to the rear of the hidden position, and then started straight forward upon them, till they came so near that Penrod could hear some of them speak, upon this Penrod ordered all his forces by signals to keep close watch lest the rebels should get around their position and sh oot them all down from behind, and they all made their guns ready but being so near as to be within hearing Penrod made one of the boys go out into theopen with a flag of truce, and to demand of the Glandelinians what they meant by attacking girls and boys in this fashion which which he did,whether they understood him or not, that Penrod knew hot but as soon as he called to them six of the rebels who were in the foremost of the column made some kind of signal, whether his was a defiance or challenge, he knew not, vor whether it was done in mere contempt, or as a signal to the rest, but immediately the boy arise out they were going to shoot, and unhappily for the poor lad the Glandelinians opned opened with three hundred rifles, and to Penrods greatest grief killed thelad, no other boy being in their sight.The poor boy was shot with no less than thirty bullets, and a shower of bullets sped past the hidden boys, such unlucky marksmen the Glandelinians were.Penrod was so enraged at the loss of one of his rescued child slaves that he immediately ordered all of his boys and girls who were armed to fire on the rebels, and they gave them such a fierce and continual fire as these rebels had never recieved in their lives before.

None of the brave children can never tell hw many they killed, nor how many they wou ded at this fierce fire, but sure such a fright and hurry never was seen among such a multitude of Glandelinians, there there being thirteen or fourteen gaps in their columns, and the survivors all in terrible confus ion rushing away as fast as they could, taking but little care to save their wounded comrades, or pick up their dead, and ammunition and rifles, or sleighs so that many were lost.

This gave the remainder of the slaves,to secure weapons and ammunition whic they did.A few minutes more passed, and the Glandelinians were all gone.A few hours after this encounter, the small force of brave children had co e just within sight of the christian lines when itwas their hap to meet with about fourty five of the Gargoylian Kurds, and the two boy leaders knew these fellows were dangerous, and who have great skill in their methods of fighting.As soon as they saw the armed children, they were at first very much surprised.Penrod said that they had nothing to fear for if t hey charged at once they could not come very fast as their horses cannot gallop with much speedthrough the deep snow.

For a moment all the boys and girls stood gazing at the rebels like a mere mob, but as soon as they saw the Glandelinians advancing, they opened a sudden o valley which brought down ten Glandelinians and dismounted six six.The rest of the Glandelinians halted,and returned the fire, and then galloped up at all the speed their horses could go through the deep snow.As soon as they saw the rebels coming and being without shelter at his moment, all the children after firing another good f volley fled in great confusion.The only stand was made by Penrod, the Rattlesnake boy scout and ten of the lads who did all they could by signs to call the rest of them to come back which they finally did..Brave Penrod with a heavy ball of snow with a rock in the center knocked one of the Glandelinians from his horse, killed two more with his pistol, and the rest of the Glandelinians terrified by theirlosses and the accuracy of the aim of the children, retreated and thus ended the fight.

At this occasion Penrod on his side had not a boy or girl hurt or killed but as for the rebels twenty five of them were killed and seventeen mortally wounded, and the rest simply driven off because of their loss.Thus they went up on untill they at last reached the camp and the two boys were praised highly for their rescuing child slaves and bringing them saftly to the lines and train them to fight at the same time.

ere was some sort of celebrat ion after their safe return, and then every one lowly dispersed.Then Penrod and the other s others cut across the main snow ared company streets to their own quarters, others remembering military rands to be attended to in the villiage section of the camp and directed eir courses in that direction.And finally a group of thirteen boys including nrod and the Rattlesnake boy started off, e being the last to leave the plce lace of celebration.They were going down the deserted company street talking itedly about their adventure and were just a passing general Evans headarters when they observed far off down the main company street, perhaps veral hundred yards and running swiftly tward them, as if it was impatient get somewhere, what appeared to be a great St Bernard Dog.The animal s running at a most unusually swift gait and its motions appeared peculiar most strange.This at once attracted the atr attention of the boys scouts when they stopped and looked more closely they noticed that the dog as ran hung its head in a very strange manner.

''Hallo''exclaimed Penrod''This is winter and out of season for such things to my own belief but look there boys all of you, there's something wrong with that St Bernard.See he is frothing heavily at the mouth.''

''My God.It is a maddog''Cried the Rattlesnake boy'' nd he is ming directly for us.''

''That's so''agreed Penrod''Hurry every one of you boys.Make for the nearest trees and then we'll shoot him.''

A quick glance told all of the boys very plainly and acd accurately, that Penrod and his companion was right.A mad dog is a terrible foe indeed for a party of boy scouts to meet and encoujter even if they armed are armed.To meet him here even with leveled guns would be soo late.But there were lots of trees in this sectionof the camp and allbthe boys lost not a moment in scrambling up into the branches.All but Penrod.He had also started for one of the nearest trees when suddenly it came to his mind that the Vivian Girls Princesses who had started the celebration had not at all returned home, and were also in the path of the mad dog.Most of them had left the house in a bevy, when the sele bration was over, but four of the Vivian Girls had headed for Colonel Evans headquarters under a row of pine t rees where they had been discussing the affairs and plans of their gene rals for a future battle.

Penrod absolutely knew they we re there but the dog was making straight down the company street, and would be upon them before they could even c know of their danger.Could it be possible for him to warn them in time.He decided that he would at least make the attempt.with a shout to his companions;;;;''The Vivian Girls''The Vivian Girls''he turned and ran down the company street at his utmost speed, the howling hydrophobia crazed dog following hard, and the boy scouts up in the trees gazing upon the terrible race with speechless dread.Penrod felt however that he had a good start on the mad dog and h he had his gun in his hand but he had forgotten to load it.However to his good luck it was a repeting rifle and so without ag abating his speed he hastily took two carti cartridges from his belt, and slipped them into the chamber of his gun.

''I'll climb igto s a tree and shoot him''he said to himself''If only I can warn the Vivian Girls out of the way''

But as he looked up he saw coming round the bend of the company street and sauntering tward him all of t he Vivian Girls and Gertrude Angeline and Jennie Turner and some others wih him absorbed in earnest conversation.At first he could not utter a sound and he feared that his knees would sink under himBut the next moment he cried out with all his might;;

''Girls, girls.Back, back.Climb the nearest trees for your lives.Mad dog mad dog.''

The Vivian Girls and those with him needde needed no second warning.They too at this moment were unarmed.With weapons in their possession they would not have fled from it.But being unarmed, and the sight of the dreadful frothing object spee ing down the company street in Penrods tracks was enough.They ran as probably h they had never ran before, reached the nearest trees in time, and clambered breathless up the trees to the sheltering brahones.Then all their fears were centered upon Penrod, who by this time had come up within reach of one of the trees.Ge turned to run to the tree when to the horror of all he tripped on a root hidden in the deep snow and he fell prostrate.He was up again in an instant but he did not have time to readh the tree.

The dog was already past the turn of the company street and was making tward him and the tree at a rapid swinging gait, its tongue out, the right eye half closed, the left unnaturally large and bloodshot and plainly to be seen, the mouth full of heavy white salvia thick and gluey substance and the jaws i opening and shutting in in vicious snaps.

Violet and her sisters could not stand itand one of them started to leave the tree, but fell back with closed eyes, while the others clung tremblingly to the branches pale and horrified.

Nevertheless Penrod to his credis credit faced the danger like a man instead of a boy.He knew that if he was bitten, the slightest touch of this those dripping jaws would bring sure death, but this was the time o for immediate action.Hastily kneeling behind the t3 tree he said to himself-''Now Marco Schofield Febrod the vivian girls say you are the greatest crack shot of all boys and girls in this war, better than even them.Prove it.''

And steadying his nerves with all the resolution that was in him, he leveled his rifle at the swiftly advancing mad dog and fired.Rubhis relief the poor dog falmt faltered and dropped---dead as Penrod believed.

But itwas only wounded, and staggering to its feet again it made another dash forward roaring and howling furiously.Penrod was no so encouraged so thankful that his shot had ben ture true that he raised his gun a second time he scarcely realised his danger and was almost as cool as if firing on target pq practice although the mad dog was barely three yards away.This was his last chance.The flash leaped from his rifle, and at the same moment he sprang up and ran for the tree as fast as his legs could carry him.But before the smoke had cleared a cry of joy came from all of the girls in the trees.He glanced back to see the dog lying dead upon the grounds.

quickly reloading his gun and never taking his finguer from the trigger he made his way back to the spot as carefully as possible.But nothing was to be feared now.He found the poor bruite brute quite dead, and its hour of agony over.The group that gathered round looked at one another and at the dog without saying a word.Then violet spoke;

''Stand back everybody.''It's dangerous to go too near.The dog may be unconscious and may co e to and spring on us.I've often heard that''.

A hint was suffisient.Indeed the shuddering girls had already turned away and the boys now drew aside though with rah rather an increduluous air.

''It ought to be buried deep just where it lies.''suggested the Rattlesnake boy and Penrod nodding a silent assesent added aloud;(('Poor fellow.Whose dog can he be I wonder?''

No one seemed to know.And as s soon as t he others had come back with spar spades it was buried as deep as they could dig in the hard ground. whole Indeed Penrod had surely won the gratitude of the whole division and had raised himself not a little in thexestimation of the vivian girls by his great encounter with the rabid St Bernad dog.That it was a case of Hydrophe Hydrophobia crazed dog let loose into the lines by some rascally landelinian spies was settled by the testimony of some returning scouts, who had seen some suspiciouslooking men lwt it out from a highchicken scoop they had brought it in, and who had seen the poor animal run into the company street made the generals al alarmed.Though all felt sorry for the dog, every body rejoiced that he had been put out of his misery and that he had not bitten any one in his mad run through the company streds. st reets.

A short time after this at the beginning of March Penrod and the Rattlesnake boy witnessed at a very close distance another fierce attempt of thw Angelinians to capture port ross Thumbelinia.The first of the eagem engagement opened at night with a tremendous artillery storm.The lightning flashes of the thousands of cannons and tumult of exploding shells and rolling of so many guns was most vivid.The sky and snow covered landscapes seemed to open and to have changed its nightly white hues for a great covering of red,blue, green, and lightning colored flame, while every second on this brilliant battleground the red flashes darting out their angry tongues of flame like as many fierce and goaded animals.yor hours unable to sleep from a din he had never heard before Penrod and the Rattlesnake boy gazed on this most magnificent and dreadful sight, they could not make up their minds to go to bed though despite all this de display snow also was pouring down in great torrents.

No one who has not ever witnessed a great thunder storm in the tropical climate can form an idea of the mingled beauty and terror of the effect.The scene of the artillery storm made a tropical thunderstorm and all the uproar of every whirlwind in the world formed into one appear to be silent compared to this din.For all the world Penrod or the Rattlesnake boy would not have missed this sight terrific and awe inspiring as it was.Toard midnight the artillery d ue w was at h its height and the sound of the contending cann w cannons and exploding shells as if roaring with a salvoes to defy the approach of the worlds end deadened every ther other sound.suddenly a noise more stunning than the rest struck upon their ear.It was the explosion of a great shell dangerously close t o the house, the sound it made was like that of a thousand deafening thunder reports clapping against each other followed by an another noise like that of hands clapping but probably five thousand times as loud.

The house with the two boys in it was only saved from instant destruction and with it doubtless their lives by the circumstance of the exploding shell being five hundred feet away, and the fragments instead of scattering in every direction with the eruption of flame, earth, smoke and clouds of snow flew straight upward and not reaching t he house.One of the most remarkable occurances during the great of this explosion was one which affected Penrod.At the same time that the blinding flash of the explosion was seen, Penrod suddenly felt a warm and most peculiar sensation on his left arm and immediately mentioned the circumstance to the Rattlesnake boy.yor many hours afterwards a very deep red mark about nine inches in length and two on width awas plainly to be seen in the place where he had felt the heat, and what he describedcas almost yla pain as he was mentioned mentioning.As he was standing directly before a window that was half way open to admit a little fresh air it is to suppose he recieved at the moment of the explosion the slightest possible shock from burning powder hurled that distance by the force of the blast.The escape the two boys had from this worse of dangers was great and providental indeed.

During the rest of the night the artillery duel continued with unabated fury.To sleep was impossible and as the boys lay on their cots, rosied from side t o side by the concussion and longing for day lig t daylight they heard a strange and unaccustomed sound inside their very sleeping quarters.On making a light to ascertain from whence it proceeded they found a perfect swarm of white winter rabbits which had come in from the outside to takeshelter from all the tumult outside.It was a strange situation for the two boyscouts to find themselves insepuring the entire nights bombardment such was h the force of thousands of explosions per hour, that many big guns on both sides were dismounted, the sky was seared with great eruptions of flame and smoke and flashes, tents far in the rear blew up like huge baloons and many blown into the orma Run River were floated many hundred yards from their orignial positions where the water was not frozen over untill they sank.The explosions even tore open a levee in the river on the enemy's side of the shore causing an immense flood and the greater part of the landelinian camp were almost under water for a day and boats were required to go from one barrackvto another before the water frose over.

A h n A hundred great fires occured during the night on both sides. ch an artillery due, dual as this however has never occured in the memory of the l oldest rebel or christian soldier, and some of the Abbisannian generals who had been at this seige since the beginning asserted that their previous experience presented no parallel for such a destructive artillery fire.The artillery fire of bot h sides had burst forth with wonderful suddeness and tremendous violence and lasted fully thirteen hours and then abated as suddenly as it had d commenced.

And it was believed that this tremendous bombardment was calculated to give one the impression that on some future day of the seige the flourishing fortifications and encampments of the enemy around vivian ickey may be swept away by the overwhelming incursions of Abbisannian artillery and infantry attacks.This reminded Penrod like what the battles of orma Cassannia and Jennie vivian might have been with all the force of the rebel and christian charges. and these battles stand unrivaled in concentration of fury.According to Penrods information the main section of the great seige had its first formation near the direction of the Angeline un in the location or the great Lucillie icksen ortifinations, and immediately extended west and southwestward impelled by what seemed to be a natura natural tendency.Starting slowly at first but sightly, instead of attempting to force their way through the strong works of the enemy at once, the christian besiegers only erected works and fortifications of their own.

Sometimes they had out loose with artillery duels that stunned the world, and some grand assaults,but more often the besiegers stayed within their own works while the general Armies under the two emperors of Abbisannia and others made attempts to relieve them only to have other landelinian armies come howling upon them from the outside and place themselves between the besiegers and the rei relisving forces.The attack that broke Manleys power to prevent mperor Vivians wforts to reach Vivian ickey with-reinforcements came December the twenty fifty upon Evangelinia Crania along un Bome Creek and the movement of the attackers had been slowly west and slightly north.In the afternoon it was general all along the line.or a time the pressure began to tell on the enemy, and the heavy attack finally swept all before it .

One portion of the attack apparently changed to a more northerly course gathering force upon Evangelinia Crania Heights as it went.Here the worse of the struggle broke loose ending with a repulse of general Hansons army with the most frightful loss.The battle elsewhere however was a great christian success.

A day after Conrod with witnessed the bombardment of Thumbelinia there issued from the ormormous christian camps a wonderful column of men clad in purple. far to the south it had begun its formation, a steady ormormous surge teeming with bayonets and standards, that made the w scene seeme viewed t by the boys from the distance most beautiful.

The first notice the boys had of this formation of this unusual column of troops was in the early morning of March the second, when the column so wide and long upon the vast field of snow seemed like a purple abyss, yawning up twqrd them, suddenly a change touched the column like the swaying shadow of a vast motion.First the whole surge appr appeared to writhe bodily like an ernormo us serpent , then it formed itself to a longer and narrower line, but straight, the line then began to spread outward, and move forward tward t he fortifications of Thumbelinia---a monsterous screaming surge, an immeasureable formation of charging troopsmoving as swift as a cloud as it seemed to Penrod and the Rattlesnake boy.Then far off in the distance the boys heard the noise of heavy firin firing like the sound of w ernormous sighs dying away at regular intervals as if some monster pausing to draw breath.

For a long time this sound continued and in each pause could be heard the answering fire of the attackers as if the rhythem of the rebel fire molded itself a after the rhythem of the attackers fire as if the wavering of the sound responded precisly to the wavering of the other---and a billow of smoke for every discharge, and a creak for every other sound.The forcs of the attack in the distance grw before their eyes, and faster and faster b came the discharge exchanged between each other.

Soon the distant battle assumed a proportions that appalled the two boy scouts it was o ne wild scene of smoke and flash of musketry and cannon, the Glandelinian fire was attacking the assaulting waves t o pieces, and veiling the whole region with a o fog of dense smoke.There we re now mad stunning bursts of crashing cannon thunders.Then there was a morewried sound like a voice moaning across theworld utt ering night mare sounds, and with each stupendous owl cry of noises, other sounds seemed to deepen more and more dismally through all that scene.From the nort hwest like big breakers of the sea the Angelinian forces also rolled into the enemy's encampments which seemed to broaden into a bellowing flood of purple and smoke and fire.go the tumult of battle swelled and the turmoil hightened like a great typhoon untill within an hour after it started it swayed back, an attack badly wrecked and repulsed.

Penrod and his companion the Rattlesnake boy could bear no more, and left their high point of view.The whole repulse brought with it a most sinister apparition looming through the rents of smoke clouds, a re-coil ing purple wave now shattered.This sanguinary scene magnified appallingly, seemed torn up like the qrithing forms of a dismembered serpent.A moment and this horrible spectre vanished in another clouds of smoke formed over the scene and as the r uproar soon sounded along thecvery christian camp showing the rebels had counter attacked to the boys remained to see no more of it.

OTHER AUGO ACCOUNTS OF THE HORRORS OF CHILD SLAVERY.

FOLLOWING closely upon the many scenes of the most intense embrassments of the various Abbiannian governments in the matters of the efforts to put down the horros of child slavery has now come even a great rr annoyance through the horros of apparently a losing war, the long resistance of the rebellious states of Glandelinia and through the reports that the horrors of child slavery is ever on the rapid increase.Before the gar the enemy had in his possession over five million child slavns.Now in Glandelinia's possession was nearly twenty eight million, and most of these especially those who were able were forced into the army service in helping to build works, fortifications and digrtrenches.

Mn Many child slaves when ever they saw the opportunity fled from t he Glandelinian armies to seek shelter within the christian lines.The child slaves had been summoned to leave their christian friends and return to whore they had belonged.Knowing what terrible punishment would be dealth them should theyvdo so, they refused.

On account of all these indi incidents many of the rebel masters and chiefs themselves had been overpowered by christian or Angelinian and Abbiannian spies and killed orassinated.,children persued by rebels were found when rescued with their faces and bodies cut and mutilated by the knif knives of the rebel persuers persuers or mangled and torn by bullets and fragments of shells.Many of the persuers when captured by the Angelinians instead of being held as ordinary prisoners of war held were held for murder and also for terrible atrocious destruction of the beauties of many of the prettier child slaves.But many of those who had beentaken could not be proven guilty of ever having had anything to do with these affairs.Not even such a thing could come about that it was likely that they would bepunished in any way.Even now Abbiannin has too many serious troubles to pay any attention to the private vengeance of the masters over their escaped child slaves.The punishing by torture of child slaves was about equally the same and equally as cruel aw the punishments of the unfq unfathiful wives over in India by their Rajahs..The worse or slightest of the Glandelinians seemed to have been gifted with extraordinary imaginations in the ways of torture and vengeance they woul n would met out to escaped child slaves.Yet all those captured were either proven or not proven guilty but nevertheless the Abbiannian government has thus far managed to keep their names fr m from becoming public, but despite it all the shred shrewd war correspondents made the details to be known.

One serious incident happened when a general of Manleys army discovered that about thirty of the boy and girl s n slaves in his command had plotted to rebell and make a break of for freedom.Mad with rage the general ordered the slaves to be carried off where it was understood the boys themselves were quickly put to death by being burned at the stake.The fullfury of the generals wicked anger and also blood lust was however re served for the girls.He and even his officers appeared t o be enraged to the very verge of insanity by the thought that the slaves would flee to the christian lines and report all they know about the conditions and size of the Glandelinian armiews.The general deliberately sat down to think of themost cruel death he could imagine for the poor girls.His choice choice soon fell on the atrocious method of execution described by Allen Poe in his story''The pit and the Pendulum''a m method which has just now anywhere only been practicece practice practiced in the far ease east.Sick or well all the other hundreds of child slaves were com- pelled to be present at the horrible scene, no excuse whatever was excepted.They saw the child slaves who a few days before had been the chief plotters of the rebellion al of them on their backs, stripped stark naked, and bound hand and foot to the floor of the big circus like tent .The general made a long speech to the effect that they had been invited there for their own good that they m ght know what a faithless slave could expect when plotting to start a rebellion.A long heavy pendulum in East E Indian Fashion was suspended from the high va lted ceiling of the tent, and this ad advanced with slow majestic swings across the room of the interior and returned.Back and forth it went like that of a clock.And wh t what held the eye of everyone one was the glittering blade of some immense specially made sabre and which was at the bottom of the pendulum.It was sometime however before all those who witnessed it were sure that the pendulum was gradually getting lower, and each trip swinging imperseptibly closer to the bodies of the little girls.It could have been related that the victims in terror and horror watched the flashing thing with their eyes and felt the breese of it on their skin for a full hour in fascinating silence.Yet the first burn of the sword on one of their bodies then broke the spell.She crieduit and drew in the muscles of her abdomen.After a while it touched another girl and she begged for mercy, cried, raved and strove to flatten her body against the floor of the tent .

The glandelinian general however answered their prayers by saying;
"Vile traitorous slaves, you every one of you shall pass many hours in dying and all the time you shall think that you have brought this dreadful death onnyourselves by your treachery, when you might have continued to enjoy your former lives."
Hours and hours passed as the rebel general had planned before the descending sabre sliv sliced their bodies one by one into bits.There was no possibility that the long sabre would have cut their bonds and released them as happened in the man in Poes story of the"Pit and the Pendulum"
The other terrified slaves looked on in silence feeling indeed that some simula similar end would befall them if they ever offended the general.The last stages of the execution indeed were too dreadful to be described.During their torture singing soldiers, brass bands, and ministrels played C the marches of Child Slavery for ever, and "down with Chirstianity, and all other kinds of glandelinian pieces.
And a/l these things placed the Abbiesnnian governments inca big an a unaccountable dilemma.Despite the fury of the resistance against the rebellion they were putting through they could not find any way to stop the horrors of chid slavery and to such inhuman slaughters and orders and mul mutilat ions of child slaves.They wondered and wondered and planned again and again on how they could ever stop it.All purposes had been made to stop and p punish the vengeful powerful glandelinian officials who had been taken prisoners, but all others had joined them in similar deeds, and worse of all they had the solid backing of the common people and armies of the entire glandelinian nation.The glandelinian aurthovities did not understand would not want to understand what the Abbiesnnian governments were fussing q a out about..From their own viewpoint the child slaves who rebelled or who attemped to run away or betray t heir masters to the christian armies deserved death and torture, and it was the duty and full privilege of the generals and other commisioners to choose the most horrible torture they could invent.
Outside of the christian countries it is thought that an execution of child slaves is of litt le o moral benefit to the community unless done in public and with long drawn out torture.
Such sane terrible episodes have also ben always been in common in the history of the East especially in India and are attributed to p in part of the Orin Oriential way or regarding women.ut the child slave were treated worse.
The glandelinians no matter what they are takes an attitude t ward child slaves t hat only the most foul fiends of hell could have done.
The awful notorious gurajah powlah, Nawab of Bengal, who imprisoned the Europeans in the black hole of Calcul Calcutt a and punished a dancing gilr girl in a dreadful but ingenious manay manner for bey betraying him is a saint c-mpared to the less of the wicked glandelinian generals.hey have even done sim lar things to child slag es.Once when the vivian girls had been captured by the enemy while out spying general Federal himself ordered them bound to stakes and a Ratt lesnake he/d held by a stripe of rawhide sin six inches from them.The rawhide slowly stretched in the sunlight and the angered snake reached nearer and nearer to its victims.It struck at them again and again without t ouching them and only a long time afts it would have delivered the fatal blow to one of them if it had ot been for the fact that a force of Angelinian soldiers seeing the incident rescued them, and killed the snake. Yet they were almost aws xwell off as if they had died a hundred deaths in ant icipitation ant icipation.
Another glandelinian general tried the same st unt that Tippo sahib the venious sultan of Mysore of the eighteenth century.The vivian girls had also been captured by him and he had planned to put them to death in a most dreadful manner.He intended to to what the Indian Chief had done to tie each of the beautiful little girls up in a sack with a wild cat a puma and a deadly snake.It would be possible that in the fight between the animals and the snakes the unfort unate vivian girls would be bound to be torn to pieces or bitten fatally.This however failed as through some good luck they managed to seize some weapons in time, shot the general dead and twenty of his officers and escaped from the rebel lines in the face of a storm of bullets and thundering cannon.
Even general Manley h d twice proved his terrible enemity of the vivian girls.Once violet alone had been caught by his soldiers and he ordered her to be chained to a fierce wolf that had been caught by a short chain.The animal thus tied up would have been unable to kill the little girl quickly and would have been obliged to knaw her slowly to death.
As he was about t o commit the crime he had said to her sneeringly;
"no you enjoy the beautiful embrace of the wolf better than your fathers."
Good hick also saved her and Manley lay in bed after that for two weeks from a bullet wound she had inflicted on him.he had secretly dres his own gun and shot him in the shoulder and escaped.

there was another scene made up for torturing the vivian girls if they were ever caught again.This scene of torture showes the fiendish charnoter of the rebels.Even in that country girls and women fear rats and mice just as well as they do over here.Many times child slaves shared a like fate as this;
the slave if a girl would be tied upon her back and a large metal box box is placed upside down on her naked stomach.Under the edge of this box a big rat or ounce mouse would be slipped.After the ne rvious agony of feeling the dost detested creature cle crawling around on the naked skin begins fo pall, the wicked t orturer places a number of live hot coals on top f the box replacing them as fast as they cool, until the air within the box becomes unbearably hot for the imprisoned mouse or rat.hen he can stand it no longer the rat or mouse escapes in the only way he can by knawing a tunnel through the living flesh of the child to freedom.It should be remembered that in all the world no equal cruelty no matter how devilish had ever been common or practice as this to child slaves in Erupie in mediaeval times.
Another stunt that the glandelinians dmitted just in the same windoo fashion was thus;
General Stoneman caused twenty girl slaves all under ten years of age to be bound to the ground.Upon their prostrate bodies he had soldiers built a heavy wooden platform.hen formed it into a small shed or house.hen he and his officers fonsed long on this platform or house while he laughed at the groans of the dying slaves beneath.

For over a month and a half it had appeared to Angelinia as well as to the very hope of Glandelinia and Manley himself that general Hanson and his vast armies had mysteriously disappeared from view almost like a rabbit who disappears into a hole and never shows up. No one anywhere among the Angelininns or the Wicked-Glandelininns themselves knew where he would reapp reappear and when general Concentinian Aronburg then moving forward t ward Jennie Turner was appealed to he only said "I always when out hunting rabbids when a lad and always knew which hole a rabbit or other game went into but never could tell which hole or orifice of exit they would come out of and so lost them."

He nevertheless felt utmost confidence in his superior general Han on Vivian but nevertheless was there was the most intense anxiety throughout all of the Angelinian loyal states and countries about his fate and that of his grand Abbieannian and Angelinian army. It was feared by many that he andhis whole army may have wlked into some dangerous trap or ambuse de ambuscade and that his army had been anj annihilated and he himself slain with his brother and the poor Vivian Girls. In themeantime general Hanson Vivian and his brother was marching swiftly through the state of Angeline Vine. His army nearly fifty million strong combined with the thirty million of his brothers stretched out in a great line, eighty miles from wing to wing with a hundred men in one rank for the frontal portion of the advance and this immense snake formed line of men and artillery and wagons swept an immense path of destruct ion through the heart of the Calverinian state.

There was almost r go resi resistance at the beginning of the advance of general Hansons army for the troops had cleverly left behind the Glandelinian armies that had under general Izner Myletze that had opposed him and his brother before Glenn Gleenore and it seemed as if the march of the two main christian generals and their armies was more like a holiday parade rather th n than serious wq r. Their main source f supplies was of the country through which they passed and it was indeed the grim business of the hour to make it as incapable as possible for the rebel aurthorities t o furnish further supplies for the Glandelinian armies anywhere in the state of Angeline Vine. To many of the rescued child slaves the approach of the immense armies of Angelinian soldiers was their day of "Happy jul jubilee and scores of thousands of them who had been rescued and set free followed either christian army on its progress.

Great extents of railroads were destroy destroyed and hundreds of bridges were equally destroyed damaged and burned, as the fierce fierce armies lf Angelinians moved onc onward. At Rosales the capitol of the state of Angeline Vine the Angelinian soldiers took possession of the many deserted buili buildins, the generals used for their headquarters the many deserted Legislature halls and other buildings and general Hanson Vivian slept on the floor of the rebel governer Generals Mansion.. At last fourteen days after leaving Elsnore the army reached the river called Marie Mic-Allister Run at the point where the mouth of the Angeline Vine Creek empties into the river, a few miles below Toadanna. Here was concentrated a vast Glandelinian army under general Rivhard Tamerline. After a desperate assault by general Kindernines divisions the positions in front of the town and then the town itself was captured, and the arival of the two immense christian armies was signlled to some of the Angelinian w warships of the Abbiesannian fleet lying outside on the river and thus the first knews of the whereabouts of general Hanson Vivian was communicated to the Angelinian governments at Angelinia Agathia(Calverinia) and Sacramento(Abbiesannia)))

A few days afterwards the town surrendered to the Angelinians and on Feburary seventeenth general Hanson Vivian sent to general Concentinian Aronburg a famious dispatch which at the news went such great gladness to the he arts of loyal men of the Angelinian states throughout Angelinia;;

"Your generalship Concentinian Aronburg ;

I thought it best to encoyrage you with the news that I have without serious battles captured the town of Gondanna with one thousand two hundred and fity cannons and plenty of ammunition, stores, rebel cotton bales, and about twent y five million small arms and many gathling guns, and nearly a million prisoners."

General Hanson Vivian.

Governer general.

Angelinia-Abbi sannia, Abyssinkile.

It was hardly possible at all for any generation whatever to imagine the feeling with whi h which the news of general Hanson Vivians great march so far was recieved th oughout the loyal Angelinian states of Abbiesannia. For nearly a year o and a month the cause of the Angelininns Holy nd just as it had been, with fight ing of superior armies had been in suspense. Victories as we have already related had been so closely followed by new dissarters, disasters untill the hearts of the the Angelinian governments and many of the christian generals almost died within them. Once or twice general Mansion had prom pronounced that Angelinia's Cause seemed uttorly hopeless. General Hansons most famious march of the end of the first yearcof the war was the first indication of fini final triumph, the probable first gleam of dawn which seemed to give sure promish of returning hopr hope for the cause.

Never in a million lives were such glad and thankful hearts as in the breasts of those and of Concentinian Aronburg and Mansion who read general Hansons happy message the fr prophecy of the hope of the end of the long struggle. After reaching Gondanna the Angelinian army grown larger rested awhile and general Hanson did all his his power t o re-organize civils affairs in that war stricken town and provide for its proper government.. When a few daysalter he turned his face still more northward, and s set outon the final march or final part of the c march throughsouthern andnorthern Angeline Vine, to meet general Concentinian Aronburgarmy then moving down tward the south and headed for T Jennie Turner. A letter from general H n Hanson Vivian to his little girl friend Gertrude Angeline dated at GoldilocksAngeline Vine, February 23th 1913. gave a graphic account of only a part of this n latter northward march;;;;;;;

MY DEAR LITTLE FRIEND AND HEROINE GERTRUDE ANGELINE.

I got here to day from the battlefield of Maya Angeline Vine twenty miles north of Goldilocks yesterdaylut all of my army and my brothers did not as yet get in untill to day. We have already been marching for over half a month in low swampy, nd then hill country, with very bad roads, broken bridges, and all obstructions through deep snow of March Blizzards, and had to bridge many large rivers thrown into flooded stages by the rebels in an attempt to stem my advance and we certainly had a hard time besides the fighting, which seemed to b me to be the easiestpart.

Gertrude I advise you to take your Geography and look at the state of Angeline Vine. We started to resume our march from the town of Gondanna, crossed the Angeline Vine River there and occ occupied the the countries from Robertsonia to Bunnia Ventinia. We then marched in double lines tward Caseynine, crossed the small stream called the Stanok River and got on the Mic-Hollester and Pandora Railroad from Broadway to Brawner Morein. Then we marched from Victor Luger crossing the creek called the Glatenia, then the Meldon and Picknell Rivers, then Winnie Pannie Crook and turned eastward to Chickadee Run, crossing the Evangeline St Clir later. At ChinChickadee Cre k we crossed at Padlula and marched through Bandebulla to Juneville inthe same state of Angeline Vine. then we crossed Hono Guard River, and marched up about twenty five miles near Jo Jhones where we had a pretty pretty smart battle with a rebel force of Wheeler Glandelinians, then t ward Goldilocks, and the junction of three rivers called "Three Bears mouths where we had a real furious and bloody battle which we won of course. Here we have two railroad crossings, M Mic-Hollester and Pandora and Senden Railroads one going down south to Angelinia Agathia and tye the other to Glorianna. ships of all kinds also came to these places and have in them c, clot clothing, foodand feed for horses. It will ta e us some days to get the damaged railroads fixed up so as to bring my armies and my brothers what we may need for our su pplies so that we may be here some time.

No doubt all of the Angelinian papers or newspaper and magazines willpublish many letters, which I know you will have a chance to read telling you all about our adventures and the adventures of Violet and her sisters my noices. You may not understand how I and my brother took the towns of Gaddliner and Hanna without going near them of or fighting tremendous battles but these two cities are on the shores of the great Mic-Hollester Run River, where thecountry is somewhat poor itself, and all the fleeing people siding with the Glandelinians or the rebels themselves had to eat came from the interior by railroad. Now when my army and my brothers were in the interior, we broke up all the scores of miles ofrailroads, and ate all the provisions we could secure, so that all of the Glandelinian armies here had to either leave or starve. I knew of this way before hand, and had many small armies on ships and fleets ready to take possession when the rebels left portions of the states.

Our soldiers had beenfighting for these two towns for nearly a year, but to my opinion they did not go aboutit right.. so you can see what power is knowledge.

It took the town of Gondanna itself fortified with nearly a thousand guns without any severe fighting at all and only with the loss of a hundred men. While you and little Jennie Turner are with general Concentinian Aronburgs army now for a while you must write to me more fre frequently for I supposse hearafter I will be near Torrington and will not again be so far from friends and our ships, so that I will recieve and be ableto write letters more frwuen ly to them all. I and my brother and violet andother sisters are all in good health, so is my other generals and child friends. I sent Jennie Turner your companion and friend a pretty picture from Goldilocks and now send you a story of "The Three Bears which I secured from some rebel home. It is a good story and you can tell bett er than I if it be a good likeness of other same stories I and you have read together. My best love to all.

GENERAL Hanson Vivian.....

During one portion of the advan ce the loyal section of Angeline Vine state indeed observed one of the grandest sights of this history I'm writing. It was as if it had been a final review of the Angelinian armies so grand was the appearance of the troops.

During this march the long ranks of purple and red coated soldiers in their full uniforms, with the east swing and perfect drill of veterans of Heaven itself, moved up and down roads throughsmall towns and villiafes in what seemed an endless pre procession, lea each regiment led by bands playing all pieces that many have never heard before even Repasa March.On his black Arabian horse with the chief officers of the government and the generals of the christian army by him all on horse back advancing with the army in front marched the hero of Angelinia general Hanson Angelic vivian and there advanced with him the man who had bravely and almost recklessly faced with him the deadly hurricane hailstorm of shells and grape and canister at Evangelinia Crania, who at his words swept up the heights of Evangelinia Crania, who shared his triumphs at Jennie vivian and Aurandocallio and bal battles at St Dominean fortifications. Indeed what thoughts must have stirred the heart of Angelinia's greatest commander has he recieved the salutes of the devoted generals whom he had so often lead to victory. What memories must have risen of the brave ones missing incountless numbers from those ranks who with many a great and superior genera, general had given their lives for th at of god and the nation.

The great an first christian general of all the Angelinian armies throughout the nation had been not only throughout the nation but also throughout the whole world itself has been the occasion of more controversy than any other man or general in any real history of the world itself. General Hanson Vivian as we all will know of by and by had many of the most able defenders--for probably no general in all the real world, or that world, or in any Angelinian nation or any one who had ever lived in b fables or reality had such a great power to inspire all those around him with love and admiration and even the verdict of any history either fable or real according to my opinion here for this story can say that he lacked any qualities essential success to the highest pitch and it will be admitted here and man other places in this fabled history I have written that one of the most greatest , bravest and yet sas saddest commanders of the Angelinian Clandelinian war was general Hanson Angelic vivian.

All throughout the feist first year of the war general Hanson vivian had always been able to rely on any of his best commanders. Between Feb and March during his campaign tward Torrington his general Kindernine had been on the point of recieving promotion for gallent conduct at De Lux Contreras only a small battle but nevertheless won it. General Kindernines operations were even so brilliant at the skirmish at Howard Churubusco that after the battle of Torrington he was placedin command of the main army of the Angelinian cause, and then of all the armies of Angelinia in the southwest to the great satisfaction of the whole country of Angelinia which looked upon him and Hanson their superior and others as the greatest military geniuses within its borders at least.

But general Hanson vivians great transcendent power to organize great Angelinian armies and inspire them withall theutmost confidence confidence and t enthusiasm were splendidly proved already on two occasions, first after the disasterous battle of Eas Ester Starring early in the war when out of the dreadful chaoes of defeat and disorder, he created, equipped and descimplined the greater Angelinian Armies, and again after the second and worse disaster at Calverine Hills when begged and urgently requested by the Abbisannian government he nobly resumed the command when so discouraged as to almost give up the interprise, reorganized his beaten and demorilized armies with marvilious skill and celerity and defeated Manley in the memorable battle of SeSunbeam Creek or Jennie vivian.Unfortunately from the beginning there was discord between him and some of the Calverinian governments or aurthorities who he suspected on account of the capture of vivian wickey were treacherious and unloyal to him. and which at that time increased the enormous difficulty of his task. After the fall of vivian ickey, general Hansons repulse at Calverine Hill, and of the earlier disaster at Ester Starring, many of the Angelinian forces had been cmapletely dispirited, raw, frightened, without faith in the cause, and in despair.General Hanson had to sent new generals to these commands and go himself elsewhere to bring order out of chaoes, to create new armies and to send immense forces from Angelinia to defend the Capital of Angelinia in Southern Calverinia near Glorinanna and porothy Gale called Angelinia Agatha.

On account of his enforced delays he looked on with suspicion of the government aurthorities of Calverinia, and especially when one of the Government aurthorities tried to play the boss of their own superior and constantly urged a forward movement against the enemy when he knew it would be dangerous.

The plans of the campaign against vivian wickey also were the cause of much differences between the governer general and the Angelinian Secretary of war when which later Hanson took from his office and placed another in his stead. At the same time general Hanson had besieged vivian Wickey, there had come elsewhere inCalverinia the campaign of general vivianis known as the Little ware Cam a campaign with t e advance of these troops on Calverine, the battles of Julian and Keystoner and the great conflict atVitagraph where the Clandelinians under generals Tamerline was defeated and the confusion and disorder in the Clandelinian ranks were so great that the rebel possessionin Calverinithere could have been quickly captured had the Angelinian forces been in any good condition to advance. Yet on account of his own disasterous defeat at Calverine Hill, and on account of the capture of C Vivian wickey by the enemy, and also of non-support during his own plans of the seige, which resulted in the repulse at Lieghburg Landing and Evangelinia Crania, and the dr awn conflictat Sunbeam Creek general Hanson had lost confidence of the Calverinian Administration he had placed there before the outbreak of the war and aschis requests for reinforcements, and demands for continued reinforcements was re disregarded, he had therefore been compelled to evacuate the peninsula portion of the seige line at Evangelinia Crania and move his armies further from the regular line of seige and start dangerous operations near Aurandeca illio. In that terrible emergency when general

Millford Plutonia resigned his command the Angelinian government now afraid of the resultz of the seige going on and of the greater armies of rebels rushing into Calverinia turned to general Hanson their superior as the only man who they knew could inspire order and confidence, and sent him armies in great sizes when it was too late. On account of this blunder general Hanson vivian notified Abbisannia that the governments of Calverinia did not obey his commands at all that the Administration in Abbisannia should make it possible to afford new men for the Administration in Calverinia as many there will ther efore be relieved of their offices and disco discharged-as soon as possible. when the loyal part of Calverinia knew that general Hanson or governer Hanson as he really was was taking away the offices of many of the Calverinian administration and having betters men placed in their stead their joy and new hope were unbounded. Flushed withhis recent victories at Calverine Hills, Ester Starring, and in the bloody battle near or around vivian wickey general Manley had advanced with new and bigger and fresher armies into the s state of Angeline wine where Angelinia Agathia was and therefore general Hanson had to cover the three places Angelinia, Agatha, Dirothy Gale, and Ozma and at the same time stop the rebel movements and invasion in the state. Paulinia was the great battle ground of this movement. The co combined losses in this clofilet was about sixty thousand thirty t housand killed wounded and prisoners on both sides.

While it was believed to be called a drawn battle by many the forcing back of the vanguard of Manleys army and the renewed northward retreat of Manley tward Corringt on stamped Paulinia as really a great Angelinian victory. It was assated asserted that if general Hanson had reattacked the Clandelinian forces and brought on one of the general and big battles with all the power of his armies at his disposal and persued Manley clear out ofthe state the whole Clandelinian cause right then there and there would have been crushed or demolished . Still general Hanson was in needof supplies of all kinds, his army from the disasters near vivian wickey was used up, he had new recruits from Dorothy Gale and he did what was best in his judgement. Moreover at the time it can be known to the reader that the only plan since his abandonment of the seige of vivian wicky Wickey was one of only ''per the renewed defensde of Dorothy Gale and Angelinia Agatha and which could not by any st retch of construction or reconstruction be taken to authorize an offensive movement through any other op portion of Calverinia untill he felt sure he had done away wt with general John Manley who was a tiger for a fighter and equally as clever and brave as general Hanson vivian Himself. .....

General Hanson vivian had declared himself to Gertrude Angeline in a short letter;

''Dear Gertrude my friend;

''I have fought the bloody skirmish or battle of Paulinia in the manner as if my vanguard had a rope around its neck and with the certainity that if the small column had lost the engagement I would have been compelled to bring on a battle with Manley of such violence as to cause the greatest losses ever and be accused by t he world of being a butcher and exs exceeding the violence of battles at so early a time of the year. Manley just now had one hundredmillion and-I had only sixty five millionAs soon as I had given orders and supplies to general Kindernine he started to move forward, and was on the eve of battle in a most favorable poso position when I recisved a notice from the Co Government that they requested the removal of Kindernine from command which they wanted to confer to general Herdrude johnston. I notified them by gov telegraph to mind their own buisness that I'm running the war and not they. My friend general Kindernine though set aside by the careless Administration of Calverinia never o lost his hold upon my confidence or his soldiers and generals. The army idolizes hum him and his populiarity follows h him wildly.. Even poor Kindernine by the careless Governeny and even myself had been severely critised and vigoriously assailed by many of my own officers and generals on the charge of over cautiousness, alleged hesitancy and failures to grap grasp all the opportunities which our enemies have placed o in our way when no opportunities come. If we act rash we ruin the cause of Angelinia and they know it. I and many of the court marshalls have clearned general Kindernine of all blames for results which were and are often beyond his control and he is now given by me his deserved place among the great leaders of the war and I have forwith withdrew from the Administration all those I suspected for the cause of the fall of vivian wickey by their carelessness and placed better men from Abbisannia in their stead.

Your Friend.
General Hanson Angleic vivian.
Governer of Angelinia and Ruler of Nation.

The opinion of many of the best, and highest Clandelinian commanders as to general Hanson vivians ability as a general in chief were always of necessary special weight. It was not long after the dreadful disaster at Calverine Hills when general John Manleys Clandelinian armies elated overtheir victories were pouring southward with the purpose to twarth general Hansons movemen movements twurd vivian Wickey general Manley one day recieved a sudden despatch which seemed to him to be of the most greatest importance.General Cam Calnannin Shocannnin who was one of his subordinates seeing him read it with an anxious look in his face was overanxious to know its con contents..

"What is the news your excellency if you don't mind telling me?" he inquired of his superior.

"It is the worse news that can ever be possible." Replied the Glandelinian general most gravely. "General Hanson had left Vivian Dickey to follow me and is in command of new and big armies."

Modest and retiring as general Hanson was, and quaintly in character he had withal great self respect, respect for others, a gracious dignity and had friendship for all the lowest persons and even played games with privates and officers alike and treated all alike and punished all alike. His personal magnetism was indeed most unparalled in any mi, milis military History, even than the first Great Napoleon, and he was literally the Idol of his officers and men and all his officers and men would obey him when all other control failed.

During the campaign no victory of the Angelinian armies in the end of the first year of the war was probably more inspiring than that won by general Hanson Vivian at Elston on the last day of Feburary. and inspiring victories were at that time very much needed indeed. It was general in nature and so an account of that battle could also be a picture of general Hanson Vivians character for it was the simple force of his presence and also personality which transformed many demorilized fugitives into determined fighters.

It was really one of the most glrious victories general Hanson Vivian had probably won in his service in the whole war and was at the battle of Elston twenty miles north of Port Hy Gale, and much closer to the town of Osma. when general Kindernines forces in full array stormed the heights of Julianna Ridge and general Mic-Cantler stormed the summit of Standard Hill General Kindernine was in command of four divisions and at the outbreak of the battle which was a tremendous conflict his forces emerging from the timber of the north braon of the Mic-Whitther run woods in which the line of battle was formed the troops charged at the double quick ab against general Izner Mylstze's army moving across an open plain under heavy fire against the first line of nine mile rifle pits and sand bag breastworks at the foot of the ridges. After four hours desperate fighting in which Kindernine reported his losses as dreadful the Glandelinians were driven out of their works with ermormous numbers killed and greater numbers wounded, and many more capt: captured and with the loss of twenty five guns and stores of ammunition and one million dollars worth of baggage for army use in the captured rebel wagon train.

THE RESULTS OF THE ELSTON HORROR.

The Angelinian forces under general Kindernine and Mic-Cantler did not stop for any further orders from general Hanson Vivian but rushed on up the ascent against the second line of the rebel lines driving the Glandelinians which had been forced from the other works up the hills before them and against their comrades in the second line half way to the summit and pressing them so hard that they could not have any chance to rally.

At that very moment a messenger had come from general Hanson Vivian with the word that only the first line of works should be carried or attacked as he had not wished to make a general battle just then. But it was too late when the message came to generl general Kindernine already the hundreds of thousands of men were pressing up the hill like immense swarms of ants in the face of a storm of bullets, grape and canister and shot and shell that committed incapable damage. But nevertheless to order them back now was out of the question. Officers had tried to do so but amid the din of the conflict the soldiers either were unheeding or did not hear, and with terrific yells that deafening the officers they rushed on with irresistible force carried the second line of rifle pits on the summit and then met the rallied enemy in a most desperate and dogged hand to hand fight on the main upper summit and drove all of the Glandelinians from their guns and sent the panic stricken survivors flying down like snowballs on the opposite side of the slope, persued by a storm of stones, and hard snowballs from the Angelinian troops who had not time to reload. Before all of Mic-cantlers men had reached the crest of Standard Hill the demorilized troops of general Iyner Mylstz right wing were seen with a large train of speeding wagons flying along the valley in a stampede half a mile behind. It was general Kindernines and Mic-Cantlers brilliant conduct in this brilliant two hours assault which gave general Hanson Vivian the very greatest confidence in them which he always afterwards felt and when a few days afterwards he had at once desired to have general Kinfernines and Mic-Cantlers assistance in every movement he made.

The cause of the outbreak of the battle was that general Hanson har had learnd learned from Correspondents, and from a note sent to him by Gertrude Angeline that general Manley had sent general Izner Mylstze to make a famious movement through the Valley of Sunbeam junction Run and into the southern portion of the State of Angeline vins, and threaten Angelinia Agatha, Dorothy Gale and even Osma. As general Izner Mylstze move moved to obey Manley de disaster to Angelinia indeed seemed imminent. A small part of general Hansons army was therefore detatched and sent south to not on only protect Angelinia Agatha but to intercept general Mylstzes movements and then general Hanson Vivian dispatched general Joseph Barger with his cavarly to the vally to also try and inter e int erscept the movements of Mylstzes army while general Hanson changed his own course and lea ing Manley to himself followed after Izner Mylstzes army n and after some days in southward marching and man meney maneuvering general Hanson having overtake him had been determined not to attack untill he could get the enemy at a disadvantage as he co knew t he nature of the insurgent general he faced. On the last day of Feb. Hanson had ordered Kindernine to attack at eight o-clock in the morning and no attack had been made at the time assigned and general Hanson growing impatient visited Kindernine, expecting to suggest a plan of operations and found that Kindernine through some chos blunder ha had not received the order to attack. At that time general Mylstze had unwisely divided his armies, and placed two divisions on those formidable heights and so by desperate attacks, and flanking him right and left general Kindernine and Mic-Cantler had broken his strong lines in every direction and sent his defeated Glandelinian troops flying from the summit of the two hills and whirling through the valley to the main army further be o beyond with a loss of 44,500 in slain.

"General Hanson had said later;

"The results of this victory that morning were such that I never could ever dream it necessary to visit general Kindernine beforegiving him further orders. On that morning however general Kindernine felt imbrassed on having felt he only won a partial victory and was not content with the results as great as it was. He persued the broken Glandelinian divisions for nearly thirty miles and just when he thought himself safe and beyonf reach a renewed the attack at once in front and on the main flank routing the divisions completely and capturing one hundredand evelen thousand prisoners and sixteen more guns. Again general Kindernine resumed the persuit of his antagonist and drove him completely out of the valley and into the gaps of the Glordenna Ridge. This double victory had a startling effect both in Angelinia and Glandelinia combined. The people in Angelinia were wild and jubilant, the troops of general Izner Izner Mylstze were throughoutly beaten and disheartened. General Kindernine had so devastated the valley region in two days of following general Izner Mylstze that it would not furnish him support for his own troops and he retired to Cendernna creek untill general Hansons army came up. From this point he was called to general Hansons headquarters for a consultation about changing the course of the advance on as more and while absent from his command the enemy under general Mic-Hollester Johnston having come up from the south with a large army att acked his furid forces furiously Dalelawnburg captured Kindernines whole encampment, drove back his four divisions in the greatest disorders imaginable and captured two hundred and eighe eighteen guns and nearly one million one hundred thousand prisoners.

General Kindernine returning from general Hansons headquarters stopped for a while to joke with some little children in Hansons lines near the front and while doing so he was startled and surprised by the sound of most heavy firing and knew at once that a big battle was in progress. So fearing it was his own troops he immediately rode forward and almost accomplished a similiar an incident like Sheridans Ridg ride only having however a shorter diss distance to go and on his way he began to meet immense streams of fugitives from the scene of battle. He took in the situation at a glance and riding fore forward at a gallop swung his sabre and ordered his officers to rally the disorganised troops and indeed his sudden presense and words of command and advise were electrical. The scattered and routed soldiers soon faced about and follows followed him and their officers to the front and the enemys forces and after desperate fighting of four hours brought them to a stand. As soon as it was known that general Kindernine was back in command and again it became impossible to rally the Glandelinian forces so he himself made the attack. A fierce terror of the Angelinian general seemed to have filled them. The captured guns and prisoners even were all retaken and twenty four hundred of the rebel pieces besides and one million six hundred thousand Glandelinians taken prisoners. Of the glandelinians in killed and wounded in those five hours struggle one million eight hundred thousand was the loss and general Izner Mylstze whose army had joined Johnstons escaped with difficulty.

The routed troops recoiled to the protection of the main of Mic-Hollester Johnstons line. An hours lullfollowed and then general Hanson having sent troops to the scene and seeing what had occured he led an onslaught of terrific violence himself, followed by the troops of Kindernine, Mic-Cantler, Charles Brown and general Richardson Halsted. Their desperate attacks were impetuous and irresistible. The columns of troops through torn by grape and canister, and a tempest of bullets and shell charged over the snow breastworks of the rebels and forced their way straight through the rebel lines under Mic-Mic-Hollester Johnstons left wing fairly to the rear, where they turned and held the approach to the Valley with the rebels under general Parkside surrounded front and rear. This division was compelled to lay down its arms and surrender. General Mic-Cantler had destroyed both Parksides army and his reputation and later general Manley had relieved him of all command and he retired in disgrace.

During the capture of this Glandelinian general general Charles Brown had destroyed fourty six Calverinian Canal Locks, fourty bridges to prevent the escape of this rebel column, and twenty seven railroad bridges and had caused during the advance of the few days before the destruction of one hundred and fourty miles of railroad.

Also he caused the destruction of mill,s child slave plantations and military stores which would afford support to the enemy. After accomplishing this movement which ended in the surrender of general Parkside he rejoined general Hansons forces and took s most important part in the final movement which had ended in the withdrawal of Isnor Mylstse from the main works.Mylstse evacuated the works and was proceeding to the southward intending to get to the rear of the main army but his intention was frustrated to the s kill and activity of gener i general Hanson ,vivian himself who with his first di i f division of infantry and a fore force of Concentinian cavarly intercepted him at the five forks of Dalelawnburg cut out off his wagon train of supplies and made it impossible for him to regain the works and snow intrenchments he had lost.

Although the war gen general Hanson was the o most striking character being a tireless soldier, always on the alert, always eager for battle, and determined to win it if pi possible, and sad and distressed if he lost.his fierce enthusiasm and daringwere infectious beyond descr description and he was a l l always idolised by men and officers all through the war whch whether they served under him or not. At the time of one of his victories during the latter battle just described one of the war correspondents when a portion of the enemy was retreating was so filled with admiration for his chief that he forgot himself and threw his arms around general Hanson and kissed him. General Hanson of course understood and appreciated the tribute bj but he was anxious to have a persuing party started after the enemy. gven courage and dashing always won general Hanson to the quick. After aboid motvement the words of praise always came like hot torrents from his lips causing the cheeks of their recievers to flush and go glow. Even the influence of his personal pe presence was so extraordinary that nothinb whatever could comprehend it and it was that bloody day at pla Dalelawnburg to see him ride swiftly along the lines of firing men just before the charge was made and rais raise the many troops to ma enthusiasm of fever heat.At the main part of the charge before the enemy was driven from the works under Isnor Mylstse when tne the ninth corps moved across t the fields in the most splendid array to attack Mylstse's centre general Hanson had rode along their flanks and rept p repeatedlyerise our cutli

''Boys remember our victory and the fate of Angolinia Agatha and Dorothy Gale depends upon you. charges and go into them hard.''

Indeed these very electric words passed from lip to lip, and animated by the confidence of their main commander and others over them, the many regiments carried their tattered colors forward and clean under a hot fire through Isnor Mylstse's centre. when his forces were completely routed, and sent whirling through the rear of Mic-Hollester johnstons army.

It is probable that I can say that no day inthe war with Angolinia n and Glandolinia could be more memorable than the last day of feburary. This could be the anniversary of the marking of the first turning point of the tide of the great war at the battle of pleton or palelawnburg which ra ragoid three days ending on March the second. After the routing of general Isnor Mylstses divisions on the early morn ning of the last day of feburary, untill afternoon fr over thirty miles general Mic-Hollester johnstons army pouring up from the south had met the routed glandolinian army, and thus after hard fighting in the afternoon tried to cover Isnor Mylstse's retreat and lost one of his divisions for the pains. On the second and third day the fate of the Angolinian nation with Angolinia Agatha threatened so hung in the balance indeed, and only the Angolinians who remembered that fearful time of Feburary could fully appreciate what was due to the brave general and Angolinian commander of the Angolinian armies Hanson Angelic vivians and also his own other generals.

The battle on the second day recommenced with redoubled fury after a terrific cannonading which probably culminated in one of Hansons most terrific artillery duels of the first year of the war. It was general Mic-Hollester Johnstons first supreme effort. After two hours of dreadful infantry and cavarly actions but with results indecisive he sent the first three main divisions of his army under general Jensin to make a desperate attack upon general Hansons main centre occupying a long high embankments of works made of snow which pass passed as one of the greatest rebel charges against Hanson on record. five million five hundred Thousand glandolinian von veterans of Mic-Hollester johnstons army which had been ti tried in the fire of fiercer fighting near ,ivian wickey formed below their own positions and then moved against general Hansons centre with the precision of a vast tidal wave of humanity across the fields whic whih which lay between the two opposing armies. As the terrific cannonading from the christian lines tore hundreds of gaps in their surging columns and swept away ranks by the score at nearv every stride, they were nevertheless quickly closed up, and the torn andmangled column moved forward with only swifter st steps and still in perfect order, tward the christian position of snowforts or works. the Angolinian infantry defending the long line of works reserved their fire en entirely untill the charging columns of glandolinians came within very short range, and then burst forth a stor storm of series of b volleysof grape canister andbullets before which the whole advance line of the glandolinians withered or melted away. the remainder of the line or second column of glandolinians being all wholer troops undismayed by the terrific slaughter rushed forward over the windrows of bodies of their comrades, and were close upon the Angolinian gunners and their lines of pieces and also close upon the line of christian infantry.For a time the force of the glandolinian onslaught was really completely irrestible, but the attacking columns had become the centreof a fierce converging fire from front and even both flanks which was so rapidly annihilating them that the divisions of general turner and Wilcocer Stanoklin which had been supporting the main line of the attacking insurgents fell back in panic and confusion and the remainder of the column of rebels was left to face the deadly fire storm of rifles and machine guns alone.It was clearly impossible for them to hold the position they had succeeded in capturing and their commanders were compelled to give their glandolinians the order to withdraw. Of the one million five hundred thousand men who had advanced in a long t six mile line in such perfect order three hundred and thirty five thousand of them were killed wounded or prisoners in the hands of the christian army. the remainder of the paralized glandolinian division fell back shattered and broken and disheartened, to the main glandolinian front. the tide was turned indeed. General Hanson had crushingly defeated general Mic-Hollester johnstons attack, and the glandolinian division which had made the charge after suffering terrible losses had commenced its retreat back to its own lines.

This was one of the great battles of the war; it appeared to be the first Waterloo of the glandolinians and the christian victory then achieved was won by the skil ll of many of the commanding generals and the heroism of h their armies. general Hansons army at this critical moment was the single hope of the nation, for had it been defeated in this great battle Angolinia Agatha, and the wealth of all the Angolinian cities and Calverinia would have been at the m mercy of the Angolinian insurgents. This was indeed an occasion beyond doubt for the most skilful and prudent generalships united with the lost greatest courage essential to the command to command successfully in such an emergency as this. All these most high requirements general Hanson had fully met without doubt whatever and the most critical examination of the record he made in the Corrington campaign itself developed nothing but what always heightened his qualities for the pe peculiar grave emergency that confronted him after he l abandoned the seige of vivian wickey and left to it to Mc Mansion with his reinforced armies.

General Kindernine distinguished himself during the battle in three actions of the second day of the battle---the first when he repulsed a tremendous glandolinian charge upon his works. his abilities had been indeed of the very highest order beyond doubt and was one of the very few christian commanders who never committed a very serious military error,, who never sacrificed a command without necessity, and who very se seldom ever lost a battle. Yet he was completely too modest to seek any promotion or any conspicious position in the army and his fame indeed was small indeed in comparison with the value of service he rendered to his Holy country and its stickll more Holier cause. General Kindernine had been born in Abbiennnia in the same town ad Smarmonto that Hanson vivian was and during his saf service in the army his frist real victory of the war caused Kindernine to recoove the thanks of the nation but no promot promotion. Indeed the simulous gener sity with which he always refused the promotion when it was offered even at the expense of others stood in his way throughout the whole war, and he at no time held the high ra k high rank to which he was justly intitled.

the second time he distingus distinguished himself during the second day of the battle was when the rebels made their main charge in the late morning when Kindernine was one of many officersthat saved the christian army in the centre from utter ruin. the scene of this part of the conflict during Hansons repoilment of the big charge was near a small creek when the scendlants coming forward like a gigantic tidal wave tried most desperately to captured the chi christian positions and the rondsloading to it.Again and again the fierce glandolinian troops assaulted Kindernines position which was behind a rude breastworks of snow logs and rails and cobble stones but their most desperate and wildest attacks failed to dislo dislodge him, and his firmness saved the centre of the christian army from a disasterious defeat.

The third time he distinguished himself was lng late in the evening of the second day of the conflict and this had been pronounced as his most successful part of the battle in the war. After the main defeat of the big charge general Isnor Mylstse who had rallied his troops the night before marched north from plantoy and moved fiercely against general Kindernine at six o-clock who had refortified himself in his snow works. his superiors , Hanson vivian, Mic-Cantler, and charles Brown were impatient for him to attack general Isnor Mylstse and not allow himself to be attacked by that desperate handsome looking gland linian general but general Kindernine declared that his troops without proper support could not attack and refused at first. General Hanson jokingly called him slow but careful'', general Charles Brown telegraphing to Hanson complained of his obstinate and provoking refusal to attack the enemy, and general Mic-Cantler declared to Hannon that''It looked like the careless government furthority policy ed do nothing/ and let the enemy capture the country like they did vivian wickey. put general Kindernine knowing the danger of making a counter attack against Isn Isnor Mylstse's army too soon would not be hurried into any action whatsoverbefore he was ready insisting that he ought to know when it was best to fight. A storm of sleet and rain had covered the ground that day covering t the ground with a thick covering of ice but the rebel columns moving forward slowly , made the attack, and after being repulsed with fearful loss Kindernine rushed forward to make a counter attack and won his most complete victory of the war.. the army of general Isnor Mylstse was not merely defeated, but dispersed and even annihilated though he succeeded in escaping though wounded as he wasGeneral kindernine captured over one hundred and fifty guns large quantities of stores, and eight million eight hundred thousandprisoners, including six major generals, one supretsndent f general, three governer generals, ten Lieutenant generals, fifteen brigadier generals and more than one t housand two hundred commissionee offi cers of lower rank. Thus this stroke administered at the battle of Salton so effectually finished the enemy under Inner Mylatza that for a long while the latter was not heard of ay at any section.

His devi devotion to method had indeed aludicrous illustration at the battle of Salton on the third day. The Glandelinian forces under Mic-Hollester Johnston himself made a most tremendous assault upon his whole position, while points of Hansons line was assaulted afterwards, an assault which was indeed met with the most admirable skill and utmost bravery. At a critical moment when the assault raged the hottest a messenger had arived to him with word that reinforcements were being sent to him by Hanson and asked at what point they were most needed but Kindernine answered;

"They are needed mostly everywhere because those darn scoundrels of Mungaboo Glandelinians are fi fighting at systematic manner. The Glandelinians however after engaging Kindernine all day and making ten assaults uponhim alone were repulsed and the army saved and yet afterwards he appeared entirely unconscious of the fact that he had helped to fight a battle and saved H nsons army from ruin .

I will ha e to say again-that of all the men whose character and all ability were developed inthe great Glandic-o Anfelinian war there was perhaps not one in either the christian armies or the Glandelinian, those greatness was more generally known than that of general Hanson Vivian. It is not too much to say again that general Hanson Vivian was recognized by both Glandelinia and Angelinia, and the world in general as one of the greatest and bravest soldiers, and one of the ablest and purest christian generals that had ever been written about. puring the remainder of hi s advance to Torrington general Hanson had desired to impress Gertrude Angeline with the gravity and danger of the situation of Angelinia's cause and the full and immediate necessity for im ediate preparation to crush the rebellion before it grew so strong that nothing could stop it. In Writing to her he said;;;

Dear Gertrude;

I fear that most of the people in Angelinia and all her sisters states do not to my knowledge realize the terrible magnitude of the struggle we have entered upon against Haun Haughty Glandelinia nor its probable duration, and the most horrible sac r sacrifices it may impose upon the whole christian world itself.Of course we know that the Abbiesnnian Governments is one of the most powerful upon earth& but I know also the government and people of Glandelinia we have to contend with.I am always feeling that in only a little while they will be more completely united than even Angelinia herself and their resources made from child slavery they waged are without limit. The wicked Glandelinians have a throughoutly organized government and kingdom and wicked as she is almost commanding the respect and the fear of the world ex cept Abbiesnnia and Protestantia. Their mightiest armies are equipped and most complete in all their details and appointments and are also commanded by many of the foremost soldiers of the country itself genera, general Mic-Hollester Johnston and Federal being the highest and balest of them all and whose devotion to the wicked cause is attested by drawing his sword against his own cousin myself.

The Glandelinians of course know we have a navy that have in a small time blockaded all their ports in Glandelinia and Calverinia alike and that we have cut them offand even ourselvesfrom the whole world. But the Glandelinian country has nearly all the workshi workshops and most skilleda artisans of their country, and do not as yet need to draw upon the resti resources of other nations of their friends to supply any amount of defi i deficiencies they may feel.

But above allthe Glandelinian nation shall indeed have to fight the full prejudices of the whole world i itself because of the existance of wicked Child Slavery in Calverinia and in her country. We have already the ears of many christian powers, while the cause of the Glandelinians will not be heard in the least, and it is my opinion the Glandelinians will be shrewd enough to make the war appear to be merely a s struggle on their pa part for the maintenance of child slavet slavery when it is my opinion the enemy are striving to overthrow Christianity, and they are thus without sympathy and most cer certainly without material aid from other christian powers.To meet the full force of the rebellion I have seen the need of a new government administration to be forced in Calverinia, more greater armies or organize and equip as best as we can. We ourselves have immense t resources, have larger navies than Glandelinia and immense manuf acturas. And all of the people as we, well as the soldiers are exceedingly brave and extremely enthusiastic and are fully united in defense of a most just and Holy cause.

I have always feared that the Glandelinians c could succeed in establishing their wicked purpose at the very outset if the Angelinian armies do not fight much harder than they do and it seems probable we shall have to endure a much longer war than my own father fought wit in the Abbiesnnian army in the war of eighteen fourty One.Yet I'm positively sure that neither we or Abbiesnnia or any one else will never succeed no matter how good the cause untill mostly the financial power of the Glandelinian nation is completely broken and this can occur I'm sure only at the end and of a most long and most bloody war. Many of our people think already it will soon be all over, that already it is too severe to last much longer, and that a single great campaign and some great battle will end it. This on account of the capture by the enemy of Vivian Vickay and her Mic-Whirthian fortifications, and of the enemy successfully holding Crowley, and Calverinia's fatal error, and must by all means and under any conditions be corrected or Angelinia is doomed. Above all Abbiesnnia and her states must prepare for the worst.Our country as well as Glandelinia's is of vast extent and great natural resources, but I'm sure the conflict will be mainly in Calverinia, that she will become the Great Flanders of Angelinia, before this war is over, and her loyal people as well as everyone in Abbiesnnia and her states must be fully prep ared for thisIf any one or every one in the christian states of Angelinia resolve to at once under any conditions to dedicate their lives, and all they possess to the cause of Angelinia and to suffer without yeildi yeilding as no other people of the world has been called upon to suffer we shall with the Blessing of God and His blessed Mother succeed in the end as it is a most just cause, but when this great struggle will end no man can fortell."

Your Friend .

General Hanson Vivian.

In the early part of March before the outbre k of the battle of Torrington general Hanson Vivian had gone in di disguise as a Glandelinian peasant woman through one rebbl army after anoth er another till he got to the coast of southern and northern Calverinia where he had planned the defenses which so long in all the war proved so impregnable to all glandelinian attacks and which were held and resulted later in the third year of the war the fall of Calve Calverino and the evacuation of Vivian Vickay. Hanson then returned to his own armies at Dorothy Gale took command First of the glandelinian forces defending Angeli in Agatha and on March third met general Stanaslav at the battle of Cassimir, n and then began an all da s days fierce and series of actions between his forces and the glandelinian army which were again so splendidly displayed and showed his magnificent abilities as a christian commander. In defensive warfa e he was invincible. He defeated a fierce glandelinian onslaught led by general Un Insula, Sideburn, and Fredrick and Mellford, and not untill general Mic-Hollester johnston came up with his army to oppose him once more had a glandelinian general ever been found at that time who could successfully cope with general Hanson Vivian and even Mic- Hollester Johnston hardly ever could accomplish general Hansons defeat not so much by trying to show superior generalship as by trying to take advantage of his own superior resources.After that great conflict so near Angelinia Agatha the great resources of general Mic-Hollester johnstons army for a time so far superior to those of general Hansons began to tell for a while against Hansons army.For a while till after the battle of Torrington it became almost impossi l impossible to re-cruit the Angelinian armies, or to properly supply the men who were already in the field. Henceforth for the time general Hansons operations had been for the defense of Angelinia Agatha, and it was impossible to overrate the masterly ability with which this was done under almost un insuperable difficulties and discouragements ever known. It was utmost love and devotion to their commanders that held together the torn armies of Angelinia near Angelinia Agatha and this, couple with their utmost confidence in his skill long made his ragged and half starved armies of christian soldiers more than a match for the superior armies of Mic-Hollester Johnston and Manley. General Mic-Hollester johnston had perceived this, and felt that it was surely a question of endurance, that general Hansons army may be overcome only when the resources of the encampments around Angelinia Agathia, and the nation itself were so far exhausted that the way could no longer be carried on, and it was with this idea in his wicked mind that he took the command of all the Angelin Glandelinian armies after landing Vivian Vickay at the governments request and became commander in chief of the Glandelinians.

The bloody battle of Dorothy's Harbor or Angeline Flanders where the frightful losses of the glandelinian losses gave stern proofs of general Hansons abilities to take swift advantage of the least mistake of his enemy proved that Mic-Hollester Johnston was notable to worst him. After two days of persistent fighting general Hanson seemed more able than ever before to keep the biggest Glandelinian armies at bay. The struggle as general Hanson had foreseen himself had told heavily upon Mic-Hollester Johnstons main resources, and when general Hermannia advance or drive through Mic-Hollester johnstons main line had hop exposed the hopelessly exhausted condition of his rebel army and the deprivation of property of the country of the first year o the war to the rebels alone was extreme beyond comprehending. The railroad communications tward Angelinia Agath , Dorothy Gale and Osma had been dest destroyed by the Glandelinian cavarly, but nevertheless it was not impossible to keep the armies and the city itself supplied and no one was on the verge of starvation as the Glandelinians had hoped for.Still general Hanson held out and maintained with the most persistent skill and courage the defense of Angelinia Agatha, the rebel army of Mic-Hollester Johnstons was rapidly melting away and it was impossible to even supply them with regular food, the men themselves saw that further co nflict for the capture of Angelinia Agatha was a useless sacrifice and so the Glandelinian army once o more retreated and left general Hanson and Angelinia Agatha again free from utmost danger and the nation breathed more freely. All kinds of bitterness ourresentment had no place whatever in general Hanson Vivian nature. Even when in battles the fate of the war itself seemed to go against him most heavily he accepted its goo its result in good faith and even tw ard men of the rebels of of his own side even who showed the most intense bitterness against him he had no other feeling than kindness, good feeling, and forgiveness. nd during the war it was noticeable that he never spol spoke of any of the glandelinian soldiers as ''rebels'' insurgents, ''Insurrect oes, or ''' landelinian despor adoes of the devil'' the common expression in the An Angelinian army. hey were always mentioned as' 'glandelinian Confederates of Angelinia '' or ''the enemy''...

One of the most touching stories ever illustrated showed this noble character of general Hanson vivian by a glandelinian prisoner who when recovering from his wounds was renewed ng the great panorama of christian troops marching and drilling. This soldier who was a rebel officer had been at the battle of Ester Starring had been a most bitter aint'christian man, an athiest, nd had during many a battle before fought and cursed the Angelinians and all christians desperately and denouncedthe christian cause in genral as one made by the ''devil.''

He like many millions of other glandelinians could see nothing foo good whatever in any Angelinians. At the batt le of Ester Starring he had been badly wounded, a ball having shattered his arm, and a shell had lacerated his left leg. He lay on the ground not far from Erminie fun and as general Hanson ivian ordered his slow retreat the evening after the battle : after his works gld been carried, he happened to pass the wounded glandelinian officer. As general Hanson and some of his generals came along the wounded glandelinian recognized him and though terribly faint from exposure and loss of blood, the rebel had raised his hands looked poor general Hanson in the face and shouted as loud as he could;

''down with christianity. Good for child slavery. urrah for Glandelinia and Child lavery.''''''

The great general had happened to ear him, lokked looked, stopped his horse, dismounted immedintely, and came tward the Glandelinian officer. The officer had comfessed that at first he had thought that general Ga Hanson me nt to killhim for that blasphemy. against Angelinia. ut as general Hanson came up he had looked down at the glandelinian soldier with such a and expression upon his face that all fear and defiance left the face-of the rebel and he wondered what he was about.

He first ordered the wounded glandelinian to be taken with the troops on a wagon and then aft erwards he extended his hand to the wounded glandelinian officer and graspi grasping his firmly and looking right into his eyes said;

''Don't-be foolish son. Your mortally wounded and all hope is lost. ut if posible I will ask God for your sake and my mine that you will not die wand will s on be well. the general of the rebels lived and if he would live ten-thousand years he could never forget the expression on general vivians face. here he was, totally, defeated at a great and bloody battle in southern Angelinia, retiring from a field of gun carnage that had cost him and his cause at that time almost their lost hope and yethe stopped to have the wounded rebel taken care of and then say these words to the wounded soldier of the wicked opposition who had so meanly taunted him as he passed by. As soon as the general had left him he cried hijself to sleep there in the wagon, and glad to say he never went back to fight in the cause of a nation he knew to be trators of God.

In the early part of this last battle before the errington action the Angelinians indeed had decidedly the worst of it for general Bartlower and Fran klin Lessonins divisions had been terrivly terribly cut up and driven from the field for about a mile for the space of one ho ur, and all had seemed lost, when general Hanson vivian himself suddenly appeared upon the scene with his sples splendid brigades. with almost magical rupidy it had taken in the situation at once, and formed his lines to resist the advance of the glandelinian enemy.. he other two generals recently n named had succeeded in rallying the fragments of their brigades and to reassure their soldiers Les Leesonia had adressed them breifly, and pointed to general Hanson and his men as a wort hy example of c ourage and coolness and this soon brought a new turn in the tidd tide of battle and the rebels were finally routed. One of general Hansons most peculiar tie was : passon for exact justice. He would never under anycondition permit his rank to give him the smartest advantage over the common Angelinian soldiers of his command and other commands also. hen at this last action before errington came he made the mostcelebrated chargewhich turned the fortunes of the day for the christian soldiers behind raised his sabreabovehis head to encourage his troops and a spent fragment of shell struck his hand and broke one ov his fingers and carried off a piece of a bone from his other finguro and scarred his left hand badly also. wounded as he was in both hands he remained upon the field of battle till the fight was over, and then took part in the persuit or pre-peremptorily ordering back to the hospital some of his generals who appeared to be wounded like he was but seemed to care nothing about himself. The chief surgeon was busily engaged with thousands of the wounded butleft them after the persu t and seeing general Hanson with his hands bangaged and covered with redness asked him if he was really seriously hurt.

''Yes my wounds are very serious indeed.''He answered''but not so seriously or not half so badly as many of these poor fellows here and I will wait if I die for waiting.''''

And he fort forwith sat down in his tent that evening great general as he was and positively declined any aid or any assistance of any kind until his turn came for his own treatment. Early that afternoon before he had been wounded general Hanson had driven a big glandelinian division from the district, and had his troops in readiness when general Hanks was sent against him. He withdrew his troops from Hanks for about a mile seemingly in a disasterious retreat, and only with one million one hundred and thirty five thousand men attacked Hanks bigger force of, five million so fiercely that he retreated with all his troops in utmost utmost panic. is camp sign was certainly a stirring one ending in h this battle or terrington, and late that evening he whipped generals Millroyer Shannon, Shields, and Mic-Hollester Francis one after another and then suddenly descended upon the whole g of general Mic-Hollester Joh s Johnstons army when the glandelinian generals thought he was li still following Manley consi constituting one of the most brilliant chapters in his own warfare.. He two hours later put his divisionsinto the operations against the main line of Mic-Hollester johnston and simultaneouslydetached and sent against general Gordonviller large troopsand struck them a crushing blow , passing a large force around general Mic-Hollester johnstons left flank and forcing him to let go his his hold on porothy's Harbor and Angeline landers and by the most stubborn fighting he kept him at lay and even kept him on the ground untill other divisions of his troops under indornine and other generals could got up to the scene of action and finally routed the glandelinian army altogether.

At the beginning of this titanic contest general Hansons first division had invested poroty Borothy's Harbor and Angeline landers and captured the former with eleven million glandelinians as prisoners, millions of stands of arms, one thousad seven hundred ans and seventy two guns and had other divisions at the same time repulsing with their thin lines the glandelinian corps of Beppo Evans, Mic-Hollester oh nston and Izzar Mylotze which were in succession hurled against him. General indernine in this contest had recieve recieved a severe wound in his left arm but which was not severe enough to cripple or put him out ofcommission and after having his wound dressed he was able to retake command.

In person partu particular general Hanson vivian can be described as a very tall man, six feet and three inches in height height angular, graceful like a noman General, strong, anguler, and with regular sized feet and hands. He always strode along th n than walked and was one of the best horseback riders in the world in this story. there was even something firm and decided in his gate and was a regular Augustine St glair in nature and speech. his eyes dark blue were large and piercing. He always looked straight at any one when he spoke or scolded and through you also. He spoke tersely but in long sentences, and always to the point and to worse him in an argument was impossibleand there was never any circumlocution about what he had to say. and when he said he was going to do something, he did not just say it he just did it and quicker than any one expected him to do it. His hair was of golden brown color and beard also. He was always as gentle and as kind as a kitten to those he loved and also to his enemies but severe when he was angry or offended. Then he was like an explosive. But otherwise there was always something of a great softness and tenderness about him that was very striki ngeven to his enemies, and many a wounded rebel became a friend of his from his treatment of them. General Hanson ivian was exceedingly fond of children of any kind, and never failed to win their love and respect in return and never scolded them unc lne unnecessarily like parents now adays do. Though he seemed to have a great taste for romp and show the seeming was a mistake and he never had anything of the sort but at times he was haugt haught y and proud but at the same time proud of his own heroes and heroines and always had a torrent of praise for any one who did a brv brave deed. hen encamped at Norman Catherine before his action at aurandecallio general Hanson had recieved from a friend of his a gift of a new and beautiful soldierhat resplendent in aboni of dazzling gold and green braids. This was one day before the outbreak of the conflict itself greatly admired by a particular child slave of whom he was fond and had a wind t- adopt for his own some day when he had the chance whereupon general Hanson ivian took her upon his knee and while having one loving arm around herripped the beautiful braids of his hat, bound it around the little girls curls and sent her away happy and delg delighted.

The last actions of the battle almost had brought general Hanson into the fa fearful vortex of destruction. Two main glandilinian divisions of ic-hollester johnstons main army tward nightfall had been marching to his aid one under general Abt Aberdeen Soloder and another under general Ah Annie was Wad. General Mic-Cantlor was dispatched against general Wade soldiers meeting them on the banks of a small little creek of some n name but very deed and partly overflowing from semi melting su snow of the coming spring month. General Mic-Cant ers force only amounted to onver on hundred thousand men and they mt over one million six hundred thousand glandelinian be but securing an unassailable position he easily defeated this glandelinian division and drove them from the region. This attack was conducted under the greatest possible difficulties and ithad been recieved the highest praise from general Hanson and other military cretics and generals.

General Gendon had been sent against the other Glandelinian division and arrived to the works just in time to help in the last section of the big battle and to turn the tide fully in favor of the Angelinian armies and which also but for the utmost bravery and outstandingness of general Glalarnine and many other christian generals would have probably resulted in the destruction of the christian divisionsthusengaged. General Hannon Vivian accompanied by his main chief of staff had left the battle field at its conclusion and had gone hastily to Angeline Glanders to provide for the new advance which he then believed and knew was inevitable. On reaching Angeline Glanders he found general Glalarnine still resisting the fe fierce but last attacks of the Glandelinian forces. Imm diately after his arrival a fresh and bigger assault was made by the Gl- Glandelinians and lasting over two hours when the Glandelinians finally broke and abandoned the attack when they realized the main Glandelinian army was already retreating.

For this story what are the Angelinian warships. A large fleet of black , low lying hulks of iron and steel painted black and gray, long sooi sooi soomingly as sanserpents with many big guns one of which throws a heavier shot than a series of broad broadsides from a hundred English War dreadnaughts of to day driven resistlessly through the water by mighty st eam and elstrick elstric engines combined, lighted and steered by elstric apparatus, and using three score elstric searchlights that makes midnight as bright as day. All the tru triumphs of Angelinian science and mechanic arts have contributed to the perfection of these dreadful Abbiaomian sea monsters, a a single one of which could have destroy ed the whole Armada in a moment and laughed to scor scorn a thousand Nelsions of Trafalgar bay, a and all these monsters and aided by Angelinian ships of war strange to say cannot capture seaboard fortifications of Vivian Wickay. Why is it? Can the reed reader tell me?

In the beginning of hisxservice as boyscout in the christian army, Maste Master Marse Schoefiled Penrod had had the chance to hear the descrip- ption of the Vivian girls and it was in this fash ion:

"No matter what hardships they go through, no matter what exposure they suffer, no matter how harsly or ill treated t hey are by the wicked Glandelinian soldiers, they are always well and healthy and never give any of their persecur persecuting enemies any chance to destroy them, never desire revengeven them, yet do their duty, never give any good people trouble, and are as good as they are beautiful.

And every one of the Vivian girls have as sweet a temper and ways more charming than thwir beauty t hat they were the greatest pleasure t o all the nation, and even had many secret friends among the words of the Glandelinians, and on some occasions when dressed at their best and sleanest were almost too dazzling ly beautiful to be looked at.

No artist could paint them correctly.They had soft fine f golden colored hair, which could curl up beautifully, or which they could wear in any fashion they chose, they had big blue eyes, and long eye lashes, and most darling little faces, and they were strong and sturdy for their age, and were such expert horseback riders that they could do all thestunts observed at a circus on horseback.Their manners were so good that it was like a heavenly delight to make their acquaintance.They felt that every one was their friend, and when any one spoke to them they would give the stranger one serious sweet look with their blue eyes, and then follow it with a lovely and most friendly kind of smile.

The Vivian Girls were always unusually polite, they washed voluntarily, they were as obdient to those who may be over them as all good children should be, and once when dressed as boys boys, yet still retaining their golden curls they looked like seven beautiful little Lord Fountleroys. with a wealth of naturally curly hair of an eighteen carat-gold shade.

Yet despite all their beauty, and equal goodness they had often proved to the persecuting Glandelinians that they were more than a match for them when set u upon unawares.It happened once when the little girls were a short distance from the christian lines just before the outbreak of the battle of Carrington at which now the christian forces were consentrating, when a lone Glandelinian soldier who had been out scouting slipped up behind one of the Vivian girls and clutxhed one of the longest curls in his grimy fist and began to twist it...."

"What are you and your sister tentempedes doing outside your encampments, spying again? "He demanded.....

"I won't tell you what we are doing"she shot back.

"Doggone you, answer my question"he demanded twisting a little harder.

"We were not spying"she then answered.....

The rebel soldier was astonished and let forth a derisive whooping noise.

"You are spying,you were spying."

"Oh you are mistaken I assure you.Leave us alone.How dare you attack us in this fashion.?"?"

381

"I guess I ought to know.You were spying, that's what."

"No indeed.We were not.you cannot prove it."

"Don't tell me such lies"retorted the rebel soldier getting angry. and in a threatening voice."You kids are outside the christian encampments are you not, and are you not the Vivian Girl Princesses."?

"Yes."admitted Violet defiantly."We are.What's it to you?"

"Well"said the Glandelinian soldier triumphantly"you are spying then."

"We are not"retorted Violet gently however.

"I say you are"stated the reb el soldier.Then he burst into a loud mocking chant."you are spies.you are spies.you are spies."

"We are not"said Jeice in a tone ofmild reproof."and we demand you to let us cont inue on our way."

"not when you intend to spy u on us Glandelinians."declared the rebel soldier growing bellicose.

"You will."she was courteous but firm.

"I will not."

"You will."

"Say you confounded Centepede"commenced the bristling rebel soldier"I say you are spies, and if I say you are spies, I mean you are spies.See?"

"We are not"said Jeice Affably.

This was entirely too much for this rebel soldier, a brother one of one of the wicked Glandelinian soldiers and a minor star of his own company.He thrust a most determined face and indeed a most miraculously ugly one near Jeice's.

"I say you are spies.Do you hear me?"

"I tell you weare not spying"said Jeice drawing away.

"you admit, you and your sisters are spies and be very quick about it or I'll"....

The rascal had then gripped the longest of her curls and twisted it as hard as he could.

"Admit you are spies."he demanded.

"O-o o-o-o-o-o.You're hurting me.How dare you pull my hair.Let me go you beast."!!!!!

"SAY YOU ARE SPIES."growled the rebel and gave the curl another twist.Then something unusual happened.She made her hand into a small hard ball, her fist was poked out and it came to a stop at the rascals jaw.She was only a little girl but there was some stunning force to her wallop.The rascal gave a bellow of surprise pain and rage.Then he backed away, threw down his gun, tightened his belt, removed his overcoat, rolled up his sleeves, spit on his hands, and assumed a fighting pose.

"Now" announced the terribly enraged rebel soldier--"I'm going to lambaste the gizards out of all of you for this."

For a moment being unarmed at this time, the little girls looked about wildly seeking to flee from this brute.But they were caught, for behind them stood a well fence, and in front of them the rebel soldier and his fighting face barred the way.They saw the rebel come twirl Jeice in the manner assumed like that of a prize fighter, body crouching, left foot out, right foot back, left hand extended slightly to jab, right hand drawn back to punch.Terror seized poor Violet and her sisters but before it could move them to action of any kind, the rebel's left fist shot out fr with great force, and Jeice felt a sharp pain under her left eye as she went down almost dazed.At this moment Violet acted u impulsively and did the first thing that flashed into her mind.This was to give the rebel soldier a swift kick in his abdomen and as hard as it was in her power.The force of it almost seated him into the snow.The rebel fell back more horrified than hurt however.

"I'll teach you to kick me in the belly you wild cat"he hissed between his clinched teeth and he rushed at Violet blaspheming like a demon.The little girl demonstrated that she was in no need of lessions by kicking him again.

The rebel soldier felt terribly scandalized by such conduct.He scowled fiercel fiarly and rushed again.He had been taught many lessons on fight ing but he had not been thought how to avoid seven screaming, scratching, biting young furies who just then flung themselves on the rebel, Jeice clinging upon his shoulder, Jennie and Catherine holding him by the legs, and the others at place they could grab him, and bore him to the earth.The fierce anythetic pugnacity of the rebel soldier was as completely nothing with the genuine fear inspired ferocity of the enraged Vivian Girls.

The first partvofthe battle was brief, fierce and from the view point of the rebel soldier most inglorious.In a very short peroid of time he had been so scratched, butted, bitten, clawed, kin kicked, and pummeled and his face washed roughly in snow and his sense of the fitness of things so - outraged that the war spirit fled from him and he on scrambling to his feet fled like a frightened deer with the little girls in hot shrill persuit, their long yellow curls flying in the wind, as they pelted him furiously with hardsnow balls and even stones and rocks.

General Bandon had been sent against the other Scandinavian

Just as the rebel soldier rounded a tree(go on a spree) and before he could draw a weapon to shoot violet and her sisters down, which he would have done, the little girls caught him, pi pounced on him like wild cats and down they all went in the deep snow in a rolling, squirming heap. The uniforms of the girls were sadly rent by now, and joise who had been struck was worse of. Her face was cut, one eye was black, her collar had been torn so that almost her whole breast and back was free of clothes and her bare part exposed to the cold. The others only suffered the ruination of their clothing. The soldier looked a perfect wreck. His two eyes were black, his nose were bleeding, his front teeth were knocked out, he looked as if he had been scratched by a tiger, and some of his hair was torn from his head, and i his uniform was in shreds.

"Are we spying" demanded joise threatening to sore scratch his eyes out.

"No whimpered the rebel."

"Well then you are our prisoner now." announced violet. "Get up and behave and we'll leave you alone."

He did so, and shame faced followed them toward the direction of the christian lines.

They soon reached the lines with their prisoner. They did not think at this moment of the ruined state of their attire and features, and only the fact that they themselves thrashed him saved his life.

Indeed it would have been an unusual sight to see this large panic stricken soldier in uniform tearing down the snow covered field toward that tree and at his heels pelting him with snow balls and rocks and eyes blazing seven beautiful little girls in velvet purple or lavender uniforms, whose curls floated out behind li e battle n banners. This lone rebel soldier now he was brought to the lines was beginning to learn that it was safer to ta tease a wild cat than insult and attack the vivian girls single handed, even though he be armed.

When t he vivian girls brought their prisoner to colonel Evans the latter seeing them and the prisoner and their condition, gave a cry of alarm and distress.

Some of the other officers started up spilling things all over themselves.

"My Gracious , gorlings" Cried Evans. "Oh My od what has happened you you? did he assault you?" pointing to the prisoner his face assuming the old fashioned bull dog expression.

Joise looked at Evans squarely out of her one functioning eye, and a quiet pride was in her voice as she spoke;

"Oh" said she. "He tried to attack us and we gave him a si sample of our own fighting ways and made him our prisoner."

Yet if it was not for the fact that they had thrashed him good and soundly and then yet interceded for him Evans would have dealth very harshly with the prisoner. Nevertheless he was charged with the crime of assault on children, and more so on the vivian girls. The penalty in that country being death, and only the intercession of those he had abused saved him from facing the firing squad.

And the vivian girl whose eye had been blackened, and which was then bandaged during the trial of the prisoner a day later was the one who saved his life. He however got twenty years in prison of for it.

CHAPTER THIRTY SIX....

FIERCE ACTIONS AT TORRINGTON, AND MANLEY'S RUSH ON ALBERTINIA REPULSED WITH GREAT SLAUGHTER.
MANLEY LAY'S WAY WASTE TO WHOLE FORESTS. THE FRIGHTFUL BUTCHERY. MANLEY PLANS FOR REVENGE. BURNING OF AURANDERGALLIO, AND THE BURNING OF OTHER TOWNS.
THE GREAT BATTLE OF ROBBINIA ROAD.....

The first carried general Morse light infantry from Auraq to reinforce general Hindernine. The second took the troops from Onago for Phinia while two other divisions were sent to Hindernines right. It was also reported by spies as a result of instructions sent by the war offices of Shoemannia lines that officer who objected to satisfy for Shoemannia must win this battle or be dismissed from the army. General Calmannin shoemannia at this threatened the extermination of every officer who dared to oppose him, and even threatened to resign himself. One hundred officers offered to resign, nearly all the officers refusing to slay children, had handed in their commissions, and others had taken their p a places. The immediate dispatch of regular cavarly had to be concealed owing to the resignation of officers of ninth corps. Brig general Quillen commander of the right grand division had resigned. Along the Torrington corps creek was stationed general Manley's sixth corps under general Competent, commander besids swearingtons cavarly a and Meldon goron with his immense divisions which remained at the main extreme right. Besides these sixty three million men on the foe side were stationed under general Fabbia waiting for the movements of the Anglinians under general Chehelia. Shoemannias c rps corps were in Manley's center or near the fortifications of Torrington facing ten million Angelinians. The main Abyssinkilian army estimated at fifteen million had not yet arrived. It was for them that general vivian waited the objet being to march on the Torrington fortifications as soon as the junction had been formed. General Manlet therefore determined to strike at general vivian immediately after he had disposed of these forces as it was Manley's designs to strike the Abyssinkilians coming in fro from the north. General Hanson himself had eighty nine million but was too f far just then to render aid to his brother but general vivian had an equal million.

General Huebaum strengothened his own positions and crowned his batteries on the small Trexian ridges and then ten days later in March advanced his army upon Torrington occupying it within close range of the very christian guns. General vivian seeing that it was only a part of general John Manley's army and knowing that he was too far away to aid huebaum his brother and also Federal general vivian decided to hem these two leaders in if he could and concentrated therefore day after day toward the Torrington fortifications in another direction but Manley through boyscouts learned what general vivian was doing and blew up all the bridges crossing the St Stantlutania River and mined the plains south of the Mc-Hollester Run then three days later on March the 12th threw heavy forces upon Meldons divisions forcing an entrance into the immense Mc-Hollester Run woods where he established a very strong position. The carnage had been terrible the battle raging a full day along this line. General Meldon Days divisions after having repelled twelve desperate onslaughts had been crushed to pieces and Meldon and general Meldon also were borne from the field mortally wounded.

The next day general Picknell seeing the situation advanced heavy forces by way of the south sand pike Cross roads but met heavy forces of red coats that barred his way like a long wall of red. For an hour along this line the battle raged in full away without either side giving an inch of ground and said the terrific carnage along a battle line ten miles long a large section of the Mc-Hollester Run woods was shivered to fragments by a gigantic explosion that suddenly occured among the enemys lines, the Angelinians having set off a big mine.

However Manley was bound to check the christian concentration even if he could not win the squabble. Manley did not have any intentions of starting any general engagement but somebody had blundered and the conflict was far more severe than he had even expected, and general Mandonia on the christian side hearing the heavy firing advanced Maurice gostellicos and general Bernard Rickson Mc-Hollesters divisions of Abbisomnians against Leonin Meldonia Pic nells massive columns and these went to the atu attack with all their violence and whi with such terrific fury these went to the atu attack with all their violence and whi with such terrific fury that a large portion of picknells force was annihilated, and the remainder crushed and mangled, and the survivors were compelled to give way but also the christian line had been torn and mangled by receiving an equally heavy blow and general Dickson Mc-Hollester fell severely wounded. Hanley seeing picknells plight was compelled to advance general Calmannin Shoemannin to the rescue, he being with Hunbaume covered also and soon after fierce concentration his lines covered Picknells retreat and met the Angelinians with stern resistance. The christian line being held at bay fought with the fury of desperation and general Shoemannin though a wicked glandelinian was horrified at the slaughter of his own troops and felt like withdrawing his forces under cover. But he saw this movement more dangerous than standing his ground so he ordered his divisions to charge sending a large aeried wave of gallant Omarians and Zimmermannians tward a glen to demolish general Hansonins center. General Hansonin was alarmed by the most heavy firing south of Torrington and summons general Kindernine said;

"There is severe fighting going on south of Torrington and I would like you to take your christian divisions in that direction and if you see anything serious, throw your forces into action and then report at once."

Kindernine saluted and was off. In fifteen minutes he had half of his command which had been standing rw ready on the march and advanced these in the direction of the town and reaching a large glen which had been spliced in two by a small but beautiful stream now frozen over he saw a large force of glandelinians mostly Mc-Hollestinians advancing to the charge, being led by general Hendon Mc-Call and his brother frank and another general by the name of Hellington, and atthis point a large christian force was giving way. General Kindernine understood the situation. The glandelinians were advancing through this large glen to strike upon general Hansonins position at the Pandora Railroad tracks and if they got there unchecked all would be lost. Kindernine hastily dashed over to one of his waiting generals and said;

"Race back to general Hansonin and report to him of the danger and tell him to concentrate as strong a force as possible upon the Mc-Hollester and Pandora railroad tracks and to do it as quickly as he can. I will stay here and hold back these glandelinians as long as possible though they overwhelm me. Hurry don' tarry a moment or he will be overlapped."

The officer was off like a flash while Kindernine forming his lines into squares, massed his batteries in the center of the right of way and then ordered a whole section of his line to charge. With a fierce pandemonium of yells a whole division swept down into the glen like an avalanch with fixed bayonets and for a time the glandelinians in the foremost columns were demorilized by this charge and the artillery fire poured upon them and fled in the utmost confusion. But the main body coming up held firm for a few minutes and then also broke and fled in great panic believing that the Angelinians were more in numbers than they really were. Unfortunately however the glandelinians were a part of Shoemannins right wing, and the main divisions coming up rallied the confused masses and began a fierce and sangunanary attack upon the squares in purple which were overwhelming them but neverhonevertheless they forced them gradually out of the glen with the most heavy losses. Along the railroads tr: tracks where Kindernine was standing his ground stubbornly repulsing charge after charge with appalling slaughter, Violet and her sisters having seen that the messenger sent by Kindernine was killed raced off to do a h his bidding but a number of glandelinians though devout Catholics as they were raced off to intercept the little girls. Violet and her sisters saw them coming and urged their horses on at a tearing rate. The glandelinians did not like to fire as they knew they were persuing only children but several of the soldiers managed to intercept them and yet not being able to catch them set fire to some shubbry in their path. Wheeling their horses the little girls dashed right at them upset twenty of them, shot down six, and caused great consternation among the rest.

"Well I'll be" Said one of them getting up out of the snow, and dashing away after his fleeing horse. "Those little children are regular dare-devils."

"Well never mind what they are." Growled the leader. "We must catch them if we can, and must if we even have to shoot them down to do it. They fired on us first. Hurry. Forward."

Those not unhorsed raced after the little girls, and the leader himself could not help laughing as he saw the men still running after their horses. The little girls had outdistanced them by this time and as a large squad of Angelinians appeared the grayscoats gave up the persuit. Even at this time the other glandelininns were still chasing after their horses. Violet and her sisters soon reached the Angelinians and Violet reported to the leader of the danger.

"General Hansonin has already seen it." Said the general. "And has sent heavy reinforcements to help general Kindernine. We are the last division going."

Violet and her sisters faced about advancing on ahead of them, resembling some little angel guardians moving forward with them instead of little girls leading them. Along general Hansonin's line the fighting had gradually lulled, but at other points the sound of firing had grown more steady. Ambrose Edwin Fuller with about onemillion three hundred thousand glandelininns advanced upon the christian picnells right wing with the most terrible violence, and Bicknell finding that his right wing was threatened with annihilation, changed some of his positions, and met the enemy with all of his available forces, but found it a dangerous attempt as heavy forces of the enemy were already attacking him furiously.

Soon Shoemannins batteries were now opening a storm of fire and his main divisions making movements tward Pruninn line fell heavily upon Hansonins left the battle becoming fearful all a, along the entire line. Ambrose Fullers divisions were repulsed twice with dreadful losses, and five brigades were fairly cut to pieces, but again he went to the attack many of his main columns heading for picknells center All his own artillery was concentrated along the center and soon these broke loose with the roar of hell. At the same time Ambrose Fuller sent general Mackentire with two hundred thousand to seize Picknell's batteries and occupy Torrington Cross and hold it at all costs. Within two hours this move was made and the battle soon became more general the whole of Ambrose Fullers men attacking the christian line. General John Page at the same time arv arrived with about three hundred thousand glandelinians and after fierce fighting bore Crows divisions down before them like wheat or corn before the tornado. The Angelinians again fought with the fury of desperation but even the arival of Machenmarrowthighnerington and Estrabrook could not check the fierce onslaught. The enemy had carried the Glen held by Kindernine whose divisions unsupported by artil ery and only having small field pieces were unable to hl hold out against such fearful numbers.

General Mackenmarrow who had now stood his ground became jeopordized for he also had no artillery and he had to withdraw. Kindernines divisions being hard pressed took defense behind a long fence boarding the glen and reorginized his divisions again giving serious resistance to the assailants who resumed the attack with great noise and fury. General vivian in the meantime saw the threatening gaps, heard the withering storm of firing and ordered general Charles Brown to the aid of Hansonins Angelininns. Brown advanced with about one million one hundred thousand men and ordering Mc-Donald to follow with his four hundred thousand men he also swept on tward the scene of action and these divisions made such a terrific counter onslaught, that the glandelinians finally again retired in disorder through the glen. Mc-Donald with his divisions went to the aid of picknells batteries but his numbers could not check the tremendous onslaught upon the chain of cannon and amid the dreadful carnage he went down mangled and bleeding and being riddled by a thousand bullets. His divisions were cut to pieces and all these Angelinians were driven from the redoubts and without a single leader. In this terrific attack the glandelinians themselves had lost ten thousand men o per hour the onslaught having lasted two hours. The Angelininns had suffered heavier losses, their losses not accurately known as yet. A large part of Hansonins line itself forming into a long parrellel wall advanced slowly, drove a part of the attacking line of the enemy back, and recarried the redoubts near the Mc-Hollester Run works, and then advanced upon the plains south of the woods. A disaster then occured and that solitary line was almost wiped out only a few escaping. Hans nins main columns were now advancing however and though thousands of them were blown up by mines the survivors press ed on and after four hours of horrible carnage the Glandelinians under general Palo Evans retreated but his brother Beppo Evans hurled great forces upon Hansonin, checking his advance and hurling him back.

"Attempts were made to retake that portion of the woods but Palso Evans who led the terrific charge was severely wounded, and his divisions crushed to pieces. Beppo Evans then led a charge himself and was about to succeed in carrying the works when he himself was repulsed, being outflanked, and his divisions being badly cut up retreated in disorder. Ambrose Fuller though repulsed in three terrific onslaughts, advanced on again to make another. A As he got within range of the christian lines he ordered a rush for the works. All at once there was a sheet of smoke and flame proceeded by a roll of musketry that seemed to rend the heavens. The front line of the assailants utterly collapsed melting away. The glandelinians were staggered but despite their awful losses the glandelinians rallied and resumed the attack with all energy and soon portions of the christian center found themselves hard pressed, this so loud became the glandelinian yell of derision, exultation and fury that the very damned of hell seemed to possess the air. But as the storm continued with horror several divisions of glandelinians were crushed to fragments, but the wicked glandelinian survivors confident of numbers again renewed the attack, and threw themselves upon the christians with redoubled fury. To make matters worse now the savage fury of the glandelinian attack continued on steadily in such a paroxysm of vehemence that the arival of general Francis Aronburg was the only means of preventing the assailants from carrying all before them. Nevertheless the onslaught though repulsed was not abated. In the meantime the divisions under general Kindernine were still hard pressed and he was forced to send another officer for reinforcements.

"Get an artillery battalion if you can" He ordered. "We must hold this point it all costs."

Amy the officer dashed but he was all of a sudden hit by a bullet and he fell dead from his horse. Another soldier voulteered to go and as he dashed off he only rushed way to go through the same experience as Violet and her sisters had done. A force of glandelinians under colonel Parmheardt was advancing upon this road, and scores of the cavarly men seeing him tried their best to catch him. The soldier saw them coming, and headed directly for a bridge and as he reached it another detatchme t of grayscoats came dashing upon the other end and he found himself hemmed o in by two columns.

386 But at this moment a shell landed in the middle of the bridge blowing it to pieces, and throwing the soldier and his horse into the ine onto the ice which gave way under their weight precipitating them into the icy water. Nearly all of the glandelinians who had dashed upon the bridge from either end were also floundering in the water, but the others having escaped unharmed formed a line along both banks to place their fugitive between two fires. The soldier managed to be the first across however, and fully thirty glandelinians came riding after him shouting to him to stop. But at this moment a considerable force of Angelinians made its appearance and dashed upon the persuers capturing every one of them. These men turned out to be the scouting party of general Clybourne Angelinians and as the soldier told them of his mission it did not take them to long to report at headquarters and get a large force to the scene of actioj, but at this moment a big cavarly force under general Hamlin swept upon the Angelinians in a terrific charge. Everywhere could be heard the unavering call of bugles, the deafening clash of millions of horses hoofs, the converging cheers of mr myriads of glandelinians the tremendous barking roar of carbines, sharp orders cleaving the turmoil, the wild nigh of thousands of stricken horses, and the frightful demon like yell of the glandelinian combatants.
General Hamlin was soon riding into the heart of the christian line firing with both hands before him, about him, half frenzied Angelinians fighting most desperately, striking at him with daggers, sabres, and musket butts, even jabbing at him with bayonets and pikes, firing point blank, spring at him with naked hands in a fierce effort to drag him from the saddle. It was all a pandemonimm of hellish confusion, chaos, a wild babble of yells, curses and blasphemies, his eyes blinded by the glint of steel, and glare of fire.
The impetious of their rush carried them irrestibly forward over and through the line, they rode across thousands of the dead bodies, and thousands of men reeling and falling from the saddle as fast as the lawn mow cuts grass, thousands of riderless horses, and revolvers emptied sweeping on unguided, carbines, emptied and revolvers also were flung aside, and hands were closed hard on sabre hilts. Foot by foot, yard by yard they fought and drove the wedge of their charge untill at several points they swept through the maze of purple coats cutting them down like corn. Complete as the fury of the resistance was the Angelinians realized the odds against them, the desperate nature of the fight.
It was a bloody murder, massacre hand to hand, point blank. Over the trenches poured the yelling flood of glandelinian horsemen all being the fierce Gargolians, and the Angelinians fought savagely, brutally and with all the fury hate and rage and desperation could bring to bear, bring the hooded yelling fiends down like the lea leaves in an autom storm. The screams of the wounded, the tremendous zing-szang of bayonets against bayonets, or ring of sabre against sabre, the crashing roar of myriads of carbines, the cracking of revolvers and pistols and all the wild war cries mingled into an indescribible din. Hamilen was almost the first to fall, but other leaders rallied their men and fought like fiends, the Angelinian s yeilding their ground only by inches. General Frank parrol an Angelinian commander was bleeding from dx six flesh wounds and was borne from the field, while general Clybourne was himself severely wounded byt maintained his command untill the contest would be finally decided. General Comanches glandelinians flushed with their apparent success dashed on spurring on maddened horses into the ranks of the purple coats, hurling them right and left, firing int o infuriated faces, slashing about with dripping sabres. It was hand to hand, clubbed carbines, lances against kin knives, bayonets pikes, and sabres a fierce breathless struggle for their lives among a horde of purple coats. Dragged from his horse at the first shock, his revolver empty, his broken sabre a jagged piece of steel general Comanche backed or hacked his way through the first line of purple coats and found refuge bei behind a dead horse.
Here with-others he made a fierce stand, gripping a bayonet. It was all the work of a moment. About him went scurrying figures, infurinted faces, threatening weapons, yells of agony, cries of rage. The twelve officers fought like cornered and desperate feinds standing back to back and striking blindly at leaping bodies, and clutching hands.
Out of the mist the mad confusion of breathless combat one face alone seemed to confront the general, leaped forward crazed with sudden hate, hurled aside the bodies in the path and sent his whirling sabre crashing at his assailent. As he went down he realized now it was to be a battle to the finish for even as the sabre had struck the assailent himself had fallen mortally wounded.
Lying on his fa e he fired twice deliv deliberately choosing the exposed Angelinian commander for a target. The latter striving to mount his steed fell forward grasping the mane desperately, a ste stream of blood dying the blanket of the animal as his horse also fell beflre a storm of bullets. Again the rifle came to the level, a spurt of flame a sharp report and another Angelinian generals horse staggered to its knees and sank bearing its burden with it. Combatants rushed all about him, and another Angelinian general hoved to view. Again there was a flash of flame, and the general sprang backwards, and went reeling to the ground the two generals Nickimann and John Sandermann being mortally wounded by Comanche alone. The one general shot at first by Comanche was general Jack Steevans but he was only slightly wounded. Comanche again fired as an Angelinian colonel dodged between a horses leg, sending him sprawling.

A score of Angelinians dropped to their knees and opened fire, but the bullets missed and two of these Angelinians were shot down. At this moment when the cavarly force had driven in the entire line general Jacksonin Evans and general Colonial Mc-Hollester came to their aid with fresh infantry and artillery and though the glandelinians seemed utterly overwhelmed and mowed down in masses the Glandelinian troopers were really still in great numbers and not wishing to lose the advantage they had already gained they pressed the attack with amazing fury the assault being so steady, vehement, and violent that general Hansonin fearing that all of his men would be mowed down by the glandelinian cavarly ordered general Kindernine to withdraw from his right, and go to the aid of the others while he sent heavy parks of artillery to shell the whole glen which had become this time a charnel hell and in it general Jacksonin Evans had fallen from his horse severely wounded. The artillery battalions could not get there in time and when they did they could not check Shoemannins advance at any point of the line whatever and soon everygun was either dismounted, disabled or without horses, and here a regular morgue was exposed among the guns, so many had fallen.
The glandelinians yelling with derision pressed on and heavier bodies fell upon general Hansonins entire center the entire battle being now in full sway. Despite the fury of the attack the Angelinians held firmly while reinforcements arived but these could not do the work offered to them and the christians at this point was falling back all along the line through the glens their columns shattered and mangled and with hundreds of thousands of their dead and wounded strewing the plains. General Kindernine already reported that his right wing was annihilated, that his whole line was falling back cut and torn and that the glen and the whole battle line was like a volcanoes inferno.
Inthe meantime general Colonel Mc-Hollester had reformed his broken lines and comprehending the desperate nature of the situation, and the full strength of the glandelinian foes made a slow withdrawal before his divisions already threatening to overwhelm the enemy foolishly abandoning his positions at this point. General Mc-Hollester advanced and formed his new lines in the Hemlinton glens preparing for another desperate resistance it now being evening, and even now his ammunition for the troops was running low. The resumannition of the attack upon Mc-Hollesters line was centered upon general Santas divisions but already it had spread further out, and now heavy forces were rushing up to join the other glandelinian forces and now the battle raged with a fearful display of savagery. Many of the christian generals feltvalready that the battle was lost for they knew that Mc-Hollester could not hold his position very long even with the bigger force he had at his disposal and his only chance to come off victorious was to strike the foe swiftly and with such force as to paralize persuit. Along his whole front attacked great forces of glandelinians capable of crush ing his own columns to death, and so Mc-Hollester at the advise of his generals did the only thing possible.
Ordering the men to fix bayonets he swung his compact divisions into marching columns. On came the glandelinians, but before they could realize what was being done, the Angelinians with flankers out, and skirmishers in advance rushed straight down into the glen tward the glandelinians. It indeed was a desperate move. General Mc-Hollesters obk object was being impressed upon the glandelinian leaders the thought of their utterless fearlessness and create the impression that the Angelinians would never dare such a thing, even if they did have a larger force behind. With flags unfurled the Angelinians went on the very audacity of the movement striking terror into the hearts of the glandelinians and all of their divisions broke and fled, butthe main column though almost panic stricken at first for a time rallied and amid the tumult of bayonets set the Angelinians like demons holding their ground for an hour but at last they were again compelled to give way but retreated in good order, the Angelinians not following very far. Shoemannin at his main point of the line was still pressing his attack with the same tremendous fury and several brigades were sent in hour by hour to support the christian center. The attack was repulsed however.
In the meantime more soldiers were sent by genera l Mc-Hollester to go for more aid and Violet and her sisters went with these soldiers to see what they could do also to help. Violet and her sisters crossing the Sandersburg pike met heavy bodies of Angelinians moving the same way and these soon reached the ce christian center and went into action on the right. Twice already amid the dreadful carnage the christian center had been driven from their position and twice it had been reta en retaken both sides surging back and forth. The christian officers who watched the battle could still see the seriousness of the situation and wondered if the center would hold in the last of the attack. Already many of the field pieces ad been disabled and thousands of artillery men were also down. The commanding general of the christian center general James Watterson had been seriously wounded with his aid general Costellic Montrose and these Angelinians were without leaders. For a four more hours the furious conflict went on and the support of all the divisions which had arived did not seem to do the Angelinians any good. On the glandelinian side general Jack Waltersonin was severely wounded, and general Costellion Montrose Sandersburg was mortally wounded in the leg. But still the glandelinians continued the terrific o ght with unabated fury....

Again and again Shoemannin threw forward heavy forces only to have them crushed and mangled and driven back in utmost confusion. Mc-hollester lines however attacked anew was again custed out of its position and the christian general James Joiconin himself was slightly wounded. Once again the whole of Shoemannins army pressed the christians back and now it looked as if they were going to be held back for the enemy was in possession of all the cannon. And another christian general called James Brintletoe had fallen severely wounded, and some of the christian forces were demorilized. Richard Kinderwine though he had suffered the loss of one wing still held his ground still having at his command fearful odds. In the meantime a large force was withdrawn from general hansonins right by general Vivian and these were now thrown heavily upon Shoemannin'scolumns who were again soon checked in their onward course, but there was no possibility of driving them back as yet, for general Hucbaum Manley had simultaneously massed half of his force under Federal to Shoemannins aid, and also concentrating a fierce attack upon general Vivians whole three wings, the center being commanded by general Louis Melden Bicknell. for a time now the carnage along this point of the line was indeed tremendous and many brave officers not named here fell on both sides, all of them being high officered generals. Bicknell himself was wounded but able to retain command he being a christian general.

With a howl that was like the roar of the wind in a typhoon the Glandelinians pressed the attack furiously but the Angelinians repelled the terrific attack there being a regular tug of war. The long bayonets of the Angelinians pierced the bodies of the Glandelinians by the thousands and with unerring fatality keeping them at bay the while. Fully fifteen Glandelinians fell to where one of the Angelinians fell but there were so many of them that they did not notice how destructive the long bayonets and pikes of the christians were. When the discovery was made general Allmanns Glandelinians became demorilized but their leader was everywhere in their midst yelling frantically at them to stand firm but at the heat of the conflict one of the Angelinians ran him through with a sabre, killing him instantly. More than two thirds of Allmanns force had been annihilated and the survivors demorilized over the fall of their leader recoiled in confusion his whole army being decimated and scattered.

The main force of the enemy however continued the fierce onslaught upon general Vivians right wing, Torrington leading about six million three hundred thousand men against general Jackson Genleys divisions who pren pretended to retreat in order to allow the three divisions of Angelinians to get in the rear of the foe, and when this was donehe ordered a desperate stand. Torrington soon discovered that the Angelinians far outnumbered his forces ten to one which placed his men at the mercy of the Angelinians. The Glandelinians found it out as soon as he did but they fought like demons for an hour then as their divisions were torn in fragments they began to fall back in confusion. Torrington made desperate efforts to rally them but in vain for they dashed away like lunatics and tried to escape. But there was no escape for them. The three christian divisions under general Raymond Robertson federall in their rear hemmed them in like the coils of a Boa Constrictor and they fell before the bayonets like the leaves of a hurricane tossed forest. Torrington saw that all was lost a and made a desperate attempt to cut his way through the christian line, but which ever way he turned a wal wall of sharp pointed bayonets confronted him.

To break through them was impossible. The Angelinians had surrounded him on three sides while his divisions were holding against at las least ten times their number now, but nevertheless had managed to make a horrible breach in the cirle circle and many of them fell ; while the survivors were fiercely battling their way through the large gap. S At last Torrington was pierced by a bayonet and he fell severely wounded but not fatally.

finally large reinforcements came to the aid of Torrington and his cowaio assailents were hemmed in in turn and so desperate was the situation that Raymond Federalls army was threatened with annihilation and he himself mortally wounded had to order his men to retreat, and the christian lines went back once more several of the men be r bearing their desperately wounded general with them with broken hearts. For fully four hours this part of the battle had raged furiously along the christian right every onslaught of the enemy being repulsed with terrific slaughter.

In the meantime general Mc-hollester was doing al, his best to reorgi reorginise his defeated and shattered divisions but nothing could be done for when the enemy was driven back a, along his lines the survivors only went at it again and again with with redoubled violence. Though more reinforcements arived steadily his christian divisions were soon retiring in confusion the whole center of general Hansonins line now threatening to give way. In the midst of all the storming carnage general Hansonin was compelled to withdraw general Mc-Hollesters divisions and simultaneously requested Violet and her sisters to see what other movements were being made by the Glandelinians, but orderi ordered them to take a squad of cavarly men with them.

"Avoid general Manley's lines as much as possible as he is on the lookout and his cannons may open fire on you! He is just as bad or worse than his three other brothers also" he said.

"We can take care of ourselves and we won' t go too near the enemys lines" Said Violet as she and her sisters hugged a and kissed him good be bye." I know how general Hucbaum Manley is and will not venture too near his firing lines, for I have heard that he is just as much of a child hue butcher as his brother general John Manley."

"Come back as soon as you can." Said general Hansonin as his noices started off." And do not tarry too long as we may lose you."

Indeed Violet and her sisters realized that they had a perilo's undertaking, as they feared that they would encounter another squadron of grayscoats that might be bigger than those who were to escprt and protect them. From their investigation they soon learned that ten million five hundred thousand men under general Hembertoninncranin was advancing to help Shoemannin to win success. They discovered that he was a man of ferocious disposition being as cruel as general Federal who was advancing to restorm Hansonins center. They had great reason to dread these two men , the man with such a long and funny name especially another general called Hemberton who in some cases was more repulsive than general Federal and more harder to escape from. As they journeyed on they were startled by the sound of wild firing from countless cannons of heavy calibre but nevertheless they continued on the din far as it was being fairly loud enough to make the ground tremble like a convulsive shock. After traveling for half a mile and worried by the sounds of the tremendous firing that seemed to split the earth Violet and her sisters saw a large patch of Glandelinians moving up from the smith, then a large body of them far to the south and north and to the left. some of the Glandelinians saw thelittle girls however and thinking that they were timid little creatures as children usually are in most cases, and also thinking they were some of the children who had escaped from some child slave pen a number of them set after the little girls in a score the leader advancing at a tearing rate.

Violet and her sisters hearing the bizz of bullets laid low on their horses neck and dashed off, Jennie taunting the leader with a pretty handkerchief.

"In the name of the Glory of Glandelinia halt." Shouted the leader astonished that little girls could even ride horses so good as they did, expecting them to go only at a trot." Halt in the name of Glandelinia or we'll ki ll your horses under you and then kill you also."""

But the little girls only urged their horses on the faster though they heard a score of shots go off simultaneously. At this moment Violet's horse fell but before she was thrown Joice and Jennie slackening the appee speed of their horses managed to lift her off and she was soon seated behind Joice, Angeline and the rest having held the persuers in check, with well aimed shots from both their pistols, and grayscoats fell for every single shot. The Angelinian soldiers following in the rear also fired but the Glandelinians returned a fire which annihilated all the soldiers and a glancing bullet hit Jennie's hand. Joice managed to bring down three grayscoats at one shot and caused more embrassment among the rest than had been expected.

"Well I'll be jiggered." Exclaimed the leader as he reigned in his horse." You will have to be careful men as these escaping child prisoners or slaves seem to be crack shots, and may be some of these recent rebels under Angelinia Aronburg, and Jennie Turner."

A lieutenant at this moment came up and ordered the persuit continued. The lieutenant was suspicious of the little girls ashe knew of no other children but the Vivian Girls who could be such dead shots.

"Those little imps shall pay dearly for all my men they shot down." roared the main leader in a rage as he rode up." Forward men. They must be caught at all costs."

With shouts and yells the Glandelinians dashed on and began to gain on the little girls who again fired a spluttering volley dropping the lieutenant and six other commissioned officers simultaneously but only wounding them as they did the rest, as the little girls did not wish to kill any one unless pressed too hard. Even the main leaders horse was shot under him and he was thrown several yards like a ball and then a ball hit him in the head. Several men rushed to his aid.

"Don't mind me men" He cried. "After those little girls. I'll have those young spartians out to pieces and their insides taken out for this. Get me a horse horse one of you men .I'm not wounded much. My head is only slightly scratched.."""

Violet and her sisters had gained some distance by the time the Glandelinians were ready to resume the persuit, but now the grayscoats were seperating and thirteen of them were racing off in another direction to intercept the fugitives, the general again in the lead dashing down a road with the rest. Two men dropped from their saddles, their horses dragging them l along the road. At the same time more bullets whizzed close to the general and he was compelled to halt the losing time.

As Violet and her sisters dashed on ahead, a large and new squar squadron of Glandelinians suddenly appeared in front of them from a turn in the road the nearest being ten, and as the little girls dashed over a fence and across a field a series of fierce yells broke the stillness.

"Catch those spies." Yelled the leader who was general Convention. "They must be the vivian Girls and the first man who lets them get away will be condemned to death."

Violet and her sisters now started a rave race for freedom dashing tward a narrow creek they saw far ahead of them.

"Halt you slippery little devils." Shouted Convention. "In the name of Heaven halt"

The glandelinians riding wildly gained rapidly on the little girls who heard the zing zing of scores of bullets about them. Desperate as was their situation Violet and her sisters urged their horses on tward the creek. Convention cursed, blasphemed and swore something awful, and taking aim at Violet fired, the bullet taking off her ribbon, her hair falling loose about her face. Again he fired bringing down the horse, both violet and Joice being thrown. Scores of his men rode close behind and now they fired bringing down Jennie's horse also, then dismounting Angeline, but the little girls jumping on the horses of their other sisters sped on still outdistancing the frane frantic persuers even then while the little girls strove in vain to shoot Convention down and only succeeded in knocking his pistol out of his hand, strp stripping his hat from his head, cutting off several of his buttons, and making his sabre scabbard go flying several yards. Reaching a fence the little girls dashed over and continued on tward the creek. The glandelinians hastily dismounted and climbed the fence opening a general fire. But many of them seemed to be poor marksmen and the bullets flew wild, while several more of the glandelinians were soon plunging head first to the ground and stone dead this time, the little girls resorting to the last point now and did not care what they did.

"After the little devils." shouted Convention. "There are quicksands in that creek and they willnot dare making a crossing so we will catch them."

The glandelinians reached the creek which was a foot deep and under which could be seen in the sum summer time a stretch of dark brown sand. Now the creek was covered with ice and snow. The lt little girls however had found a real deep part and so had waded across saftly the grayscoats yelling and cursing.

"There are quicksands allright but those little centepedes made a safe crossing so I believe we can cross also." Said Conventino.

He led them on, the men following nervously. They struggled fiercely and managed to get across though twenty four horses perished in the pit sands. The little girls were far ahead by this time and could hear a clamor that indicated that the battle was still going on but probably slackening. Hembertonimcriani had come to the aid of Shoemannin and Federal and also Homberton and now the roar of battle was redoubled in fury. The glandelinians under Convention were still following but fearing the nearnest of the christian line he was forced to give it up. On account of the battle line having changed its formation the little girls did not know how to get back to the lines. They had trudged on for a little while when another swarm of grayscoats appeared spreading out like the sticks of a fan. Violet and her sisters seeing that their assailants would be compelled to advance from one direction dashed behind a stone wall against a dirt pile of a low bluff which towered in protection above.

"We must be quick now. We can't waste time now as it is a matter of seconds." Thought Violet her face white but her eyes shining. "They are surely coming and a horde of them too."

Jennie retreating behind a wooden partition took her rifle barrel and knocked a hole through the back big enough to see through. Then she started to blaze away. There was a wild scurrying of mounted figures almost close to the position the air vocal with shrill cutories. Then the sharp sputtering of seven colts broke out. The smoke rolled upon them in a pungeant congealing cloud, nervious fingers pressing the triggers again and again. They could see reeling horses, men gripping their horses manes to keep r erect, staring frightened eyes, animals flung back on their haunches, rearing madly in the air. The fierce yells of exultations changed into a savage scream bullets by the score crashed into the boards of the high fence, it rocked with the contact of a body flung forward by a plunging horse, and then the smoke blew away, and then they saw on the field the dead and dying horses, thirty motionless bodies huddled in the deep snow a number of dismounted men and a squad of riders in a confused motion tward the shelter spreading out in a half circle.

There was a rolling volley and speeding bullets crashed against the fence splintering the wood. Then Violet and her sisters fired. Six glandelinians rolling to the go ground laid motionless. Like lightning violet and her sisters worked their pistols without realization, they heard the bellow and roar of the enemys carbines, and the sputtering of their colts. The grayscoats came leaping, crowding through the smoke wreath, they saw several stumble and rise again, they saw a number leap into the air and then crash face down, they saw them break, circling to right or left and crouching as they ran. Fourteen reached the fence only fourteen. Four pitched forward with a revolver bullet between their eyes. The other coming near Joice struck with empty pistol butt as his hand grabbed her throat, sending him sprawling into the snow. The others then retreated. The glandelinian finding now how they were mowed down became discouraged and in the lull the little girls slipped around the bluff and reached Hansonins lines persued by five hundred glandelinians.

At once a big squad of Angelinians went to the aid of the little girls sending the glandelinians scurrying for shelter. The little girls finding general Hansonin reported of the attack made by general Homberton, Hombertonimcriania, and federal and Shoemannin. The attack indeed was terrific. First on e Hombertons columns who continued the carnage for an hour before he was overwhelmed and driven back, and he himself losing a hand. Wounded as he was he only resumed the attack for revenge, untill his columns had been mangled and shot to pieces by Mc-hollesters cannon. Shoemannin led furious assaults against general Hindernins forces continually since the battle had started his men having formed themselves into huge wedges. Assault after assault was repulsed amid excruciating slaughter but again Shoemannin led them forward to the attack though he himself was wounded in the arm. At one point along the line the assaulting columns had made some apparent success for general Hindernins first grand division threatened with annihilation were being forced back in the greatest confusion and it seemed as if they were unable to rally. For an hour this position was in dire danger then up came general Maurice Costellicos divisions which were thrown upon the exultant assailants. The glandelinians held stubbornly for ten imutes and then they were forced back the whole of Shoemannins division being entirely repulsed.

Along the left Federals assaults for the time being were the fiercest. within fifteen imutes he had lost over sixty thousand men but for two hours he kept up the terrific assault untill so many heavy forces were concentrated upon him that he was compelled to retire his whole right wing being rolled up and his center riddled by a heavy cannon fire. In the meantime more and heavier assaults were made by thirteen million glandelinians led by general Barnhardth and Beg Bongian Evans against the christian right with terrible violence.

The advance had been broken up however but depite his divisions being placed between two storming fires Evans rolled up the entire christian right right amid the most horrible slaughter ever seen in the battle before. Barnhardth was killed amid the scenes of slaughter, and Evans though severely wounded by a shrapnell shell retained his command and kept the firing along his own lines at white heat. To make things worse a large part of Barnhardths divisions now commanded by general Batemannovi, moved in a direction which again brought the glandelinian line of charge upon the christian center. And now it was five o clock in the afternoon.

Hindernins could not arive in time to rei repair a break made by the recent assaults of Shoemannin and Homberton and so he was also forced to give way, the grayscoats rushing forward with irrestible force. General Rov Robert Vivian saw the threatening danger and sent a messenger with an order to general Nero to come to the aid of the right wing with his entire force. General Norto was about two miles away when he received the message sent to Nero instead, but neverto theless he hastily set on the march. Fearing that general noble or Nero would be too slow general Vivian threw all his reserves upon the assailants but they could do nothing and only suffered fearful losses in privates, and scores of general officers together.

One division after another was sent but they were only driven back torn and shattered with their commanding officer generals either killed or wounded.

General vivian was at a loss of what to do. He could not get baldwin to support the right wing as he could not get the range as the region was too thickly wooded. Already the right grand division had been cut up and driven a mile from their works. He sent another messenger t to Nero begging him to hurry and writing a full note on the condition of the christian lines. At this time Nero was a mile and a g half away, and eva even sent in a report that general Rhobaum Manleys let left wing was about to engage him and he feared he could not bring much aid. Evans pressing his attack furiously, advanced one of his divisions far beyond the right wing which was still trying to hold coming upon general M. Bernard Millers division overlapping its flank and capturing over one hundred thousand prisoners. The main body struck Picknells flank and crushed it in and drove the Angelinians into confusion. Picknells divisions placed between three fires fought like a horde of demons forcing their flankers back and making immense breaches in the enemys lines. Their losses were terrible but nevertheless the glandelinians pressed on the fury of the onslaught along the center of the christian line being terrific, and whole divisions seemed to slowly melt away.

General vivian could see now that the general sway of the battle was now nigh. He was forced to send general John Evans who was held in reserve, and indeed the last reserves at that, to the aid of the center and just as he arived, the glandelinian commander Batemann fell peirced by a hundred bullets, while generals Purgatory, Machabrees, and Andrew Avellino fell severely wounded.

Evans threw his columns upon the glandelinians who were then carrying the main line of works, and though he managed to check them he could not regain the works, his frist line of charge having been swept away in the first unsuccessful atrempt, and he himself shot in the hand.

General Hindernins who had attempted to rally his men was severely wounded, and Johnstons and Mc-Hollesters divisions were wiped out and the two generals killed. In the meantime general Robert vivian sent general Cannon with his forces who with about fiye hundred thousand Angelinians made a move southward attacking general Broncos glandelinians furiously and as furiously as an attack v could be made, Brono falling back tward a lane cut off. General Convention had now arived with about three hundred thousand Glandelinians and he cut the christians off from Muldoon creek untill general Moldon came up with heavy reinforcements enabling Brono to hold his ground so stubbornly that Gannons forces were forced or threatened with annihilation, and was forced to gradually retire, the Glandelinians persuing closely and in heavy force. On pressed the Glandelinians ipressed with their success upon the christians center, Moldons lines pressing on also pouring through the glens, and across the creeks and compel ing general Techneys Glandelinians to force the capitulation of James Techeneys Angelinians along its banks after sanguinary fighting capturing nearly three hundred thousand wounded. The entire right and center being forced, general vivian had to withdraw and during the retreat which took four hours to become general, on account of the size of the beaten armies general Rockford had to surrender his whole whole division to prevent them from annihilation, though very little out of five hundred thousand men he had.

General Vivian had ben been forced to retreat indeed indeed giving up the attempt to frustrate the escape of general Huebaun Manleys armies but during the night he concentrated into a strong position that could not be forced and waited for Manley to move forward. But Manley hesitated to rew renew the struggle and prepared to make a movement to join general Johnston Jac en Manley.

THE BATTLE OF ALBERTINIA.....

A few days after the battle of Torrington general Raymond Richardson Federal of Johnston Jacken Manleys army hearing of the results of the battle, of General vivians retreat, made preparations to cut off general Hanson vivians communications with him with the intention of preventing a junction of the christian army and so concentrated their armies upon Abertinia a small town about thirty eight miles north of Torrington creek near the Mc-Hollester Run river which ran northwestward in that location.

Manleys plan was to strike Hanson a blow which would prevent him from sending Nero to the aid of his brother but general Richardson Halsteds Abyssinkilians which was a part of Neros advancing command came into collision with general Federal close to Albertinia and after some bloody fighting he was checked, and his right and left rolled up with terrible loss. In the frightful slaughter of his columns which had occured Federal had a narrow escape from having one of his own main wings turned two ways, which if it had happened would have resulted very fatally, and though his right and left had been rolled up he managed to withdraw safily after ab engaging the fierce Abyssinkilians for a whole day, Federals losses being most stupendous, for the Abyssinkilians were different than Angelinians and they were so fierce that they committed the most terrible fighting of all christian troops.

In the evening of that bloody day, Manley knowing that general Nero was advancing to make a junction with general vivian and hearing of federals dissilusionment, intended to hold his own wing in concentration upon the Abyssinkilian right wing, and strike a blow against general Nero at the same time. He forbade general Huebaun to fight with general vivian which was a blunder for his intention was to deliver a blow so as to keep general Nero and general vivian seperated. But it was a failure as being free from Huebaun Manleys army general vivian was able to later on change his movements and rush to the aid of general Nero and his brother.

So on the morrow of the second day he advanced his entire right wing in the direction of the advancing army crossing the Angeline Run river at the point of the bayonet. But unfortunately general Hansons army which had remained out of action since his victory at Evangelinin Crania barred his way. Nero vivianias forces had concentrated here but unfortunately they had been surprised every one of his divisions being cut to pieces within a few hours time. The survivors terrorized retreated in a pandemonium of confusion, the men throwing down their weapons and fleeing in all directions. A dvancing tward the Beppo Lansin railroad lines the furious Glandelinians pressed upon general Jack Evans divisions but the Angelinians armed to the teeth actually riddled and mangled the gray lines to po pieces. General Rumhausers divisions in overwhelming numbers crossed the same stream at another point and struck against Mc-perns purple wedge, but Hanson tnr throwing reinforcements to the rescue caused each charge of the Glandelinians to meet with frightful desdination. At the same time the central grand divisions and the left grand divisions of general Johnstons Manleys first line of attack advanced upon Websters main force while his right under general Zimmermannia extending their lines eastward drove Pandora's purple lines back crushed and mangled. however they could not make any impression on Mc-turners artillery wedge which swept them down in fearful numbers like the tornado does the corn.

under Shoemannia Federal, Lake Ambrose, Johnston and Bicknell had

Webster having over one million eight hundred thousand men and supported by three hundred guns of heavy make and nearly a thousand small field guns and machine guns resisted the onslaught of Rumhausers Glandelinians who for a time had great advantage of over the force of Angelinians he immediately attacked but now heavy reinforcements under Johnston pepic Evanians arived and these were thrown upon the assailants with prodigious and overwhelming fury General Mendlee [illegible] despite heavy reinforcements one of Mc-Hollester Hendrins divisions was cut to pieces and forced to retreat before overwhelming numbers.

Manley enraged over the outcome of his plans sent Shoemannia to help ordering him to force Hanson back at any risk and giving Shoemannia all the fresh forces he could spare as he knew full well that the other forces under Shoemannia were too badly smitten to be of an any further services just now. Shoemannia led a furious cavarly charge first and supported by artillery was about to gain the advantage when genral Fredrick Parsons divisions came up contesting the bloody field with indescribable fury.

Fearful was the terrific slaughter caused by the terrific storm of fire along the gray lines, but nevertheless the Angelinians still fired.

The Glandelinians greatly out numbered the Angelinians giving battle with singular skill and bravery. Along the whole of Brysnts lines there was a stupendous pandemonium of a roar of musketry, but his Angelinians had to fi fight without artillery support and his center being att acked with indescribable fury was compelled to give way his whole divisions being forced back all along the line cut up and thrown into disorder by the furious fire of the Glandelinian cannon. General Hanson saw this heard the frightful prolonged fire or roar of the enemys guns and is learned that itwas Manleys intention to force the lines so as to strike against Nero and prevent aid from coming to his brother , and to prevent his left from being overwhelmed he sent general Fredricksonia with aliu about two million men to the relief o of Halsted who s lines extending twelve miles was hard pressed amid horrible carnage. The arival of these divisions increased the battle to redoubled fury and general Vivians slowly rallying army could plainly hear the awful clamor.

General Brylants retreat retreating army was now relieved by general Claisment and these lines again opposed the assailants with redoubled energy.

Hanson himself now having cleared most of his own front for hours and assured that no further attacks were coming against his lines pushed on tward the rapidly thinning christian lines heavy reinforcements and the enemy pressing on met with such fcerc fierce and bloody resistance that the slaughter became like a charnell hell.

The fiercest attack ever seen since the wars commencement was made on Hansons left wing as soon as he had sent the reinforcements it being made by the right grad division o of general Shoemannias army under Jaronena. The center and left of Grany's divisions was att acked fiercely by the Glandelinians under Granes who carried the position in the Mc-Hollester Woods but could get no further and Hendaca Edwards artillery arived and shelled their lines so unmercifully that the Mc-Hollesters woods became a regular war hell and even became a blaze with fire s and smoke. Gamets Abyssinkilians though they were cut off from Hansons main line contested the ground with all their energy mowing down in ense swarms of the assailants.

Hundreds of thousands of the Glandelinians had already fallen but the assault was continued with increasing fury.

General Simonis Degree and Thomas Baffings and Thomas Raffins advanced their infantry in four columns and general Henriques division divisions coming up recieved t he full brunt of their onslaught. Henriques left wasrolled up but the rest held howe e he however. The Abyssinkilian and Angelinian divisions under general Jones met an anni annihilating fire from the Glandelinian cannons commanded by Leo Costello and were soon reduced to mere fragments but they held to the last m man facing theat storming chainsof artillery as if it was a coo cool breeze on a sweltering hot day. While the withering tempest of firing was increasing general Augustine St clare came up with his heavy forces who let loose their own storm of fire with he roar of a million cannon. The carnage was murderous but Federal coming up made a tremendous charge with his whole force cutting St Clares divisions to pieces and driving them back in disorder. Degree and Thomas were severely wounded and Brono falling back toward a lane out off General Convention had now arived with about three hundred thousand Glandelinians and he cut the christians off from Muldoon crook untill general Meldon came up with heavy reinforcements enabling Brono to hold his ground so stubbornly that Gannons forces were forced or threatened with annihilation, and was forced to gradually retire, the Glandelinians persueing closely and in heavy force. Augustine himself lost two fingers. Federals divisions swept on like a seething typhoon his big cavarly divisions falling upon the Angelinians under Richard Rat ensen with merciless fury cutting and mowing down all the artillery men ,killing he horses and disabling many of the guns. Federals men even captured nearly three hundred thousand prisoners and pressed in so far through the main line amid a sea of tumul tious bayonets and pikes that a part of Shoemannius force had to be sent to his rescue as Prue Bruce, and Hot Horten coming up with the rest of Hansons command made an indenidemable counter charge and soon a vertible sea of dead and wounded purple an and gray coats were exposed to view.

Hoynes Glandelinian infantry at he same t ime came to Shoemann ias rescue but met no a heavy annihilating fire of five thousand cannon which indeed mowed them all down and Hoyne was killed. As new ons/a onslaughts were made with almost preternatural fury general Parisis arived with large bodies of cavarly infantry dragoons and batteries of heavy artillery and also stong columns of battalions.The Glandelinians by sher bravery managed to take Parisias cannon and almost decimatec disciated his commands but the assailants could not pen itrate through the Angelinians and Atysainkillian divisions under Prue and being shot down in tens of thousands they had to stop advancing but they were not driven back and now opened just a fe fierce a hurricane of musketry and artillery of their own which was brought up.

Manleys immense squares under general Allentine centered their at orming attacks on general Jennings chain of batt eries. These batteries were defended with indescribable heroism resisting with the fury of desperation he repeated sledge hammer h hammer blows of the wh whole of Federals army and the only thing that enabled them to stand the terri le and merciless punishment inflicted was from the sublime and supreme stubbornness with which they were noted. Fierce and terrific was the onslaught of the Glandelinians but thousands upon thousands were mowed down all alo g the line. A T he Glandelinians tried with all their skill and st energy to carry Jennings cannon but Federals losses became unspeakably terrific and excruciat ing and Fendons divisions on his right having enc ountered a murderious cannon fire had suffered a crushing defeat his whole army being fiarly cut to pieces. Manleys center fared bter capturing Bernard Hansons batteries but after a series upon series of bloody counter charges the batt eries were retaken by general Alfred St Joice, and Henrique St l Clare and Manley fearing that he would be crushed if he did not engage Nero right away put his main left wing into motion and putting Bicknell and Ambrose Fuller at the head sent them down by a round about wayto check the advance of Nero who was between the Rosa and Cammillian glens and plains.

In the meantime Manleys right grand divisionof his main right win g began t o retire before the forces of Parisis Buel and Aldolph St Clare who was sent t o the assistance of Parisis and the command who was sent to the assistance of Shoemannius sh shattered columns had its own right turned and its left rolled up and threatened with destruction. Thourh general Vivian had fallen back part of his main forces under general Waren Jenain had still stood and they were stout to hurl back their assail assailants when general Comoroys Glandelinians came up in full force, engaged the desperate Angelinians in a murderous hand t o hand fight, and overwhelming them drove them in confusion toward general Vivians main lines who were trying to rally. General Coronadoes purple divisions with their biggest squares also made a desperate stand and though the assailants met a heavy fire they attacked in solid forces pressing the squares back with excruciating losses and finally causing them to flee in the utmost and wildest confusion.

The Glandelinians still assuming the offensive attacked the remaining Angelinian forces, the remanants of general Vivians center who still held their ground and a large force that had rallied making a general advance, and the remainder of the purple line after making a gallantstand being cut up and thrown into confusion-retired. The Angelinians first retired with a semblance of disciplime but as the Glandelinians pressed on them the Angelinians abandoned their arms and fled in a rout . Within half an hour Bicknell arived near the Camillian glens and began the fight there with Nero. First he engaged Neros left, then threw heavy and violent attacks upon the center and right. The Atysainkillians having formed a long bat line met the oncoming human wager waves in grey and slaughtered them in such terrible numbers that Bicknell was dismayed. our times Bicknell made tremendous on onslaughts with the same results of awful annihilation of his columns then as Ab Am Ambrose Fuller joined in the battle became terrific. Four about for hours more it raged with unceasing fury the Atysainkillians fight ing with such savage fury t that the Glandelinians were co compelled to withdraw Ambrose Fullers divisions being torn to pieces. Neroes divisions being victorious made a grand advance and opposed the assailants coming to general Vivians aid just at the moment his army was threatened with destuction, Hanson repealing his assailants and forcing fresh divisions of assailant to withdraw. On both sides the losses were i unaccountable and the battles fury haf had exceeded the frightfulcarnage at the St Dominean c fortifications and may it was not to be all over is yet either as pieces and Hanson and Bicknell were the only able generals for the t ime being. more was coming soon. General Vivians while whole right and center had been cut to General Vivian began to realize that the capture of the St Dominean fortifications would not come out and not wishing for futher fight ing in his crippled com dt condit ion decided to fall back but Nero who was concent rating new forces at Albertenia advised him that it would be folly t o fall back now and that he would not retreat untill Wiesbaum Manleys army was crushed.

General Neroes army numbering nine million was the only fresh army to contend against the Glandelinians. However general Vivian had little faith in Neroes army of winning the battle if he stayed to fight it outagainst Manley and no move of any kind could not be made against the St Dominean fortifications which was impose itle even to approach with his crushed and mangled army and another at atack would only mean suicide.

How Violet and her sisters felt over the battle no one could possibly describe and Kindernine their friend and guardian had only ten thousand men left out of one of his divisions of five hundred and fifty thousand and out of his main force of about five million vindernine had only about t wo million three hundred lost many of these being prisoners among the foe and the rest were among the dead and wounded.Out of four million August ine had only three million nine hundred thousand. General and Hansons and Vivians combined losses were held backthough general Vivian declared that the battle may turn out to be the hottest combat ever seen yet since the second battle of Me-Hellester Rum. It really did exced the fury of the battle of Fort Dominean as we can call those fortifications and what the real loss in the battle of Torrington was no one could just now estimate and over such a scene of dead and wounded Violet and her sisters almost cried their eyes out. "Poor Violet and her sisters. Was it possible that such a blow could have ben struck and yet they had trusted Jack Evans to come to the help of poor Kindernine. But what could he do? He had managed to hold out against attacks made onhim and his regiments had been annihilated entirely in the face of overwhelming numbers. Evans had an arm in a sling and a bandage around his head and leg while his friend John Evans had been wounded at the crisis of the first part of the terrific battleand was lying in an ambulance.Not a friend did Violet and her sisters seem to have left nowin the mangled divisions of general Vivians army except Evans. All whom they loved and depended upon had fallen either killedor so badly wounded that they were not expected to live and though the christian lines had been so fiercely engaged Violet and her sisters had not directed any re giments as Jack Evans had ben in command of the regiments the little girls had wished to command. The little girls had been in general Vivians columns when the retreat of his army began and he seen many officers strive in vain to stem the defeat.

"It was awful."Said Evans when he met them later."The Glandelinians attacked like hell blaz l blazes and after we held out stubbornly for two hours we were overwhelmed and almost completely wiped out only a hundred being left out of my three thousand and they couldn't hold. I t then tried t o bring my reserves to the rescue and even all the artillery I had but they were all mowed down by the enemys withering fire and storm of bullets and canister.I nevr saw such carnage before. It was horrifying."

"It certainly must have been ."Said Violet."I myself saw how Hanson was attacked and I cannot describe the scene."

"I sent men messen gers, to Baldwin asking him s uppert ."Said Evans. They got Baldwin to sent heavy batteries of artillery then one of them came back to me declaring that it was impossible to get within sight of Hansons lines as all seemed in a fearful seeti seeti seeting blaze of fire.He said the fright fu [illegible] from Mon Mouth its the same fire we escaped from!."

Two officers at this moment came dashing up swiftly!

"Your excellency ."They shouted."Look there. Isn'tthat a fire!"

"Its a hell."Answered Kindernine."And I believe is set. That lurid glow is getting brighter and brighter. We must not ify general Vivian.Its a terrible and unhappy sight."

frichful frightful carnage extended for the distance of seventy miles raging wih with the most terrible descript ion.''

''What happened to A. Augustine St Clress divisions''Asked Angeline.

''I heard they were desciminated.''

''Almost.''Said Evans, with exction. ''There carnage was terrible there. Augustine escaped annihilating but not excruciating losses. Many divisions had went to his aid but to late and everything is desolate along t that point.

And my you ought to have seen the extensive Mc-Hollester woods. It looked as if a tornado as extensive as to sweep its whole length and wit width had tore itself t hrough. The wreckage desolation and seas o of dead and wounded is hr heartrend ing.''

This sudden ans and terrific h.c carnage had taken great effect on Violet and her sisters. It had been a cruel blow upon them as well u as upn general Vivian. K Jacj Evans himself had many narrow escapes which he did not care t o relate to Violet and her sisters just thenhe they made him feel queer.

Most of general Vivians army was still retreating not hving ben rallied and it was wel toward two o'clock that afternoon when general Manley decided to go at it again and strike general Vivian before he could rally as he knew Nero would not be able to hold out much longer. Nero during the few hours of lull along general Vivians lines,(though all this while the uproar of batle was still heard along Hansons)Nero had formed his nw new batile linhs south of Albertinia his right and let left being under James Deleres and Pendersen and these decided to cover general Vivians reformation and while most of his center was making what seemed to be a retrograde movement his main batteries started up their terrible and cann on ading thunders that fiarly shook the earth for nearly a hundred miles and the bat le was on again once more along his lines and terrible was the slaughter.

General Neroes divisions took only half an h.ur hour to make even preparations for the meeting of the next onslaught and before general Manley could start his intentions of crushing pe.r general Vivian once more he found him himself between general Hanson and Nroe and Albert inis and an onslaught of nearly two million man at once was desciminated with the loss of ten brigade com manders and their commands also.

This furious stand was giving general Vivians frontal commandste make a rally twelve miles away. Movements and advances were being made at the same time by Bicknells Glandelinians while Shermannia made a desperate drive toward the right a nd left though suffering heavy losses for the rish risk and all the att empts to force Nr Neroes position at Albertinia war met with terible carnage for the length of fourty miles the aersults being directed against the right center and left. The battle was more fearful than before and though Neroes left was rolled up and displaced his other two wings mowed down every onslaught and Manleys right grand divisions which made a drive for Albertinia was also rolled up and dr driven from the field all out to pieces and routed. Bicknell at the same time made fierce attacks on Hansons lines but his main columns were cut and mangled to pieces twenty times and were compelled to withdraw. General W Hansons right had been rolled up by general Federal but Federal could not hold the positeion he took and was soon driven back his whole two wings being cut up and thrown into disorder. Ambrose Fuller advanced on general Hansons center but his whole command faced an annihilating fire extending for ten miles and though they made the three desperate onslaughts Ambrose could not gather his divisions to make another and was compelled to fall back. At this moment gener general Ambrose Fuller was shot twice in the leg and fel severely wounded.

Shermannia managed to ttake the works to the re extreme right of general Nelkingborg and Swancincendias lines of Abyssinilians a almst overwhelming numbers but they could make no further impression and again the Glandelinians fell back but no i untill hundreds of thousands had fallen. Shermannias army had been engaged simultaneously with the other columns but seperately and as was Bicknells both generals having been successful only to be driven back in the end. The rest had been engaged in sud successis succession but their efforts to force the christian lines back had been in vain. In the conflict general Bernard Hanson himself had been severely wounded and Warren Jennin c commander of Hansons center had first sustained a broken arm and then had all the buttons of his uniform and even his scabbard and his shoulder epaulettes shot away mysteriously. Manleys main drive a long tat line met the oncoming human wagon waves in grey and slaughtered them in such terrible numbers that Bicknell was dismayed. our times Bicknell made tremendous

Under Shermannia Federal, Admb Ambrose Johnston and Bicknell had again streve with the greatest violence to gain their goals simultaneously and for the rest of the day the batle raged all along the line without a single lull in any point Shermannia and Bicknell launching sweeping onslaughts unon the purple lines driving h Hansons main line clean through the Grahamenians lanes l or gains in an utt er rout but Nero had managed to hold his ground firmly once more and Ambrose John stons lines which stormed the christian lines with all their fury was cut down and routed in all directions. General Vivians right had fully rallied by this time and general Vivian seeing now that if he made in.sdive action the batle would at last le won his threw his right upon Hansons assailants the christians fighting with all their might soon repulsing the assailants and rolling up the whole column with their divisions fairly broken to remnants. Albertinia was shelled by Manleys batteries while he made another attack upon Nero only each time to meet with frightful decim inat ion. The roar of batle could be heard for over sehe seven hundred miles all the other assailants being repulsed and soon all the whole christ ian line with fixed bayonets crashed down upon the demoralized and terror stricken masses carrying all before them and changing t retreat into a total rout. General Smash-in-the-head and his aiding generals came t o the rescue and made a des perate stand but his commands were cut up and thrown into confusion also and Neroes columns charged them with the violence of a thousand thunder bolts sending them the Glandelinians back flying thus ending the conflict which had raged so incessantly for over eighteen hours.

To cover his retreat general Hinhaum lays waste to whole forests.The frightful but hery.

''I wonder what is all that smoke over yonder?''Said said Violet pointing toward the southwest where great clouds of white smoke was arising in convolutions, it being several days after the batle of Torrington.

''I din't know.''Said Joice.''I noticed it before but as it had been only of small size i had not paved no atention to it.''

''It must be that the Big stretch of Mc-Hollester woods are on fire.''Said Angeline.

''It is certainly suspicious looking.''Said voice.''And Its worse now t han when I first saw it.Get my glasses will you Jennie Please.''

''It indeed looks like a ig big fire alri ght.''Said Jennie producing t he glasses.''I almost fancy that I see two fires.''

''It is as fantastic as a volcanic eruption .''Saidnettie. And Ji Joice took the glasses and glanced through them.

''Its a forest fire.''She exclaimed excitedly.''And six others are springing up. They must have been set.''

''Let me see.''Said Violet .

Joice handded the glasses to her and looking thr through she exclamied;

''It is all right. Even villages are on fire in the distance.''I

''I bet the enemy is doing this to cover his retreat.''

A strong oder of smoke came to their nostrils like the pungeant reek of smouldering wood , while a dul l red glow seemed to lightens the heavy clouds of smoke which began to over cast the skyand Joice feared that it was coming toward the christian lines.Once in a while a tongue of flame would nerice the threatensing clouds far in the distance making a bright glare and fantistic sight. Joice looked at Violet wit h wide opened eyes.

''The army may be in great danger.''Said Joice, with a shudder.'' We must notify some officer who will warn them.It looks like we if all hat part ofthe world world was smoking somke smoking.''

Joice looked again with the glasses and saw that many villiages in the path of the forest fire were already burning like infernos and that the light ruddy glow pierced the ever increasing clouds like sh eets of lightning.

''No doubt those woods are a regular sea of fire.''Said Angeline. ''I looks as if it is going to be worse than the fo forests for fires that we escaped after the batle of the Daminean fortifications.I never saw anything like it before.''

''We must raise the alarm somehow.''Said Joice.''Come lets hurry.''

Off they went hurridedly and soon reached Kinderninas tent.

''General .''Cried Violet excitedly.''I have it a great forest fire headed this way.It must have been set by the enemy t o cover his retreat.''

Kinternina came up out of his tent hurriedly.

''Good God he a''He exclaimed.'' It is a forest fire all right for I can see the smoke of the fire strom.Now Nowhe its the same fire we escaped from!.''

Two officers at this moment came dashing up swiftly!

''Your excellency .''They shouted.''Look there. Isn'tthat a fire!''

''Its a hell.''Answered Kindrnine.''And I believe is set. That lurid glow is getting brighter and brighter. We must not ify general Vivian.Its a terrible and uncanny sight.''

Brighter and brighter the glare of the distant frost f fire grew and the now black clouds of smoke grew and was filled with a hurricane of sparks.

"It'sgot to be checked somehow said the officer." I myself have notifed general vivian when I discovered it, and he says it is coming so near that he could distinctly see the thousands of burning trees through his field glasses."

"I'll see what he intends to do"Answered Kindermine."Violet, you and your sisters may come along and see the fight if you like."

"All right"said violet, and off they started.."..

"This fire big as it might have been, may have been set by Manley to cover his retreat and check our advance."Said general Kindermine bitterly."He either does it to cover his retreat if he is going to make that movement, or he does it thinking to make us retreat or burn our wounded whom we are working so hard to have gathered up before he start any advance. Well we will see about this."

Violet in looking through her glasses saw that four large villiages were already in the embrace of the fire while in the southwest a regular convulsive wall of smoke began to rise from newly formed fires and the sight was indeed like a volcanic eruption. It was getting dark now from the clouds of smoke which assumed all colors in the direction of the approaching conflargration which was coming nearer and making an appearance as if the world was coming to an end. By this time they reached general vivians headquarters, and now the distant fire had become appalling . For the distance of a hundred miles the forests seemed to be enveloped in a long line of fire seemingly as high as the clouds themselves, and other long stretches of forests not touched before were already burning but fifteen minutes seemed to dissolve into flame and then be suddenly enshrouded in intense darkness as if the fire had died out and to the surprise of them all too.

"Run for shelter as fast as you can."Shouted some of the officers.

"There's going to be an explosion."

Suddenly violet and her sisters became conscious of a sudden scourching heat and they saw that the eastern and western skies had become of an ink blackness while a terrible boom[illegible] booming roar as of many millions of guns seemed to fill the air for a few seconds with a deafening din and the sound produced a countless number of echoes. All that could rushed for the nearest stream or lake and no sooner had they rushed into the water and swam half a wat way across the whole atmosphere was lighted far and wide with a terrific glare and then a terrifying crashing roar that seemed to split the very earth and rechoe in all the distant hills round with awe inspiring grandeur broke loose for a second and then torrents of roaring fire reached far across the river the distant trees burning till they tottered and fell to the ground, the flames being now lashed by the fire hurricane which drove all the flames before it and a cloud of sparks shot down all about them.

For three hours many of the soldiers and the little girls had been swimming helplessly in the water trying to sheild themselves from the awful parching heat, and when they finally got across the very sky in the far distance on the other side of the river which was wooded also with heavy pines seemed to be light by a bright lurid glow, and nearing the scene they could see that the flames leaping a thousand feet into the air becoming a roaring sea of fire which flared of a blinding brightness. And even the heat could be felt from there the fire having spread to the other side at the same time they had gotten across out of reach of the other fire. In every direction they looked that wall of fire appeared, and ink dark clouds ofsuke made the scene look fierce and the skies looked like the roof of the infernal regions. Violet and her sisters and the soldiers in their excited swim across the river had come too near the point where the storm of fire was approaching, and here they had the most thrilling times of their lives.

"We are certainly in the greatest peril."Moaned Angeline."We cannot escape this inferno, and nobody but God can rescue us now. That is a sign that he wants us to see heaven, so we might as well be prepared for escape is hopeless. The river will do no good now for there is an ocean of fire on the other side and the water will soon become boiling hot."

"I would be glad to get to heaven anyway."Said Joice bravely."How can any one rescue us from this forest fire anyway."

Though he said nothing the caption of the fugitive soldiers was bound to escape and save them no matter what the cost. On they sped the air being so full of smoke that they could hardly breathe. The smoke was becoming fairly suffocating and already the little girls could see the bright flickering of flames plainly while the roar of the approaching fire hurricane could be heard far in the distance. Gasping for air they searched for an opening, and saw that the nearest trees were on fire.

"This fire is traveling at a terrible rate."Said Jennie coughing."The atmosphere is so full of smoke that I can't hardly breathe."

Manly trees far behind them were already on fire, and to the right of them a distant pine forest was becoming like an inferno.

"I wonder how it can burn so fast in winter time at that!"Said violet."It does seem as if we are surely doomed. God have mercy on us."

"Look . We are chased by an inferno and several of the trees are threatening to fall."cried joice."See how they are wavering. They will fall on top of us if we do not watch out."

399

The little girls seemed terrified as they appeared to be in hopeless peril, and there seemed no chance of escaping, and to be rescued seemed impossible. A severe snowstorm of sparks were flying in all directions and the ominous roar of the fire hurricane and falling trees was becoming incessant and nearer approaching with appalling rapidity acte ding for miles, and trees even ahead of them was beginning to burn anew, and indeed their peril was getting greater every minute. It was appalling. Was there no hope! They were almost spellbound with terror for a forest fire of this kind was worse than a city fire and they knew it.

"Boom. Boom. Bang."

Three more fearful explosions seemed to make the ground tremble, and the roar of more grand greater explosions came afterwards, and some of the explosions being close made an appearance of a series of outbursts from a crater of a volcano.

"It's catching the powder mills and dumps, and munition factories in the towns." Fairly screamed poor violet."Oh God if it would only rain."

"We must do something to save ourselves."Said joice."We are pursued by a regular inferno and the burning leaves, and the rubbish on the ground makes so much smoke that it is stifling me."

On they sped but the flames had a good grip on the trees even ahead, burning fiercer and fiercer and several trees almost fell upon them toppling to the ground with a great crash. The fire getting so much fuel in its path was getting hotter and hotter, and more furious, and down toppled many trees sending up a cloud of sparks, the forest for scores of miles being a roaring furnace, and many other trees already smouldering were threatening to collapse while the flames in the distance reddened the smoke in an appalling manner, big tongues piercing the smoke like sheet lightning.

"This is worse than any kind of city fire."Said Jennie in despair.

"And it will not be long before we will be enveloped in the flames."

"We indeed seem to be in great danger."Said Joice."Look our out Jennie. Goodness gracious that tree."

Before she could get out of the way down came a burning tree bring with it a mass of burning leaves and brindles and branches. One end of the nearest branch struck Jennie in the front of the neck laying her outstretched on the ground.

"I'm not hurt."She gasped staggering to her feet."It's lucky it did not strike me on fire."

A score of trees now came down with a roar like thunder and despite the pain in her neck from the blow Jennie staggered on with her sisters. A new blaze was now starting at the left of them and the little girls knew that they confronted death in its most terrifying forms! By fire. Bright tongues glared and reached up through the rolling clouds of smoke, and every now and then the fire would burst through the clouds in sheets and roar upward tward the sky in awful splendor. The heat was now becoming terrible, and they thought sure that escape was impossible.

"It looks as if the whole world was burning up."Said Violet."Oh please Dear God save us."She cried pitcously .

Hundreds of thousands of trees in the far distance were already burning in a mass of flames and even before this wole forests scores of miles long and two or three miles wide at a time indicated by the bright ruddy glow were regular furnaces or oceans of fire now and it seemed as if the little girls were in the greatest danger now for even if rain did n come escape would be impossible for the heat o probably would dry the water as fast as it fell. Never had they ever observed such an apalling sight in a burning city as they saw in this fire. But despite their terrible danger violet and her sisters did not love hope. Had not God saved them before in greater dangers! Why not this! Nothing is impossible for him. Violet and her sisters who had despaired before felt a strange breeze from another direction still tward the christian lines but which favored the children remarkably. They were saved, for the fire was now moving in another direction and with the thankful hearts they reached the christian lines without further incidens but the sky was lighted up for hundreds of miles from the scene of the great conflargration, and all the christian officers had selected men to see if they could try and check it.

At midnight the forest fires were again at its worse and did spread to an awful distance but as the wind had changed it was traveling tward a part of general Hansons lines. Tward one thirty reports came from wireless stations depecting that a fire storm with a wind of cyclonic varity was approaching tward a large lane cut off, and there was sure signs of it driking general hanson christian lines before another o hour It was tward two o-dock when general hanson was surprised to find that burning embers were falling about his place b hail and work was begun to prevent the building from getting on fire and starting a forest fire at his location. The wind had changed to the southward again and was blowing briskly.

"Those woods are burning fast "Thought general Hanson to himself.

It was not long before he checked its progress tward his own lines.

Among the enemys lines during the same day while they were retreating the screaming of the butchered children slain in seized child slave places so the christians could not rescue them during their advance, the pationa passion of weeping and pleads were nerve racking. By the sound it seemed as if all the children that had been captured by the slowly retreating enemy were being killed, sliced up, burned alive being opened alive, and their hearts taken out all at once, and the death screams made unearthly sounds. If Huebaum Manley or his brothers were over e going to be converted it seemed on their death beds.... All day during the retreat the massacre continued at intervals for every large town or childrens asylums and child slave places seized, and out of thirty five thousand seven hundred and ninty nine children only one thousand remained. Manley at last sickened over this slaughter left but he had the villinges, and towns and slave places seized set on fire and all the children who remained in the child slave factories and wooded plantations were almost burned alive amid appalling screams. Not even the most cruel savages had both butchered any one so brutally, and the grayconts did it well too. Every child they shocked or smothered to death they cut to pieces afterwards covering the ground with their mangled bodies and intestines, or hanging them on trees t rees. Hundreds were bayoneted, burned at the stake, or killed in all the cruel ways that any one would ever dare to depict and it would be too horrible, and worse than actions of bodesty. The heads, hearts, liver, stomach, all the intestines were an stuck on pikes and paraded through the captured towns and plantations to the terror of the remaining thousands who even wished to kill themselves from sheer terror. It was the most frightful butchery of all the war up to this time.

Even the most harded heart hardened savage would have shrank at this sight. And the landelinians called this war. Every child killed looked as if she or he had gone through a gigantic meat chopper and every devid every device of their bodies were paraded on pikes making a scene worse than a parade in hell itself. And if violet and her sisters had seen this sight they would have never gotten over it. This was done likewise to twenty priests, seventeen hundred nuns captured from various insi institutions, and four bishi bishops captured from some Angelinian town during the recent herculean battle.

The Treclan Lane itself was strewn with the sliced b dies of children and their bodies were so badly mangled that they could not be recognized. The lower trunks of the trees i themselves were besmeared with the blood, while two other lanes were full of butchered children. It seemed as if every child in the world had been butchered. One could walk through the lanes but could never avoid stepping on their poor little bodies or intestines. This was afterwards known as the ''GREAT TRECIAN LANE MASSACRE''.

When General vivian heard of this he reported it to the authorities of Angelinia demanding them to pass a decree that all landelinians must cease butchering children otherwise prisoners caught during battles would not be shown any mercy.

THE FRIGHTFUL BATTLE OF FLANDERS, o OR AURANDICALLIO.

Five days later on March the fourteenth general Zimmermann had drew his own troops out of range of the forest fires and was advancing his forces with the intention to lay to Mc-Whirther and vivian wickey as well as Jennie turner a great series of seiges but learned that general pic nell Shoemaucker was advancing to flank Manley who had withdrawn his beaten armies who had tward the big town od of Madge Evans, and alarmed at this general Huebaum Manley learning also of his own danger made preparations to retreat tward Madge Evans also. Zimmermann hearing of the retreat of the two Manleys ordered Bicknell pi Shoemaucker to leave t the Manleys go his way, that he himself would attend to them as he wished Shoemaucker to add his forces to those of the Christians besieging Julo Calloe and Norman Catherine.

Zimmermann also sent general vivinnia to strike the Manleys at Madge Evans. Johnston Jackon Manley learning that Vivinnias force overwhelmed his five to one did not desire to engage him just then in his crippled disposition and so on the last day of Feburary was in full flight tward Aurandicallio which was situated on the Francis Creek still further north but close to the banks of Mc-Hollester Run.

Two miles away from Aurandicallio was the little town of Lillian flanke landers.

A few days later general Shoemaucker arived with his intention of moving on to Madge Evans and general Manley fearing that Johnston Jackon Manley would be crushed asked Manley to discontinue his retreat, and prepared his own forces to oppose the christian advance on M adhe Evans. Thus it seemed as if Zimmermanns intentions to besiege Mc-Whirther just now was out of the question.

''My but this is certainly a war.''Said violet to Joice.''What a terrible battle we have had at Jennie vivian, and the Mc-Hollester Run struggle.''

''Yes but those terrible battles are over.''Answered Joice, ''And we had to lose the great fight at Calverine. But I wish this cruel war was over. There is no sense to it.''

''And it will be known as the glandco-Abbiscannian war.''Said Jennie.

''Yes ,and I did not believe that the glandelinians would be so cruel now after their telling lesson during the battle just past.''D Said Angeline.''They do butcher children, but only at intervals. I hear that general Raymond Richardson Federal is more r responsible for the child butchery than any other Glandelinian general.''

''Yes that is so.''Said gone violet''My wasn't he a fighter.''

''Yes and a brute in his actions. But maybe some day he will be gone. As long as he does not,trouble us we are all right.''

General vivian who is concentrating his main forces tward the enemys positions at Flanders want's to see you little girls.''Said the boy friend, lieutenant Fred Nance galloping up to violet and her sisters. Bicknell Shoemaucker has made a grand advance having persued and stopped Shoemannins retreat near Aurandicallio and general vivian having received reinforcements only yesterday is going to make a final advance as he had been advised by general Zimmermann his superior to try and force his way through the enemys lines at flanders. He want's to see you little girls right away. It's important. He want's Gertrude Angeline, Jennie Turner, and Angeline pichee also if they can be found.''

''He Can't see them because they are with general Zimmermann who is advancing his armies tward vivian Wickey.''Said Violet.''But we will be ready. And you Fred notify general kindernine to advance his forces on the Heller Creek Bank I hear hear heavy firing in that direction.''

Fred dashed off tward general Kindernines headquarters while the seven Joan of Arc's started for general vivian's headquarters, but met general vivian near a creek called ''The Great Catherine Run.''

''I was coming to find you.''He remarked.''Are your boyscout commands in good condition.? There may be a hot contest with the enemy pretty soon at Aurandicallio for Shoemaucker is already engaged at flanders.''

''Those commands are fighting him, Shoemannins, or Huebaum Manleys!''

Asked violet as she dismounted r from her horse.

General John Manleys and gan Stanlaws. I told you before I'm going to make a final advance. Since your main boy scout leaders are remarkly brave I'm going to give them the chance to command Costellicos army to act as generals themselves as he has now a higher command. I have placed general Gannon, and picknell at higher commands, and will make a change of others for t their bravery at Torrington as soon as I can get it out. In the attack on the foe at Aurandicallio Hanson requested me to advise you little girls to see that your boyscouts do their duty, for I'm going to have my infantry on the left and center of picknells command to carry Shoemannins batteries if they can but they are not to attend the attacks themselves, and do you little girls stay away from the firing lines as this battle may be another hell of damnation . Manley is still strong in force, only Shoemannin having s seperated.''

''Allright.''Said Catherine. ''When does the advance comence?''

''It has already commenced and Costellicos command has remained behind waiting for your boy scout officers to take command and lead them on.''

''Thanks papa very much.''Said violet almost weeping with joy over his tremendous favor.''But papa do you think those young men will be able to command such a large column of men .You know they are still boys and not men.''

''They will get used to it soon enough''Said her father. ''If they can lead such a big herd of boys they can lead Costellicos division. And even now I will give you something better for a surprise though.''Remarked General vivian.' 'glandelinia is a hotter country than this---- --''

''When do we start!''Asked joice eager to see something of the enemy's country.''

''Any time we can drive the invaders out, clear Calverinin of the foe.''Said general vivian.''Kindly Gannon is to accompany us and when you have reached kindernine you c can at my orders sent him on the march for I'll give you little girls command over him for a time and advise him which is the best move to make. But for heavens sake do not go near the battle line.''

''All right''Said violet and her sisters saluting.''Come sisters we will have to order our commands of boyscouts on the march.''

'Off they went surprised that their main boyscout leaders were to have several divisions of christian soldiers to command. Yet at first they wondered if the other generals would obey them as they feared no man would take orders from mere boys. But violet and her sisters did not realize the nature of the christian generals or of the men also, for the men already knew that general vivian was going to place Violet and her sisters boy scouts in cos and of them, and indeed they were impatient for their arival instead of refusing them. So violet and her sisters had no trouble in getting the boys to take command. Violet and her sisters not trusting the generals yet decided to make a try knowing that their fathers word is law and that he protects the boys and so Violet said to James Thompson a lad of seventeen years;
